SEYNE, sain, a town of France, in the department of the Var, 3 miles from Toulon. It carries on an extensive sardel and tunny fishery. Pop. 4,600.

Seyssel, Claude de, sai'-sel, an eminent French historian and classicist. He became professor of eloquence at Turin; afterwards councillor to Louis XII. of France, and at a later period, and in succession, bishop of Marseilles and archbishop of Turin. His most important works were,—"The Singular History of Louis XII.;" "The Great Monarchy of France;" a treatise upon the Salic law; and translations into French, of Thucydides, Xenophon, Seneca, &c. He was among the first Frenchmen who wrote their native language with elegance and precision; but he was, nevertheless, a fine and vigorous writer of the Latin, in which language he composed a number of works. B. about 1450; D. 1520.

Sfax, or Sfakus, sfax, a thriving city of Tunis, in Africa, on the Gulf of Cabes, 70 miles from Cabes. It has a trade in oil and cloth. Pop. 6,000.

Sfondrati, Francis, sfon-dra'-te, an Italian cardinal, who was at first a senator of Milan and counsellor of state to the emperor Charles V. On the death of his wife he entered into orders, and was elevated to the cardinalship. He was appointed governor of Sienna, and earned, by his wise and humane administration, the epithet of the "father of his country," which was applied to him by the inhabitants. He wrote several works upon politics and jurisprudence, and a Latin poem on the Rape of Helen. B. at Cremona, 1493; D. 1550.—His son Nicolas became pope, by the name of Gregory XIV.—There was another cardinal of this name and family, who wrote several works against the liberties of the Gallican church. D. 1696.

Sforza, Jacopo Altendolo surnamed, sfordz'-a, a celebrated Italian general, who, according to some accounts, was the son of a labourer, and to others, of a shoemaker. Early in life he joined a company of adventurers, who gave their services upon hire to the petty rulers and republics of that period, and, after passing through the inferior military ranks, he became a general. He was for a long time in the service of Joan, queen of Naples, who made him constable of the kingdom. Pope Martin V. appointed him gonfalonier of the holy church, and created him Count de Cotignola, to which was added a large pension. He obliged Alphonso, king of Aragon, to raise the siege of Naples, and he retook several important places which had revolted. But being too eager in pursuing the flying enemy, he was drowned in the river Pescara, 1424.

Sforza, Francesco, natural son of the preceding, was brought up to the profession of arms under his father, and was with him at the time of his death. He was created a count, received some estates in Naples from Queen Joan, afterwards commanded with success against the king of Aragon; and on the death of Joan he attached himself to the duke of Anjou, whom she had made her heir. The pope, the Venetians, and Florentines, elected him their general against the duke of Milan, who purchased Sforza's alliance by giving him his daughter in marriage. On the duke's death, in 1447, the Milanese chose him for their general against the Venetians; but, after some actions, he turned his arms against themselves, besieged Milan, and compelled the inhabitants to elect him their duke. He also made himself master of Genoa and Savona. B. 1401; D. 1466.

Sforza, Catherine, a heroine of the same family, was the natural daughter of Galeazzo Sforza, duke of Milan, who was assassinated in 1476. In 1500 her late husband's lordship of Forli was besieged by the duke of Valentinois, son of Pope Alexander VI.; but she defended the fortress with the greatest bravery, though the besiegers threatened to put to death her children, who were in their hands. At length the place was taken, and Catherine sent prisoner to Rome; but she soon recovered her liberty, and was married to John de' Medici, to whose family she rendered eminent services.

Sgravesande, William Jacob, sgrav'-saud-e(r), an eminent Dutch mathematician, who was sent to the university to study the law, and took his doctor's degree there in 1707. But from his earliest years he had evinced a predilection for scientific knowledge, and before he had attained his 19th year, he produced an essay on perspective. While practising his profession as a barrister, he continued to make experiments; and, having published some scientific dissertations, he began to acquire fame as a philosopher. He visited England in 1715, and was elected a fellow of the Royal Society. After his return, he was appointed professor of mathematics at the university of Leyden. He was the first continental professor who taught the Newtonian philosophy. His principal works were, "Introduction to Philosophy," "Elements of Physics," and editions of the "Arithmetica Universalis" of Newton. B. in Holland, 1688; D. 1742.

Shaduan, shad'-oo-an, an island in the Red Sea, opposite the ancient Egyptian port Myos Hormos. Ext. 7 miles long and 4 broad. Lat. 27° 29′ N. Lon. 34° E.

Shadwell, shăd'-wel, a parish of Middlesex, 2¼ miles from St. Paul's, London. Pop. 12,000.—It has a station on the London and Blackwall Railway.

Shadwell, Thomas, an English dramatic poet. When Dryden was removed from the office of poet laureate, Shadwell was appointed his successor, which exposed him to the severity of that poet's satire, who ridiculed him under the appellation of MacFlecknoe. Shadwell was, however, a man of genius, and many of his dramatic pieces possess great merit. His principal pieces are, "Epsom Wells," "Timon the Misanthrope," the "Virtuoso," the "Gentleman of Alsatia," and the "Lancashire Witches." Dryden, his rival, thus speaks of him; but with more point than truth:—

> "Mature in dulness from his tender years,
> Shadwell, alone of all my sons is he
> Who stands confirm'd in full stupidity:
> The rest to some faint meaning make pretence;
> But Shadwell never deviates into sense."

Rochester, his patron, more truly estimates his worth:—

> "Of all our modern wits, none seem to me
> Once to have touch'd upon true comedy,
> But hasty Shadwell and slow Wycherley.
> Shadwell's unfinish'd works do yet impart
> Great proofs of Nature's force, though none of Art."

B. in Notfolk, 1640; D. 1692.

Shaftesbury, shafts'-ber-e, a township of Vermont, U.S., 95 miles from Montpelier. Pop. 2,000.

Shaftesbury, Anthony Ashley Cooper, Earl of, an English statesman, who, at the conclusion of his university career, entered upon public life, in 1640, as the parliamentary representative of Tewkesbury. Until 1643 he had adhered to the royal cause; but having in that year taken umbrage at some act of the government, he, says Clarendon, "gave himself up body and soul to the service of the parliament, with an implacable animosity against the royal interest." He sat in the Barebones parliament, which was assembled by Cromwell after 1653; but, after the death of the Protector, he and Monk operated together to bring about the Restoration. When Charles II. ascended the throne, Sir Anthony was made governor of the Isle of Wight, chancellor of the exchequer, and received other important appointments in acknowledgment of his services. Moreover, he was raised to the peerage, and was one of the commissioners who sat upon the trial of the regicides, in 1670. Apparently indifferent to anything like political principle, he was one of the notorious Cabal ministry, through whose misconduct of affairs England became involved in a war with Holland. He is, however, acquitted of having taken a portion of the bribes which his associates received at that period from France. He was created earl of Shaftesbury in 1672, and lord chancellor, an office he held with little honour to himself, although he was complimented by Dryden, in "Absalom and Achitophel," as follows:—

> "In Israel's courts ne'er sat an Abethdin
> With more discerning eyes, nor hands more clean,
> Unbribed, unsought, the wretched to redress,— > Swift of dispatch, and easy of access."

The duke of York, afterwards James II., although Shaftesbury appears to have taken considerable pains to conciliate his favour, became his constant opponent, and succeeded in bringing about his dismissal from office, in 1673. Subsequently to this event, he entered into opposition, and lent all his energies to the harassing of the court party. His hostility to the government led to his being confined during a year in the King's Bench. He afterwards displayed so much eagerness in maintaining the truth of the infamous Titus Oates plot, that some historians have deemed it to be of his own invention. The next great measure in which he participated was in 1679, when he drew up and carried what was then called "Lord Shaftesbury's Act," now famous as the Habeas Corpus Act. His opposition to the succession of the duke of York to the throne, and his intrigues with the duke of Monmouth, led to his being committed to the Tower on a charge of high treason, in 1681. The bill of indictment was, however, ignored by the grand jury at the Old Bailey. Perceiving that it was the design of the court to effect his destruction, he endeavoured to form a plot for an armed insurrection; but, not succeeding in drawing his friends along with him in this desperate matter, he, in 1682, fled to Holland. Although an inconsistent and intriguing statesman, he rendered great services to the cause of national liberty. B. at Wimborne St. Giles's, Dorsetshire, 1621; D. at Amsterdam, 1683.

SHAFTESBURY, Anthony Cooper, third Earl of, an English philosophical writer, was the grandson of the preceding. He was also the favourite of that statesman, who himself superintended the boy's education, and caused him to acquire a knowledge of both Greek and Latin before he had attained his 11th year, by placing him under a female tutor who spoke both those languages with fluency. His after-education was conducted by the celebrated philosopher John Locke, who was his grandfather's friend. After travelling upon the continent, he returned to England, and entered the House of Commons in 1693, remaining there five years; at the end of which time, his health having suffered, he went to Holland. He succeeded to the earldom in the following year, and, during the few closing years of William III.'s reign, he distinguished himself by his eloquence in the House of Lords. Subsequently to the accession of Anne, he once more retired to Holland; but returned to his native country in two years; after which he devoted himself to literature. His most important works were: "Letter on Enthusiasm;" "Moralists, a Philosophical Rhapsody;" "Sensus Communis, or Essay on Wit and Humour;" "Soliloquy, or Advice to an Author;" and "Characteristics of Men, Manners, Opinions, and Times." Of this writer Warburton said: "The noble author of the 'Characteristics' had many excellent qualities, both as a man and as a writer. He was temperate, chaste, honest, and a lover of his country. In his writings he has shown how much he has imbibed the deep sense, and how naturally he could copy the gracious manner of Plato." B. in London, 1671; D. at Naples, 1713.

SHAFTESBURY, Anthony Ashley Cooper, seventh Earl of, a modern statesman and philanthropist. He completed his education at Christ Church, Oxford, and entered the House of Commons in 1826, as the representative of Woodstock. In the interval 1828-30 he was a commissioner of the Board of Control, and was lord of the Admiralty in the administration of Sir Robert Peel, 1834-5. As Lord Ashley he took charge of the Ten Hours Bill and supported Sir Robert Peel in his measures with regard to the corn laws. The death of his father, in 1851, caused his accession to the peerage. He was an earnest and influential member of the "evangelical party" of the Established Church, and distinguished himself by his support of any movement or society which had for its object to ameliorate the condition of the uneducated or neglected classes. He was a conspicuous member of the Labourers' Friend and the Ragged School societies. In the religious world his influence was widely extended: he was president of the Bible and the Church Pastoral Aid societies, and of the London Society for Promoting Christianity among the Jews. B. 1801.

SHAFTESBURY, a market-town and borough of Dorsetshire, on a lofty eminence, 25 miles from Dorchester. Its houses are chiefly built of stone dug out of the neighbouring eminences. Its principal edifices are St. Peter's and two other churches. It formerly had an abbey, founded by Alfred the Great; and the charter of foundation creating his daughter Ethelgeda abbess, is still extant. Scarcely a vestige of this building is now visible. It has a trade in agricultural produce. Pop. 2,600. Shaftesbury is a place of great antiquity, and is believed to have been well known to the Romans.

SHAHABAD, sha-ha-bad', a district of British India, in the presidency of Bengal. Area, 4,103 square miles. Desc. Fertile, producing maize, millet, indigo, sugar, cotton, and tobacco. Pop. 1,600,000. Lat. between 24° 30′ and 35° 46′ N. Lon. between 83° 20′ and 84° 56′ E.

SHAH-ALIM I., sha'-a-lim, emperor of India, succeeded his father, Aurungzebe, in 1707. His short reign was chiefly spent in contesting the throne with his two brothers, Azim and Cambakhsh, who had been left the kingdoms of Bejapoor and the Deccan. Both these ambitious princes were defeated and slain in succession. Meer Hussein-Khan, an eminent native historian, thus describes his character:—"This emperor was extremely good-natured, and mild even to a fault; but very deficient in firmness, for which quality, indeed, the princes of the house of Timour have never been remarkable in later times." D. 1712.

SHAH-ALIM II. became nominally emperor in 1759. Unable to maintain his rule over the decaying empire, he, in 1765, sought the protection and assistance of the British, who assured him the possession of the city and district of Allahabad, and in return were granted Bengal, Behar, and Orissa, which territories formed the basis of the Anglo-Indian empire. His anxiety to re-establish himself in Delhi, the old seat of the Mogul empire, caused him to enter into an alliance with the Mahrattas in 1771; but these turbulent and ambitious chieftains soon reduced him to the condition of a captive. When Delhi was taken in 1788, by Gholam Khadir, a Rohilla chief, Shah-Alim was deprived of his sight. In 1803, Lord Lake captured Delhi; whereupon the unhappy representative of the Mogul emperors became an English state-pensioner. D. 1806.

SHAH-JEHAN, je-han', or 'king of the world,' the title taken by Khurrem-Shah, fifth Mogul emperor of India. He succeeded to the throne in 1627, and subdued the kingdom of Ahmednuggur, compelled the states of Bejapoor and Golconda to pay tribute, and commenced a fresh war in the Deccan; but, becoming prostrate with sickness in 1657, his four sons broke into revolt against his authority, and fought between themselves for the succession. Two of them, Aurungzebe and Mourad, united their forces against the elder brother, who was defeated and put to death by Aurungzebe. The two remaining brothers were subsequently got rid of by the same prince, who caused himself to be proclaimed emperor, and kept his father captive in Agra. (See AURUNGZEBE.) Shah-Jehan was a wise and humane monarch, and, says Tavernier, "reigned not so much as a king over his subjects, but rather as a father over his family and children." It was during his reign, which was the most brilliant period of the Mogul dynasty, that the famous "peacock throne," the jewels set in which were valued at £6,500,000, was constructed. He also built the city of Shahjehanabad, or New Delhi; and the famous Taj Mahal at Agra, as a tomb for his favourite queen. D. at Agra, 1666.

SHAHJEHANPORE, sha-je-han-por', a town of Hindostan, in the province of Malwah, on the Gurrah river. Pop. 65,000. Lat. 27° 38′ N. Lon. 79° 18′ E.—Also a DISTRICT, with an area of 2,483 square miles, and a population of 820,000. Lat. between 27° 15′ and 28° 45′ N. Lon. between 79° 23′ and 80° 30′ E.

SHAHLIMAR, sha-li-mar', a summer palace and gardens in the Punjab, 3 miles from Lahore.

SHAHPOOR, or PADSHAHPUR, sha-poor', a town of Hindostan, in the presidency of Bombay. Pop. about 7,000. Lat. 16° 18′ N. Lon. 74° 45′ E.

SHAHPOOR, a large river of Persia, in the province of Khuzistan, and, after a course of 60 miles, joining the Kuran, 50 miles below Shuster.

SHAHPOORAH, sha-poo-ra', a large town of Hindostan, province of Ajmeer, surrounded by a strong stone wall and ditch. It contains some good houses and a public college. Lat. 25° 43′ N. Lon. 75° 9′ E.

SHAHPOREE, sha-po-re', an island of Hindostan, off the coast of Arracan. Lat. 20° 40′ N. Lon. 92° 21′ E. —The capture of this island by the Burmese led to the first British war with that nation, in 1824.

SHAH ROKH BEHADIR, rok be-ha-dir', the fourth son and successor of Tamerlane. He defeated the Turcoman prince Cara Yousouf and his sons, restored the fortress of Herat in 1416, and rebuilt the city itself, which had been destroyed by his father. He appointed two of his sons governors of Mawarannahar (or the country beyond the Oxus) and of Persia; while he took with him a third as his subordinate in his Indian campaigns. D. at Ray, Persia, 1448.

SHAH-ZEMAUN, king of Cabul and Afghanistan, who, with the view of driving the Mahrattas from Delhi, penetrated into India as far as Lahore, in 1795-8; but his brother Mahmoud having attempted to seize the crown, he was compelled to return to Cabul, where he was defeated and blinded by Mahmoud, who became king. D. 1810.

SHAKSPERE, William, shaiks'-peer, the greatest poet of England. It is to be regretted that the materials for Shakspere's life should be so lamentably deficient. Though it is not entirely true, as Steevens, one of the editors of his works, declares, that "all that is known with any degree of certainty is, that he was born at Stratford-upon-Avon, married, and had children there; went to London, where he commenced actor, and wrote poems and plays; returned to Stratford, made his will, died, and was buried;"—it must, nevertheless, be admitted that the only foundation we possess whereon to build a biography of the poet, are a few parish registers, wills, and title-deeds. As Mr. Hallam truly observes, "All that insatiable curiosity and unwearied diligence have detected about Shakspere, serves rather to disappoint and perplex us than to furnish the slightest illustration of his character." It is not the register of his baptism, or the draft of his will, or the orthography of his name, that we seek. No letter of his writing, no record of his conversation, no character of him, drawn with any fulness by a contemporary, can be produced. The account of Shakspere's life, which has been most commonly accepted, is that given by Rowe, who wrote it mainly from the statements and anecdotes which Betterton the actor collected while upon a visit to Stratford, in the beginning of the last century. As it is impossible to give a place in this article to the various theories of the many commentators upon Shakspere's biography, it will be best to follow Rowe, but afterwards to indicate what portions of his statement are erroneous, according to the discoveries of the most diligent of recent inquirers. Rowe says the poet's father, "who was a considerable dealer in wool," had so large a family,—ten children in all, that though he was his eldest son, he could give him but a scanty education. He was, indeed, for some time at the grammar-school at Stratford, where he learnt the rudiments of the Latin language, but was prevented from making any further progress by being taken home to follow his father's business. While he was yet very young, he married the daughter of one Hathaway, a substantial farmer in the neighbourhood. In this kind of settlement he continued till, by an act of folly and dissipation, he was obliged to leave the country and his family. He had, by a misfortune common to young fellows, fallen into bad company, and, amongst them, some who were in the practice of deer-stealing. By them he was prevailed upon, more than once, to engage in robbing the park of Sir Thomas Lucy, of Charlecote, near Stratford. For this, continues Rowe, he was prosecuted by that gentleman, as he thought somewhat too severely, and, in order to avenge that ill-usage, he made a ballad upon him, which is said to have been so bitter that the prosecution was redoubled, and he was obliged to leave his business and family in Warwickshire for some time, and seek shelter in London. Here he formed an acquaintance with the players, and was enrolled among them, as his name is in the list of performers prefixed to several old plays, though what sort of characters he performed does not appear. Mr. Rowe observes that he never could meet with any further account of him as an actor than that his highest part was the Ghost in his own "Hamlet." We are equally ignorant which was the first play he wrote, though the dates of many of his pieces are easily fixed by particular passages. Queen Elizabeth had several of his plays acted before her, and, without doubt, presented him with many marks of her favour. She was so pleased with the character of Falstaff, in the two parts of Henry IV., that she commanded him to exhibit the knight in love; on which occasion Shakspere wrote his rich and admirable comedy of the "Merry Wives of Windsor." The earl of Southampton was his particular friend, and hearing that he had an inclination to make a purchase but wanted the means, he generously sent him £1,000. Shakspere was also very intimate with Ben Jonson, who gives him a high character, in his "Discoveries." After conducting the theatre many years with great reputation, he retired to his native place, where his wit and good-nature introduced him to the acquaintance of the gentlemen in the neighbourhood. Thus far Rowe, the earliest biographer of the great poet; but the new circumstances of Shakspere's life and ancestry, which have been made known, would seem to prove that John Shakspere, the father, was a small landed proprietor who cultivated his own soil; that when Shakspere was recalled from school in order to assist his father, the family consisted not of ten but of five children. Malone assumes that the means of John Shakspere had become straitened; but the story of the poet's having been taken home from school before he had "attained a proficiency in the Latin language," was evidently conceived to fit a theory long maintained, but now being rapidly exploded,—that Shakspere's works manifest an "ignorance of the ancients." How much more rational is the following hypothesis, taken from the "English Cyclopædia," and written probably by Mr. Charles Knight himself, the author of the best life of Shakspere that we possess?—"The free school of Stratford was founded in the reign of Henry VI., and received a charter from Edward VI. It was open to all boys natives of the borough, and, like all the grammar-schools of that age, was under the direction of men who, as graduates of the universities, were qualified to diffuse that sound scholarship which was once the boast of England. We have no record of Shakspere having been at this school; but there can be no rational doubt that he was educated there. His father could not have procured for him a better education anywhere. It is perfectly clear to those who have studied his works (without being influenced by prejudices which have been most carefully cherished, implying that he received a very narrow education), that they abound with evidences that he must have been solidly grounded in the learning—properly so called—which was taught in the grammar-schools. As he did not adopt any one of the learned professions, he probably, like many others who have been forced into busy life, cultivated his early scholarship only so far as he found it practically useful, and had little leisure for unnecessary display. His mind was too large to make a display of anything. But what professed scholar has ever engrafted Latin words upon our vernacular English with more facility and correctness? And what scholar has ever shown a better comprehension of the spirit of antiquity than Shakspere in his Roman plays?" The information which Betterton collected and Rowe made use of, as to the early marriage of the poet, has been proved to be correct. William Shakspere and Anne Hathaway were married in 1582, the poet being then eighteen and a half and Anne twenty-six years old. The stories that Shakspere, when a boy, followed his father's trade of a butcher, and that when he "killed a calf, he would do it in high style and make a speech,"—that he had been a schoolmaster, a lawyer's clerk,—that he had stolen Sir Thomas Lucy's deer,—that, after going to London, he held the horses of those who rode to the theatre during the performances, were Stratford traditions, which commentators endeavour to explain away by diverse means. Malone disposes of the deer-stealing tradition by affirming that there was no park at Charlecote at the time, and that, consequently, there was no "local habitation" for the stolen deer. Again, it is urged that, until Shakspere drew the rich and intellectual classes there by his works, they did not visit the theatre at all, and that those frequenters of the playhouse who found pleasure in the rude and unrefined entertainments there provided, were too poor to keep horses. Much nearer the truth would appear to be the London tradition, preserved by old Aubrey, who says, "This William, being naturally inclined to poetry and acting, came to London, I guess about eighteen, and did act exceedingly well. . . . He began early to make essays at dramatic poetry, which at that time was very low, and his plays took well." According to this view, we may imagine the young man, not holding horses, but boldly attempting to bestride Pegasus, and by engaging in the composition of his poems of "The Rape of Lucrece" and "Venus and Adonis," for which he had models in Chaucer and Spenser, fitting himself for that greater task, his dramas, for which he had no printed models, but only nature, which lay all before him. Pursuing the same theory, we may imagine the young man first acquiring a footing in the theatre, as a poet of whose talents, both as an actor and playwright, his fellow-townsmen and county-men, Burbage and Greene, leading actors and shareholders of the Blackfriars theatre, were anxious to avail themselves. But it is assumed that, because no mention has been made of him as an author till about 1592, he had not produced any of his plays before that date. It is, at any rate, certain that, since 1589, he had been a shareholder in the theatre, and, moreover, a man of importance among his friends and fellows. It is not necessary here to enter upon the controversy relative to the dates of Shakspere's plays. It has been ascertained beyond doubt, however, that his first printed drama was "The First Part of the Contention" (Henry VI., Part II.), which was in 1594. In 1597 he purchased the best house in his native town, called by Dugdale "a fair house, built of brick and timber." This is the purchase which the earl of Southampton is said to have enabled him to make by presenting him with £1,000; but, at the period in question, he had become a man of substance, was an important shareholder in both the Globe and Blackfriars theatres, and was beyond the need of such prodigal bounty. After the accession of James I. to the English throne, in 1603, Shakspere, apparently desirous of retiring from his profession of an actor, is thought to have applied for the mastership of the queen's revels, and to have been the person spoken of in the following letter from Sir Thomas Egerton to the lord-keeper:—"It seemeth to my humble judgment that one who is the author of plays now daily presented on the public stages of London, and the possessor of no small gains, could not with reason pretend to be master of the queen's majesty's revels; forasmuch as he would sometimes be asked to approve and allow of his own writings." Daniel, a contemporary poet, obtained the appointment. About 1604 he is supposed to have retired to Stratford, where, during the last twelve years of his life, he is surmised to have produced "Lear," "Julius Cæsar," "Coriolanus," "Cymbeline," "The Tempest," the "Winter's Tale," and others of his plays. In the "Diary of the Rev. John Ward, Vicar of Stratford-upon-Avon," recently discovered in the library of the Medical Society of London, the following entries were found:—"I have heard that Mr. Shakspere was a natural wit, without any art at all. He frequented the plays all his younger time, but in his elder days lived at Stratford, and supplied the stage with two plays every year, and for it had an allowance so large, that he spent at the rate of £1,000 a year, as I have heard. Shakspere, Drayton, and Ben Jonson had a merry-making, and, it seems, drank too hard; for Shakspere died of a fever there contracted." These entries were made at least thirty-four years after the great poet's death, and were probably exaggerated statements. With regard to the spelling of his name, it cannot be positively ascertained whether the signatures to his will are Shakspere or Shakspeare; but in a copy of Florio's "Montaigne," in the British Museum, it is unmistakably Shakspere. B. at Stratford-upon-Avon, Warwickshire, 1564; D. at the same place, 1616.

SHAMAKA, sha'-ma-ka, a town of Asiatic Russia, 70 miles from Baku. It is celebrated for its silk-manufactures. Pop. 19,000. In 1841 this place was made the capital of Shirvan.

SHAMOUL, sha-mool', an Arabian mathematician and physician, who wrote, among other works, one attacking the Jews, whom he charged with interpolating the Mosaic scriptures. B. 1200; D. 1273.

SHANFARAH, shan-fa-ra', an Arabian poet, who was the author of the oldest poem extant in Arabic. He also rendered his name famous among his countrymen as a swift runner. His poem has been translated by Sylvestre de Sacy, and included in the "Chrestomathie Arabe." He flourished before Mahomet.

SHANG-HAE, or SHANGHAÏ, shang-hi', a seaport city of China, and one of the five ports open for European commerce, 160 miles from Nankin. Pop. 135,000.—SHANG is the prefix to numerous less-important Chinese cities.

SHANNON, shin'-non, the principal river in Ireland, rising in Lough Clean, and, pursuing a S. and S. W. direction, divides the provinces of Leinster and Munster from Connaught. It passes Limerick, where it turns nearly to the W., and 60 miles below this city falls into the Atlantic Ocean, between Kerry Head and Cape Lean, after a course of 250 miles. It is navigable nearly to Limerick for ships of the greatest burden, and for smaller vessels throughout the whole extent of its course. It traverses several large lakes, and forms many extensive bays and estuaries, interspersed with beautiful islands. It receives above thirty other rivers in its course. From the number of rivers, lakes, and springs flowing into it, the mouth of the Shannon is increased to an immense magnitude, being nearly 10 miles in breadth for the last 15 miles, and from 20 to 30 fathoms deep.

SHAN-SI, shan-si', a province of China, inclosed by Ho-nan, Chi-li, and Shen-si, on all its sides except the N., where it is bounded by Mongolia. Area, 55,268 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, and producing wheat, millet, cotton, tobacco, rice, dyeing products, silk, honey, and live stock. Pop. 14,000,000. Lat. between 35° and 41° N. Lon. between 110° and 114° 30′ E.

SHAN-TUNG, shan-toong', a maritime province of China. Area, 65,000 square miles. Desc. Mountainous in the E., and intersected in the W. by the Grand Canal. Pro. Millet, wheat, indigo, drugs, and silk. Manf. Carpets, caps, and hempen cloths. Pop. 29,000,000. Lat. between 35° and 38° N. Lon. between 115° and 122° 40′ E.

SHARON, shai'-ron, a place mentioned in Scripture.

SHARON, the name of various townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 3,000.

SHARP, Abraham, sharp, an English mechanist and astronomical calculator, who, while employed as the keeper of a day-school at Liverpool, taught himself mathematics and astronomy, and occupied his leisure in the construction of instruments. He afterwards went to London, where, in 1688, he was engaged by Flamsteed, the Royal Astronomer, to mount instruments at the Greenwich Observatory. After rendering some important services at that establishment, he retired to Horton, in Yorkshire, where he fitted up an observatory, constructing his own lenses, telescopes, and other apparatus himself. The remainder of his life was spent in assisting Flamsteed, Dr. Halley, Sir Jonas Moore, and other mathematicians, in their calculations. He contributed to the "Historia Cœlestis" of Flamsteed, and in 1717 produced a treatise entitled "Geometry improved." B. at Little Horton, near Bradford, Yorkshire, 1651; D. at the same place, 1742.

SHARP, Dr. John, an English prelate, who became chaplain to Charles II. and afterwards to James II. He was suspended in 1686, but was restored to his functions in the following year. He secured the favour of William III., and in 1691 was made archbishop of York. In 1702 he preached the sermon at the coronation of Queen Anne, with whom he subsequently acquired great influence. He is said to have been one of those who prevented the elevation of Swift to a bishopric. B. at Bradford, Yorkshire, 1644; D. at Bath, 1714.

SHARP, Granville, an English divine, philologist, and antiquarian. He published some works, which, after his death, were collected into 6 vols. in 1773. B. about 1693; D. 1758.

SHARP, Granville, an English writer and advocate for the abolition of negro slavery. He was the son of the preceding, and was educated for the bar, but never practised. He wrote several excellent works upon law, philology, &c.; but it was as an opponent of negro slavery that he became known, both by his writings and by his conduct upon a particular occasion, when he protected a negro against the master, by whom he had been brought to England. The case was brought before the lord mayor, and, notwithstanding the decision of that magistrate, the master seized and would not surrender his slave. Sharp then brought an action against the master, and, in the end, twelve judges declared it to be the law of the land, that when a slave sets foot upon English territory he is free. He also wrote against the war with the Americans, the impressment of seamen, &c. B. 1734; D. 1813.

SHARP, James, a Scotch prelate, who, soon after the Restoration, was advanced to the archbishopric of St. Andrews, and had the management of ecclesiastical affairs in Scotland; but his conduct gave so much offence to the Covenanters and Presbyterians, that he was dragged from his coach and murdered by nine assassins in 1679. B. at the castle of Banff, 1618.

SHAT-UL-ARAB, shat'-ul-a'-rab, a river, or, rather, canal, formed by the united streams of the Euphrates and Tigris, before entering the Persian Gulf. It has a course of 120 miles.

SHATZK, shatzk, a town of Russia, in the government of Tombov, 38 miles from Morshansk. Pop. 6,000.

SHAW, Cuthbert, shaw, an English poet, who published, in 1756, a work called "Liberty." He was at that period engaged as usher in a school at Darlington, but removed to London and thence to Bury, where he entered into the Norwich company of players. He published, in 1760, under the name of Seymour, "Odes on the Four Seasons." In 1762 he attacked Lloyd, Churchill, Colman, and Shirley, in a poem entitled the "Four Farthing Candles." In 1766 he published "The Race, a Poem," in which he satirized the chief poets of that period. About this time he wrote an account of the virtues of a medicine called the Beaume de Vie, of which he was a proprietor. B. at Ravensworth, Yorkshire, 1738; D. 1771.

SHAW, George, an eminent English divine, physician, and naturalist, who was educated at Oxford, and took holy orders in 1774; but subsequently repaired to Edinburgh, in order to study natural science. In 1787 he became doctor of medicine. He assisted at the formation of the Linnæan Society, in 1788, and was appointed vice-president. After spending some years in the cultivation of natural science, and as a physician and lecturer, he, in 1791, received the appointment of assistant-keeper of natural history in the British Museum, which post he retained until his death. The most important of his works were—"The Naturalist's Miscellany," "General Zoology," and a catalogue of the Linnæan Museum, illustrated with some fine coloured engravings. B. in Buckinghamshire, 1751; D. 1813.

SHAW, Peter, an eminent English physician, who lectured upon medicine and chemistry with considerable success, and became physician to George II. He published editions of the works of Robert Boyle and Roger Bacon. His "Lessons in Chemistry" was at one time a very popular book, and was translated into French. B. about 1695; D. 1763.

SHAW, Thomas, an English divine and celebrated traveller, who, after taking orders, was appointed chaplain to the English factory at Algiers, and resided there during twelve years. He published his "Travels in Syria, Palestine, and Egypt." It is a work of great value, and has been several times reprinted. He subsequently became principal of Edmund Hall, Oxford. B. at Kendal, Westmoreland, about 1692; D. 1751.

SHAWL, or QUETTA, shawl, a town of Beloochistan, 20 miles from the Bholan pass. In 1822 it was the headquarters of the British army under General England; but evacuated in the same year. Pop. 2,000.

SHEE, Sir Martin Archer, she, an eminent Irish painter, who became president of the Royal Academy. He so early attained a proficiency in drawing, that, at the age of 16, when he was thrown upon his resources by the death of his father, a merchant of Dublin, he was enabled to set up as a portrait-painter in the Irish capital. Though he was extensively patronized, he desired to acquire a wider reputation, and accordingly repaired, in 1788, to London, where he was introduced by Edmund Burke to Sir Joshua Reynolds. In time he obtained a good practice as portrait-painter, for which occupation his accomplishments and polished manners well qualified him. In 1800 he was elected an R.A., and from that time he rose so rapidly in the estimation of his brother artists, as well as that of the art-loving public, as to be chosen president of the Royal Academy, after the death of Lawrence in 1830. He was knighted upon the same occasion. Though not a great painter, his courtly manners and fluency of speech made him a dignified and efficient president of the artistic body. He wrote a tragedy intended for the stage, but never acted, and some short poetical pieces. B. at Dublin, 1770; D. 1850.

SHEERNESS, sheer-ness', a market-town and seaport of the county of Kent, on the Isle of Sheppey, at the mouth of the river Medway, and noted for its strong and commanding fortress, 11 miles from Chatham. This structure was begun in the reign of Charles II.; but after the attack by the Dutch, who sailed up the river, government directed some strong works to be formed here. Since that period the fort has been greatly enlarged and strengthened, new works have been added, and such improvements made as to command effectually the entrance of the river. It now, also, constitutes a regular garrison, commanded by a governor, lieutenant governor, a fort major, and other inferior officers. Adjoining the fort is the king's yard or dock, chiefly used for repairing ships, and which occupies nearly 60 acres. The residence of the port-admiral, telegraph, large barracks, and coastguard station, are at Garrison Point, on the outside of the yard. Several old ships of war have been stationed on the shore as breakwaters. The town, which comprises three quarters,—Banks-town, Blue-town, and Mile-town,—has lately been much improved. Pop. about 9,000.—In 1667 Sheerness was taken by the Dutch under De Ruyter; and, in 1798, the mutiny of the Nore here broke out. It communicates with Chatham and London by steamers.

SHEFFIELD, shef'-feeld, a large manufacturing town of the West Riding of Yorkshire, on an eminence at the confluence of the rivers Sheaf and Don, both of which are here crossed by several bridges, 6 miles from Rotherham. The houses are well built, and many of them elegant; but the smoke of the numerous manufactories tends to give the town a sombre appearance: it is yet far from being dull, and is abundantly furnished with all the conveniences and elegances of life. The public buildings are the churches belonging to the establishment, the town-hall, cutlers' hall, the general infirmary, the assembly-room, the theatre, corn exchange, with a stone Corinthian front; Music and Philosophical societies' halls, assay office, barracks, and an elegant stone cross, erected to commemorate a dreadful visitation of the cholera in 1832. Besides these, there are numerous schools, a mechanics' institute, and a public library. Manf. Cutlery of all kinds, iron and steel goods, plated wares, metallic instruments, printing-types, and files. In the neighbourhood coal is abundant, and some iron is raised in the vicinity. Cheese, corn, and fruit are staple articles of trade. Pop. of township, 84,000.—It is connected with Manchester by railway.—The origin and remote history of Sheffield are unknown. In former times it was distinguished for its castle, a strong fortress, situate on the north-east side of the town, near the confluence of the two rivers, and supposed to have been built during the reign of Henry III. During the civil wars in the time of Charles I., its castle sustained a long siege for the king. Scarcely a vestige of it can now be discerned.

SHEFFIELD, a town of the United States, in Massachusetts, 28 miles from Hudson. Pop. 3,000.

SHEFFIELD, John, duke of Buckingham, an English statesman, who became member of the privy council, and lord chamberlain under James II. He was subsequently created marquis of Normanby by William III., and after the accession of Queen Anne, duke of Buckingham. In the same reign he was also lord privy seal and president of the council. He retired from public affairs at the accession of George I., and henceforth devoted himself to the pursuit of literature. He wrote some poems, an essay on Satire, and miscellaneous essays. He was also the author of some valuable "Memoirs relative to the Revolution of 1688." B. 1619; D. 1721.—His only son, after serving some time in the French army under the duke of Berwick, retired from the army on account of his health. With him the house of Sheffield became extinct. D. at Rome, 1735.

SHEHR, shair, a maritime town of Arabia, 32 miles from Makallah. Manf. Coarse cotton goods, arms, and gunpowder. Pop. 6,000.

SHEIL, Richard Lalor, sheel, an Irish politician and diplomatist, who studied law at Lincoln's Inn, and afterwards in Ireland, where he was called to the bar in 1814. The expenses of his student career were defrayed by the proceeds of five tragedies, the most successful of which was "Adelaide," and in which Miss O'Neill enacted the principal part. He also wrote "Sketches of the Irish Bar," for the "New Monthly Magazine." A zealous Roman Catholic and talented orator, he, in 1822, became a member of the Catholic Association, against the measure proposed for the suppression of which, he, in 1825, together with O'Connell, pleaded at the bar of the House of Lords. In 1829 he was enabled to enter the House of Commons, through the interest of the marquis of Anglesea, who was at the time lord-lieutenant of Ireland, and had observed the powers of the impassioned declaimer. His oratorical powers expanded and ripened in the House of Commons, and in truth paved the way for his entrance into office. He was appointed a commissioner of Greenwich Hospital, and, in 1839, became vice-president of the Board of Trade, and a member of the privy council. Upon the return of the Whigs to office in 1846, Sheil became master of the Mint, which office he retained till 1850, at which date he was nominated British minister at the court of Tuscany. He fulfilled the duties of this appointment until his death. D. at Dublin, 1793; D. at Florence, 1851.

SHELBURNE, William Petty, Earl of, shel'-burn, an English statesman, who, in early life, entered the army and distinguished himself at the battles of Minden and Kampen. When George III. ascended the throne, in 1760, he became the king's aide-de-camp, and subsequently reached the grade of major-general. He succeeded to the earldom of Shelburne in the following year. At first a supporter of Bute, under whom he held office, his views relative to the impolicy of coercing the Americans, led to his estrangement from that minister, and to his subsequent attachment to the earl of Chatham, of whom he became an ardent admirer, and unswerving supporter. In 1782 he was called upon to form an administration, and entered office with the declaration that he would adhere to all those "constitutional ideas which, for seven years, he had imbibed from his master in politics, the late earl of Chatham." During his ministry, although it extended over only seven months, the siege of Gibraltar came to a glorious termination, and Howe and Rodney won their triumphs upon the seas. He retired from office in 1783, resigning the leadership of his party to William Pitt. He was created marquis of Lansdowne n 1784, and henceforth took little share in public affairs. B. 1737; D. 1805.

SHELBY, shel'-be, the name of several counties in the United States, with populations varying between 5,000 and 35,000. They are situate in Tennessee, Alabama, Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Missouri.—Also several townships, none of them with a population above 3,200.

SHELDON, shel'-don, a township in the United States, in the county of Wyoming, New York. Pop. 3,000.

SHELDON, Gilbert, an eminent English prelate, who received various preferments, and was appointed clerk of the closet to Charles I., whom he attended in the Isle of Wight, and for his loyalty was deprived of his appointments and imprisoned. At the Restoration he was made dean of the chapel royal and bishop of London. On the death of Archbishop Juxon he was raised to the primacy, in which situation he conducted himself with great zeal for the church, and expended above £66,000 in charitable uses. B. at Staunton, Staffordshire, 1598; D. 1677.

SHELLEY, Percy Bysshe, shel'-le, an eminent English poet, who was the son of Sir Timothy Shelley, and came of an old English family. He was instructed in Greek and Latin by the vicar of the parish of Warnham, in Sussex; but, on attaining his 10th year, he was sent to a school at Brentford, which was exchanged for that of Eton three years afterwards. A shy, diffident boy, whose appearance and manners were almost feminine, he was nevertheless of an unconquerable spirit. At Eton he not only improved his knowledge of Greek and Latin, but added French and German to his intellectual stores. He quitted Eton in 1808, and returned to his father's house, where he finished two romances commenced at Eton, and wrote verses to a cousin, with whom he had fallen in love. He proceeded to the university of Oxford in 1810, and in his second year of residence printed an anonymous "Defence of Atheism." The object he seems to have had in view was not so much to express his own opinions, as to excite discussion, and to draw forth the ideas of others upon his thesis. He sent copies of his pamphlet to the heads of colleges, who, having heard that he was the author, summoned him before them. He was requested to state whether he was the author. He declined to do so; but he would not state that he was not. He was expelled. His father refused to see him; upon which he took up his residence in London, where he completed his "Queen Mab." His father becoming reconciled to him, wished him to enter upon a political career, but he soon afterwards incurred his parent's lasting displeasure by marrying, at Gretna, Miss Westbrook, the daughter of a retired hotel-keeper. The match proved as unhappy as it was ill-considered. The young pair were without resources; the lady had no sympathy with his peculiar nature. In 1813 a separation by mutual consent took place. He went abroad in the following year, and visited France, Germany, and Switzerland, in company with Mary Wollstonecraft Godwin, whom he subsequently married. The year 1815 was the happiest he had known for some time. His father agreed to allow him an income of £800 a year; and, while residing in Devonshire and at Windsor, he was deeply absorbed with his literary compositions. "Alastor" was produced at this period. In 1816 his wife committed suicide, whereupon Shelley claimed his two children, the issue of this marriage. But his late wife's father commenced a suit in chancery, alleging that Shelley, as one holding atheistical opinions, was disqualified to have charge of his offspring. Lord Chancellor Eldon decided that the children should be committed to Mr. Westbrook's care. He felt this decision to be unjust and tyrannical; and, in the "Revolt of Islam," which was written in 1817, made several allusions to the harsh decree. In the following year he left England, to which he was destined never to return. Milan, Rome, Florence, and Leghorn were his halting-places during the three succeeding years. It was in that interval that he made the acquaintance of Lord Byron, with whom he passed much of his time. In July, 1822, after being absent some days from his house on the Gulf of Spezzia, he set sail, in a boat which belonged to himself, in company with his friend Mr. Williams. A squall overtaking the light craft, she went down, and the friends perished. His body was afterwards washed ashore; and, in accordance with the laws of Tuscany, that everything so cast up from the sea should be burned, all that was mortal of the great poet was consumed to ashes, which were collected, and afterwards placed in the Protestant burying-ground at Rome. Both Lord Byron and Mr. Leigh Hunt were at the last ceremony. In addition to the poems already mentioned, he wrote the tragedy of "The Cenci," "Adonais," a monody upon the death of Keats, "Prometheus," and a number of smaller pieces. His friend Mr. Peacock paid him this just tribute:—"So perished Percy Bysshe Shelley, in the flower of his age, and not, perhaps, even yet in the full flower of his genius,—a genius unsurpassed in the description and imagination of scenes of beauty and grandeur; in the expression of impassioned love of ideal beauty; in the illustration of deep feeling by congenial imagery, and in the infinite variety of harmonious versification." B. at Field Place, near Horsham, Sussex, 1792; drowned, 1822.

SHELLEY, Mary Wollstonecraft, an English authoress, and wife of the preceding. While a resident in Italy with her husband, she wrote her remarkable novel, entitled "Frankenstein." After the poet's death, she produced "The Last Man," "Falkland," "Rambles in Germany and Italy;" and in 1839 made a collected edition of Shelley's works, to which she added some judicious notes, and a selection from the poet's letters. She was the daughter of the celebrated William Godwin and Mary Wollstonecraft. B. 1793; D. in London, 1851.

SHELTON, shel'-ton, a township of Staffordshire, 2 miles from Newcastle-under-Lyne. It comprises the village of Etruria and part of Cobridge. Pop. 15,000.

SHENANDOAH, shen'-an-do'-a, a county of Virginia, U.S. Area, 386 square miles. Pop. 14,000.—Also a river of the United States, in Virginia, which, after a course of 200 miles, joins the Potomac, in lat. 38° 4′ N.

SHEN-SI, shen-si', a province of China, inclosed by several other provinces, and having a mountainous surface. It produces millet, rhubarb, timber, musk, iron, copper, jasper, and gold. Pop. 10,000,000. Lat. between 32° and 40° N. Lon. between 106° and 111° E.

SHENSTONE, William, shen'-stone, an English poet, who, after completing his education at the university of Oxford, spent some time in travelling. Subsequently, he retired to his paternal estate at Hales-Owen, which he greatly improved and ornamented. His works consist of songs, elegies, pastorals; a poem in Spenser's manner, entitled, "The Schoolmistress;" letters, and miscellaneous essays. "The general recommendation of Shenstone," says Dr. Johnson, "is easiness and simplicity." B. at Hales-Owen, Shropshire, 1714; D. at the same place, 1763.

SHEPPEY, ISLE OF, shep'-pe, an island of the county of Kent, situate at the mouth of the Thames and Medway, and separated from the mainland by an arm of the sea called the Swale. Ext. About 11 miles in length and 8 in breadth. About four-fifths of the island consists of marsh and pasture lands; the remainder is arable. Pop. 14,000.

SHEPTON MALLET, shep'-ton măl'-let, a market-town and parish of Somersetshire, 19 miles from Bristol. The town consists of about 20 streets and lanes, most of which are narrow and dirty. The church is a large and handsome building, having a tower at the west end, surmounted by a spire. Manf. Crapes and velvets. Pop. 5,000.

SHEPWAY, shep'-wai, a part of Kent, comprising its S. part, with Romney-marsh, and the towns of Folkstone, Romney, Hythe, and Lydd. Pop. 27,000.

SHERBORNE, or SHERBOURNE, sher'-born, an ancient market-town and parish of Dorsetshire, 18 miles from Dorchester. Its principal building is a church, a magnificent structure, and, from its magnitude and ornamental architecture, more resembles a cathedral. It was originally built by Bishop Aldhelm, but was almost wholly renewed in the time of King Henry VI. The other public buildings are the market-house, the workhouse, an almshouse, and a free grammar-school. There are, besides, some other charitable institutions. Manf. Buttons and silk twist. Pop. 5,300.—Also the name of several other parishes, none of them with a population above 1,000.

SHERBORO, sher'-bo-ro, an island on the coast of Guinea, Africa, opposite the mouth of a river of the same name. Ext. 30 miles long and 10 broad. It is low and unhealthy. Lat. 7° 30′ N. Lon. 12° 40′ W.

SHERBURN, sher'-burn, a market-town of the West Riding of Yorkshire, 11 miles from York. It had once a palace of King Athelstan, and has now a school with four scholarships in St. John's College, Cambridge. Pop. 3,800.

SHERBURNE, Sir Edward, an English writer, who succeeded, on his father's death, to the office of clerk of the ordnance. He was imprisoned for some time by the parliament, and, on recovering his liberty, joined the king, whom he served with great bravery, for which he lost his estates. After the battle of Edgehill, he went to Oxford, where he was created master of arts. At the Restoration he recovered his place, and was knighted. He translated two of Seneca's tragedies into English; the "Sphere" of Marcus Manilius; and other works, and wrote a volume of poems. B. in London, 1618; D. at the same place, 1702.

SHERIDAN, Thomas, sher'-i-dan, an Irish divine and poet. At the conclusion of his educational career at the university of Dublin, he set up a school in Dublin, and afterwards was master of one at Cavan, which he sold, as he also did a living procured for him by Dean Swift, with whom he was in close intimacy. He was an improvident man; but, says Lord Cork, "his pen and fiddlestick were in continual motion." He translated into verse the "Satires" of Persius and the "Philoctetes" of Sophocles. B. in the county of Cavan, Ireland, 1684; D. 1738.

SHERIDAN, Thomas, an eminent lexicographer, son of the preceding. He was educated at Westminster school, and next at Trinity College, Dublin, where he took a degree in arts. The death of his father leaving him without resources, he, in 1743, appeared on the stage in the character of Richard III. The year following he performed at Covent-Garden theatre. He afterwards became manager of the Dublin theatre, and, at a later period, an itinerant lecturer on elocution. He obtained a pension from George II., and, in 1767, produced at the Haymarket an entertainment of reading, singing, and music, called "An Attic Evening." He also performed at the same theatre and at Covent Garden; but abandoned the profession of an actor in 1776. The same year he succeeded Garrick as manager of Drury-Lane theatre, which situation he resigned in 1779. He now returned to his literary labours, and to reading occasional lectures. His principal works are, "A Dictionary of the English Language," one object of which was to establish a plain and permanent standard of pronunciation; "Lectures on the Art of Reading;" "British Education; or, the Source of the Disorders of Great Britain; "Life of Swift," prefixed to his works. B. at Quilca, Ireland, 1721; D. 1788.—His wife Frances, whose maiden name was Chamberlayne, was an accomplished woman, and wrote "Sidney Biddulph," a novel; a romance entitled "Nourjahad;" and "The Discovery," a comedy. D. at Blois, 1767.

SHERIDAN, Richard Brinsley, an eminent Irish dramatist, who was the son of the preceding. After being at school in Dublin, he was sent to Harrow, which establishment he quitted with the character of an "impenetrable dunce," who wrote "think" for "thing." He commenced life by eloping to France with Miss Linley, a popular singer, whom, in 1773, he secretly married. During the first years of his marriage he appears to have subsisted upon a sum of £3,000, "which a good-natured old gentleman had settled upon Miss Linley, in default of being able to marry her." In 1775, however, he directed his attention towards literature, and produced his comedy of "The Rivals," which, upon the first representation, was unsuccessful, but subsequently became popular. The farce of "St. Patrick's Day" was his second production, which was quickly followed by the "Duenna," according to Hazlitt, "a perfect work of art: the songs are the best that were ever written, except those in the 'Beggar's Opera.' They have a joyous spirit of intoxication in them, and strains of the most melting tenderness." He suddenly became a proprietor of Drury-Lane theatre; but whence he derived the money necessary to take that step has never been shown. In 1777 he slightly altered Vanbrugh's comedy of "The Relapse," and put it upon the stage under the title of "The Trip to Scarborough." In the same year also he brought out "The School for Scandal," of which Leigh Hunt observes, "With the exception of too great a length of dialogue without action in its earlier scenes, it is a very concentration and crystallization of all that is sparkling, clear, and compact in the materials of pure comedy." The fine farce called "The Critic" was written in 1779. Of it Leigh Hunt remarks, that it is "in some of its most admired passages little better than an exquisite cento of the wit of the satirists before him. Sheridan must have felt himself emphatically at home in a production of this kind; for there was every call in it upon the powers he abounded in—wit, banter, and style, and none upon his good-nature." Through the interest of Fox, he was enabled to enter the House of Commons in 1780. He gave a warm and consistent support to the Whig party, and during the marquis of Rockingham's administration he held the office of under-secretary of state; but he possessed none of the high qualities of a statesman, and as a debater he "gradually degenerated into a useless though amusing speaker, familiarly joked at by the public, admired but disesteemed by his friends." Nevertheless, his speech upon the impeachment of Warren Hastings will always be remembered as a noble piece of oratory. His wife died in 1792, and three years later he married the daughter of the dean of Winchester, who was "young, accomplished, and ardently devoted to him." He now sold his shares in the Drury-Lane theatre for £15,000: to this was added £5,000 obtained with his wife; and with the whole an estate in Surrey was purchased. His last productions were "The Stranger" and "Pizarro," both adaptations from the German of Kotzebue. But the end was approaching: always more or less embarrassed by pecuniary difficulties, his failing health and departed youth left him in fear of impending bailiffs, or caused him to shrink from duns whose patience was long exhausted, and whom in earlier years he would have pacified with a facility entirely his own. Now that his flashes of wit were extinguished by sickness and distress, he was no longer the welcome boon-companion of the pompous and heartless prince-regent. His whole life had been dramatic; in the heyday of his strength and brilliancy it was comedy; but the end closely approached the tragic. He expired near his dying wife. There is a complete edition of his works by Leigh Hunt, who affixed to it a critical and biographical sketch. His life was also written by the poet Moore; while some excellent criticism upon his fine comedies is to be found in the "Lectures on the Comic Writers," by Hazlitt. B. at Dublin, 1751; D. in London, 1816.

SHERLOCK, Richard, sher'-lok, an English divine, who became chaplain in the army of Charles I., and frequently preached before the court at Oxford, where he was created bachelor of divinity. After the Restoration, he obtained some preferment. His principal works are, "The Practical Christian;" Confessions, Meditations, and Prayers for the Sacrament; "On the Four Last Things;" "Pieces against the Quakers." B. in Cheshire, about 1619; D. 1689.

SHERLOCK, Thomas, an eminent English prelate, who was son of the above. He was educated at Catherine Hall, Cambridge, of which he was chosen fellow, and afterwards became master. He succeeded his father in the mastership of the Temple. In the controversy excited by Bishop Hoadley on the constitution of the Church, Dr. Sherlock bore a conspicuous part, and attacked the bishop in an able pamphlet, in vindication of the Corporation and Test acts. He also answered Collins in six discourses on the use and intent of prophecy, and wrote with equal strength a defence of the miracle of Christ's resurrection, against Woolston. He was successively dean of Chichester, bishop of Bangor, Salisbury, and London, and was offered the see of Canterbury, which he declined. His sermons rank among the first in the English language. B. in London, 1678; D. near London, 1761.

SHERLOCK, William, a learned English divine, who, among other preferments, obtained the mastership of the Temple. He displayed great zeal and abilities against popery in the reign of James II., but for some time scrupled to take the oaths to King William. He at last complied, and published an apology for his conduct, which was severely animadverted on by the nonjurors. He was preferred to the deanery of St. Paul's, and had a long controversy with Dr. South on the doctrine of the Trinity. He published several sermons, and practical discourses on death and the last judgment, once very popular. B. in London, 1641; D. 1707.

SHERM, sherm, a 'harbour,' applied to numerous inlets on the E. coast of the Red Sea.

SHETLAND, or ZETLAND ISLES, shet'-land, the north-east division of the Scottish northern isles, about 45 miles north-east of the Orkneys, with which they form a county. The nearest part of the continent of Europe is Bergen, in Norway, from which they lie 210 miles W. The southern promontory of the Mainland (as the largest of the Shetland Islands is termed) lies in lat. 59° 48½′ N., and the northern extremity of Unst, the most remote of them all, in lat. 60° 52′ N. The meridian of London passes through this last island. The islands are about 30 in number, of which the principal inhabited are the Mainland, Yell, Unst, Whalsay, Bressay, Burray, House, Troudray, Fetlar, Papa Stour, Muckle and Little Rhoe, Skerries, Noss, with the small islands of Foula and Fair Isle, which lie in the strait between the clusters of Orkney and Shetland. Foula is the most N., and is supposed to be the Ultima Thule of the ancients. Area, 5,388 square miles, of which Mainland comprises about the half. Desc. The general appearance is rugged and sterile. Some patches of miserably-cultivated soil relieve the eye of a traveller; but not a tree or shrub is to be seen. The western parts are peculiarly wild, dreary, and desolate; consisting of grey rocks, stagnant marshes and pools, broken and precipitous coasts, excavated into vast natural arches and deep caverns. Climate. Wet and tempestuous. The sea swells and rages in such a manner, that for five or six months the ports are almost inaccessible. Pro. Peat and turf for fuel. Great numbers of horses are bred in Shetland, though they are of very small size. These little animals, however, are full of spirit, and bear fatigue much better, in proportion to their size, than larger horses. The cattle are also of a small size, though, in point of shape, perhaps, inferior to the West Highland cattle only of all our native breeds. The sheep and swine are also good, and the cod, ling, and tusk fisheries are important. Minerals. Copper, iron, and clay; but few mines are wrought. Chrome-yellow, however, is an important article of export from Unst. Manf. Almost wholly domestic. The inhabitants make a coarse cloth for their own use, and a little linen; they likewise export large quantities of stockings wrought upon wires, manufactured from native wool, some of which are so fine that they equal silk in price, and can be drawn through a finger-ring. Beanmeal, oatmeal, potatoes, and fish form the great portion of the food of the inhabitants, who are chiefly of Norwegian descent. Pop. 32,000. Lat. mostly between 59° 51′ and 60° 50′ N. Lon. between 0° 44′ and 1° 44′ W. —Scandinavian remains are numerous in the islands.

SHIELD, William, sheeld, an eminent English musical composer, who was the son of a teacher of singing; but, losing his father, he was apprenticed to a boat-builder as a means of assuring him his future subsistence. The lad's predilection for music was, however, strongly exhibited, and throughout his apprenticeship he studied the art assiduously. Having been fortunate to attract the notice of the celebrated master Avison, he made so much progress under his tuition as to be able to compose an anthem for the consecration of a new church at Sunderland. This piece was greatly admired, and brought its author into notice. He repaired to London, where he was engaged in the orchestra of the King's theatre during twenty years. In 1783, his opera of "Rosina" was performed with the most brilliant success at Covent Garden. This was followed by the "Poor Soldier," "Robin Hood," "The Farmer," and other operas. In 1791 he visited France and Italy, and in 1807 retired from all theatrical engagements, resolving to devote himself to the production of works on the theory and practice of music. The most important of these valuable productions were, "Introduction to Harmony" and "Rudiments of Thorough Bass." B. at Smallwell, Durham, 1749; D. in London, 1829. His remains were interred in Westminster Abbey.

SHIELDS, NORTH, sheelds, a market-town and seaport of Northumberland, near the entrance of the river Tyne, on its northern bank, 8 miles from Newcastle. It is contiguous to Tynemouth. It has of late years increased greatly in size and population, and improvements have been carried on upon an extensive scale in its streets and buildings. It contains many handsome streets, a large schoolhouse on the Lancasterian system, erected in commemoration of the royal jubilee; a theatre, a dispensary, a subscription library, which possesses an extensive collection of valuable books; an asylum for sick and friendless seamen, a lying-in hospital, water-works, gaol, mechanics' institute, and many well-conducted and flourishing benefit societies. The harbour of North Shields is bordered with quays, and is calculated to accommodate 2,000 sail of ships. The principal trade consists in the exportation of coals to London, and other places along the eastern coast both of England and Scotland. Some vessels are also employed in the Baltic and American trade. Manf. Ropes, naval stores, hats, gloves, and tobacco. Boat-building and shipbuilding is carried on, and there are breweries and an iron-foundry. Pop. of township, about 9,000. It has a station on the railway to Newcastle. (See TYNEMOUTH.)

SHIELDS, SOUTH, a market-town in the county of Durham, at the mouth of the river Tyne, directly opposite to North Shields, 7 miles from Sunderland. Most of the streets are narrow and the houses indifferently built. Its principal buildings are an exchange, a theatre, a town-hall, and the church of St. Hilda. It has many benefit societies and schools. Manf. Ropes, glass, soap, soda, and beer. It has, in other respects, a thriving trade. Pop. 29,000. It has communication by railway with Sunderland.

SHIFNAL, shif'nal, a market-town and parish of the county of Salop, 9 miles from Bridgenorth. Manf. Paper, and there are iron and coal mines in the vicinity. Pop. 6,000.

SHIKARPOOR, she-kar-poor', a considerable town of Scinde, on the high route from India into Afghanistan by the Bolan pass. It is encompassed by a mud wall, has a bazar and many mansions of wealthy Hindoo merchants. Its transit trade is large. Pop. 30,000. Lat. 27° 55′ N. Lon. 68° 40′ E.

SHIKARPOOR, the chief place of one of the three territorial divisions of Scinde, with an area of upwards of 6,000 square miles and a population of 351,000.

SHING-KING, shing-king', a maritime province of China, bounded on the S. by the Yellow Sea, S. W. by China proper, and on the other sides inclosed partly by the great wall of China and another wall of great thickness. Area, 25,000 square miles. Pop. about 1,000,000. Lat. between 39° and 42° 30′ N. Lon. between 119° and 125° E.

SHIRAS, or SHIRAZ, she-raz', a city of Persia, capital of the province of Fars, and, at several periods, of the whole empire, 115 miles from Bushire. Although the Persian historians refer its origin to a high antiquity, there seems no satisfactory evidence of its possessing any importance before the establishment of the Mahometan power. Its environs are almost unrivalled in point of beauty and fertility. They are laid out, to a great extent, in magnificent gardens, the flowers and fruits of which form a favourite theme of eastern poetry. Hafiz, the Anacreon of the East, was a native of Shiras, and composed most of his productions in these delightful retreats. He is buried in a small garden about half a mile from the town, near the stream of Rocknabad, the bower of Mosella, and the celebrated garden of Jehan Namäe. The lofty domes of the mosques, discovered from afar amid the trees, diversify and enrich the view. The interior aspect of the place presents, however, a striking contrast, the streets being narrow, winding, and dirty. Its magnificence solely comprises a few public buildings, of which the most remarkable is the great bazar, or market-place, built by Kurreem Khan. Manf. Silk and woollen stuffs, soap, sword-blades, and earthenware. Its trade consists chiefly in receiving from Bushire the spices and cotton goods of India, and transmitting them to Ispahan and Yezd. The neighbouring hills also produce excellent wine. Pop. Estimated from 20,000 to 40,000. Lat. 29° 36′ N. Lon. 52° 44′ E.

SHIRLEY, James, shir'-le, an English dramatic writer, who, after completing his degrees in arts at Cambridge, entered into orders; but subsequently embraced the Roman Catholic faith, and became a schoolmaster in London. He and his wife both died the same day, of a fright, occasioned by the fire of London, in 1666. He wrote thirty-nine plays, a volume of poems, and some school-books. B. in London, about 1594.

SHIRLEY, Sir Anthony, an English writer, who became fellow of All Souls College, Oxford. After studying some time in the inns of court, he went to Holland, under Sir Philip Sidney. In 1596 he made a voyage to America, and was afterwards with the earl of Essex in Ireland, where he was knighted. On going abroad, he was received at several courts, particularly that of Spain, where he was made admiral of the fleet, and a grandee. James I. ordered him to return, but he refused. He wrote a "Voyage to America," in Hakluyt's Collections; "Account of Muley Hamet's Rising in the Kingdom of Morocco;" History of his "Travels into Persia;" "Voyage over the Caspian Sea, and through Russia," in Purchas's Pilgrims; and History of his "Ambassages." B. at Wiston, Sussex, 1565; D. in Spain, 1630.

SHIRLEY, Robert, an English traveller, brother of the preceding, who settled in Persia, where he was held in such high esteem by the emperor, that he was sent as his ambassador to Spain, and afterwards to England. B. about 1570; D. in Persia, 1628.

SHIRLEY, Thomas, an English physician, who was descended of the preceding family, but took his doctor's degree in France. He became physician to Charles II. D. 1678.

SHIRVAN, or SHIRWAN, shir-van', a province of Asiatic Russia, forming the largest and most important division of the southern Caucasus. It consists of a large triangular peninsula, the point of which stretches into the Caspian, and is bounded N. and E. by Georgia and Daghestan, and S. by the Kur, which separates it from Ghilan and Aderbijan. Area. Unascertained. Desc. Mountainous, fertile, and watered by numerous affluents of the Kur and the Terek. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. between 40° and 41° N. Lon. between 48° and 49° 30′ E.—The province formerly belonged to Persia.

SHISDRA, or JIZDRA, shis'-dra, a town of Russia, 80 miles from Kaluga. Manf. Woollens, glass; and there are iron-works. Pop. 8,000.

SHISHKOV, Alexander Semenovich, shis'-kof, a Russian admiral, author, and statesman, who, while in the active pursuit of his profession as a naval officer, translated into Russian prose Tasso's "Jerusalem Delivered," as also some poems from the German. In 1812 he became secretary to Alexander I., and in that capacity issued a series of patriotic proclamations against Napoleon I. He became president of the Russian Academy in 1816, and in 1824 minister of Public Instruction; but, while fulfilling the duties of this latter office, he displayed a most decided antipathy to the spread of education among the serfs. His most important works are—"Opinion on the Old and New Styles in the Russian Language;" "On the Easiest Way of answering Criticism," said to be the wittiest piece of argumentative composition in the Russian language; a "Maritime Dictionary," in French, English, and Russian; "Memoirs of the War of 1812;" and "Historical Catalogue of all the Vessels in the Russian Fleet, from its Origin," &c. B. 1754; D. 1841.

SHOA, or SHWA, sho'-a, the most S. of the three principal states in Abyssinia, E. Africa. Desc. Generally mountainous; but it comprises many rich valleys. Lat. between 8° 30′ and 10° or 11° N. Lon. between 38° and 40° 30′ E.

SHOLAPOOR, sho-la-poor', the capital of a district of Hindostan, in Bejapore, on the river Kistna, 165 miles from Poona. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 17° 43′ N. Lon. 75° 40′ E.—The DISTRICT is in the presidency of Bombay, and has a population of about 680,000. It was annexed to the British dominions in 1818.

SHOOTER'S HILL, shoo'-ters, a village of Kent, on a hill of the same name, 1½ mile from Woolwich. It is one of the most conspicuous heights near London, and has Severndroog Tower, erected on it by Sir W. James, to commemorate his capture, in 1796, of the Indian fortress of that name.

SHORE, Jane, shor, mistress of Edward IV., was the wife of a goldsmith in Lombard Street; but the king, being enamoured of her charms, drew her from her husband. On the death of Edward, she lived with Lord Hastings, who was beheaded by order of Richard III., who also caused Jane Shore to be tried for witchcraft. She was accordingly sentenced to do public penance. She died in the reign of Henry VIII., in the extremity of poverty.

SHOREHAM, shor'-kam, a township of the United States, Vermont, 43 miles from Montpelier. Pop. 2,000.

SHOREHAM, NEW, a market-town and borough of Sussex, on the coast of the English Channel, 6 miles from Brighton. It owes its origin to the decay of Old Shoreham, which is now a mere village. The church is a curious and interesting specimen of ancient Norman architecture. It is noted for shipbuilding, which, with its dependent branches, forms the principal business carried on in the town. Pop. 3,000.—It has a station on the South-Coast Railway.

SHOTTS, shots, a parish of Scotland, 12 miles from Lanark. It has extensive coal- and iron-works. Pop. 6,000.

SHOVEL, Sir Cloudesley, shuv'-el, a brave English admiral, who came of humble parentage. He went early to sea, and, from being a cabin boy, rose to the first honours of his profession. In 1674 he served in the Mediterranean, under Sir John Narborough, and did such service by burning the ships in the harbour of Tripoli, that he received a captain's commission. For his gallant conduct against the French at the battle of Bantry Bay, in Ireland, he was knighted by William III., and created rear-admiral. He enacted a distinguished part in the victory of La Hogue, and in that off Malaga, in 1704. The year following he had the command of the fleet in the Mediterranean, and contributed to the taking of Barcelona. In 1707 he set sail for England; but, in the night of October 22, the admiral's ship, called the Association, and several others, struck upon the rocks of Scilly, and were lost. The body of Sir Cloudesley was discovered and conveyed to Portsmouth, whence it was removed to London, and buried in Westminster Abbey, where a monument was erected to his memory. D. 1650.

SHREWSBURY, shruse'-ber-e, an ancient market-town and borough of Salop, and the chief town of the county, beautifully situate on the Severn, 38 miles from Chester. The air is salubrious, and the town has a bold and commanding appearance, but the streets are intricately arranged, many of them steep and narrow, and all indifferently paved. Its former castle, standing on a narrow neck of land on the Severn, was greatly enlarged by Roger de Montgomery, the Norman, who cleared away fifty-one houses for this purpose. The building has fallen into decay, but traces of the ramparts and walls, which once defended the town on its southern and eastern sides, still remain. The shire-hall exhibits a handsome stone front; and of the churches, St. Giles's is a small plain building, consisting of a nave, chancel, and north aisle, &c. St. Chad's is built on a plan extremely novel, the body of the church being externally a circle of 100 feet in diameter. St. Mary's is a large venerable building, in the form of a cross, and consists of a nave, side-aisles, transept, chancel, choir, and chapels, with a western steeple. The other buildings are a county-hall, gaol, market-house, military depôt, infirmary, music-hall, philosophical, literary, and mechanics' institutes, assembly-rooms, and a theatre in a portion of the ancient palace of the princes of Poysland. At one end of the town is a column raised to the memory of General Lord Hill. Manf. Flannel used to be the staple article, and a coarse kind of woollen cloth called Welsh webs. This manufacture is now open to other parts of the county, but the town still continues a common mart for all sorts of commodities for Wales. The principal industry now consists of linen, thread, canvas, and iron wares. Pop. about 20,000. Shrewsbury is a place of great antiquity, and of considerable note in history. Its origin is referred to the 5th century, when the Britons are thought to have established themselves here, on account of the security afforded by the situation. It was hence often visited by the English monarchs, became the scene of many military events, and took, uniformly, an active share in the various contests of these turbulent periods. About two miles from the town was fought, in 1403, the battle of Shrewsbury, in which Henry V., then prince of Wales, first distinguished himself in the field, and the fiery Hotspur was slain.

SHREWSBURY, the name of several townships in the United States, North America, none of them with a population above 3,500.

SHRIVENHAM, shriv'-en-ham, a parish of Berkshire, 5 miles from Faringdon. Pop. 2,200. It has a station on the Great Western Railway.

SHROPSHIRE, or SALOP, shrop'-sheer, an inland county of England, on the borders of Wales, bounded on the N. by Denbighshire, the detached part of Flintshire, and Cheshire; E. by Staffordshire; S. by Worcestershire and Herefordshire; and W. by Radnorshire, Montgomeryshire, and Denbighshire. Area, 1,343 square miles. Desc. Greatly diversified, and comprehending every variety of picturesque landscape. In the S. it is generally mountainous, and level in the N. Rivers. The Severn, which, with its tributaries, run through the very middle of the county. The other rivers are the Teme, the Shelbrook, the Elf Brook, the Weaver, the Clun, the Ony, and the Corve. Lakes. Several, but generally small. Pro. All the ordinary white and green crops, with hemp, flax, cabbages, and hops chiefly on the Herefordshire and Worcestershire borders. Many cattle are fed in the level parts of the county, and much of the cheese sold under the name of Cheshire is made here. The hilly district is chiefly devoted to the pasture of sheep, the wool of which is of fine quality. Minerals. Coal, iron, lead, salt, sandstone, limestone, trap-rock, and schistus. Between the road from Shrewsbury to Bishop's Castle and the vale of Montgomery, rises a high rocky tract, the most elevated peak of which is called the Stiperstones; and it is here that the lead-mines of the county are situate. The iron-foundries in this county are extensive, and have been a source of great riches. Manf. Iron goods, coal-tar, pottery, china, and excellent tobacco-pipes; gloves, hardware, buttons, paper, woollen cloths, and some cotton and linen goods. The trade, manufactures, and even the agriculture of Shropshire, have been greatly advanced by its canals, of which there are several. Pop. 230,000.—During the revolts which occurred after the death of Edward I., and also during the wars of York and Lancaster, Shropshire was occasionally the scene of military events, the principal of which was the battle of Shrewsbury. Of the antiquities of Shropshire, the chief Roman stations in it were Uriconium, now Wroxeter, and Ruturinum, thought by some to be near Wem. Of the Norman and subsequent ages, many remains exist in the castles, priories, and churches of the county, which contains also various encampments. This county is traversed by the London and North-Western Railway.

SHUSTER, shoos'-ter, a city of Persia, capital of the province of Khuzistan, at the foot of a range of mountains, and on an eminence overlooking the rapid course of the Karun, 30 miles from Dizful. The houses are good, but the streets are narrow and dirty. Its commerce is facilitated by a canal, constructed by Shahpoor I., establishing a navigable communication with the Karun. It contains ruins which testify it to have been a place of vast extent and considerable magnificence. Pop. 8,000.

SIAK, se-ak', a river of Sumatra, and one of the largest in the island. It enters the sea nearly opposite Malacca, in lat. 1° 40′ N.

SIAK, a town and district of Sumatra, on its E. coast. The town is 45 miles from the mouth of the Siak, in lat. 25′ N., lon. 101° 55′ E.—The DISTRICT exports gold, camphor, tobacco, wax, sago, ivory, rattans, and silk stuffs. Ext. Unascertained.

SIAM, si'-am, or se-am', an extensive kingdom of Eastern Asia, situate in the heart of the great peninsula between India and China. It is bounded W. by Burmah, N. by Laos, E. by ranges of mountains which separate it from Camboja and Cochin-China, S. by the Gulf of Siam and the peninsula of Malacca. Ext. Estimated at 900 miles long and 400 broad. Desc. It is traversed in its centre by the Menan, and a great part of the country consists of mountains, extensive swamps, and jungles. Rivers. The Menan and the Menamkong, with numerous tributaries. The former inundates the valley through which it runs, and renders it extremely fertile. Climate. Salubrious;. but the mountain districts are subject to fevers. Zoology. The elephant, the tiger, monkeys in great variety, antelopes, bears, buffaloes, leopards, and rhinocerosses. Lizards of various kinds, chameleons, tortoises, hedgehogs, and a species of porcupine, which yields valuable bezoar, are found. Horses are few, and little esteemed, and the same may be said of all domestic animals, except the hog, the flesh of which is superior to that found in Europe. Fish abounds in the rivers, which exhibit, somewhat as in China, the aspect of a considerable population living constantly upon them. Pro. Rice, the only grain of the country, and the staple food of the inhabitants; sago, tobacco, sugar, pepper, coffee, cotton, cocoa-nuts, and gums. Teak, sandal, sapan, and rose woods abound, and there is not a region of the world which produces fruits more various and more exquisite. Minerals. Gold, silver, tin, lead, iron, antimony, and gems. The precious metals have only been produced in small quantities. Commerce. Siam is not one of the Oriental countries the trade of which has had any great attraction for Europeans. The staple articles are tin, tutenague, elephants' teeth, lead, and saffron-wood, betel, birdsnests, bêche de mer, copper in small quantity, but excellent; a little gold-dust and diamonds; rattans, pepper, salt, and wax. The articles best suited to the market are piece-goods, silk, scarlet cloth, opium, arms, hardware, cutlery, tea, sweetmeats, toys, and a variety of other articles for internal consumption. Most of the manufactures are carried on by Chinese or Anamese settlers; but, in both the useful and ornamental arts, little progress has yet been made. Government. An absolute monarchy. Religion. Buddhism. The language of their sacred books differs entirely from that of ordinary life, and is called Bali, apparently the same ancient Indian language which is called Pali by the Burmese. The temples of Siam are distinguished, even beyond those of the rest of Asia, by their magnificence, and by the gigantic statues which they contain. Army. None; but every male subject may be called upon to serve a portion of the year. Navy. Large, consisting of war-junks and galleys, manned by Chinese and other foreigners. Manners and Customs. The Siamese are of the Mongolian family, remarkable for cleanliness and order, and of a humane disposition. In the arts and sciences they are backward, compared with the European countries. In mathematics they have made some progress, but are still short of the Brahmins in this department of knowledge. The branch most cultivated is arithmetic, on account of its utility in commerce. Their astronomy does not extend beyond astrology, and some of the humblest of its practical applications. Music and poetry form the ruling passion of the Siamese; but instrumental music is always valued solely in proportion to the loudness of the noise produced. Their tragedies generally represent extravagant fables; but their comic writers indulge in a pointed ridicule against the reigning manners, and often against persons in power, who choose to wink at these liberties. Dancing and wrestling form also common public exhibitions, and their puppet shows are carried to greater perfection than any in Europe. Pop. Estimated at 6,000,000; of whom about 2,000,000 are Siamese, 1,500,000 Chinese, 1,000,000 Malays, and 1,000,000 Laos. Lat. between 4° and 22° N. Lon. between 98° 20′ and 104° 20′ E.—The first connection between this country and Britain commenced in 1685. Little intercourse took place, however, till 1821, when a new treaty was formed. The Burmese war of 1824 interrupted the friendly relations; but, since 1826, an amicable intercourse has subsisted between the countries. In 1860 Siamese ambassadors represented their sovereign in Great Britain, and were fêted in such a manner as to impress them with the greatness, the grandeur, and the hospitality of that country.

SIAM, GULF OF, a great bay of the Eastern Ocean, having on the west part of the peninsula of Malacca, and on the east the kingdom of Camboja. Ext. 500 miles long, and 300 broad at its entrance. Lat. between 7° and 14° N. Lon. between 99° and 105° E.

SIAMO, or SIAO, se'-a-mo, an island in the Eastern Archipelago, situate off the north-eastern extremity of the island of Celebes. Ext. About 35 miles in circumference.

SIAMPA. (See TSIAMPA.)

SIBERIA, or SIBERI, si-beer'-i-a, a vast territory of Asiatic Russia, including the whole northern part of that continent. It is bounded on the N., throughout its whole extent, by the Arctic Ocean; on the W. by the Oural Mountains, which, running nearly from north to south, separate it from Russia in Europe; on the S. it is separated by the Altai and the chains of Sayansk and Yablonoy, from Independent Tartary; on the E. by the Pacific Ocean and Behring Straits. In the N. Atlantic Ocean the islands of New Siberia are included within its boundaries. Political Divisions. Siberia is divided into four great governments: Tobolsk, Irkutsk, Tomsk, and Yeniseisk. Area. Estimated at 5,394,000 square miles. Desc. A great proportion of this country lies within the limits of the frozen zone; and, from the coldness of its climate, nearly excludes it from all communication with the civilized and improved parts of the world. The shores of the Northern Ocean are barred by almost perpetual ice, while those of the Eastern Sea can be reached by European vessels only after performing more than the entire circuit of the globe. Yet Russia, since she obtained its possession, has made vast exertions to place it on a level with more civilized regions. In her mines and her furs she has found considerable sources of wealth; and commercial routes to China and the Pacific have been opened, though with difficulty, across her wide-stretching plains and rivers. Mountains. Extensive. The Ourals, the boundary between Europe and Asia, extend along nearly the whole of her western frontier, for a distance of upwards of 1,200 miles. They are covered with tall firs, larches, birch, and other trees peculiar to a northern climate. The Great Altai stretches beyond Siberia, through the regions of Tartary. The Little Altai alone, an inferior terrace of the great one, forms the southern boundary of this division of Asia. In approaching the Baikal Sea, the great central chain of Asia enters the Russian territory, and her southern mountains assume thenceforth a grander character. The range which extends from the Yenisei to the Baikal, is called the Sayanskoi Mountains. They consist chiefly of steep and rugged cliffs, scarcely frequented even by hunters, and containing much granite. To the east of the Baikal, the name assumed is that of the Yablonoy, or Apple Mountains, in consequence of their vast summits being formed into a shape somewhat resembling that fruit. Rivers. These are nearly on the same grand scale as the mountains, and several of them rank among the most considerable on the globe. The most westerly, and the largest, is the Obi, with its tributary the Irtish; the Yenisei, the Selinga, and the Lena, which rolls its long course through the dreary regions of Yakutsk, traversed only by a few wandering Tungouses. Farther east still are the Indigirka and the Kolyma, falling into the Arctic Ocean. The Eastern Ocean does not receive any river of importance. Lakes. The principal are those of Baikal, Sunny, and Tchauy, with the Balkash-Nor, or Lake Tenghiz, which forms a portion of the southern boundary. Steppes. These vast level plains cover a very great portion of Siberia. In their extent, and the dead uniformity of their aspect, they resemble the deserts of Arabia and Africa, but differ entirely as to the nature of the soil. This is marshy, covered with long rank grass and aquatic shrubs, and filled with almost numberless saline lakes. The principal are the Kirghis, lying mostly in the N. of Turkestan, the Ishim between the Tobol and the Irtish, and the Baraba between the Irtish and the Obi. The countries from the Yenisei to the Lena, and from the Lena to the Kolyma, are also considered by the Russians as steppes, and consist in many parts of similar tracts to the others; but the level does not appear to be quite so uniform. The steppes are inhabited by nomadic tribes, who wander over them in search of food, or engaged in hunting expeditions. Zoology. The wild animals abound; and of those yielding fur, the most precious is the species of weasel called the sable. It is found in almost every quarter; but the most valuable specimens are those of Yakutsk. The black fox ranks next in value, and after it the ermine, the martin, and different species of squirrel. In the northern districts the prevailing animal is the reindeer. The Siberian dog is of extraordinary size and strength, and is used, not only in Kamtschatka, but sometimes in other districts, for drawing sledges, like the reindeer. The most formidable tenant of this part is the bear, which is found not only on the shores of the Arctic Ocean, but among all the mountains, even of the southern part of Siberia. There are few other ferocious animals except the wolf, the lynx, and the wild hog. The elk is very general as far as 65°. Cattle are numerous, and the argali combines the qualities of the sheep and the goat. The waters throughout do not less swarm with life; and winged game, particularly those that delight in rivers and marshes, abound; as wild ducks, geese, and swans. Notwithstanding the general severity of its cold, swarms of mosquitoes and other troublesome insects are generated in the summer months. Pro. Siberia is much less distinguished by vegetable than by animal productions. The environs, however, of Tobolsk, of Tomsk, and of Yeniseisk, are sufficiently favourable for pasture and for the inferior descriptions of grain; while the southern frontier affords some districts of almost unparalleled fertility. The principal crops are barley, oats, and buckwheat. Woods cover a considerable extent of the surface; but they consist chiefly of those trees of dark foliage and resinous sap which are calculated to defy the utmost rigours of winter. The oak and the hazel, found even in high European latitudes, cannot exist to the north of the Altai. The great streams of Asiatic Russia are bordered with gloomy forests of pine, fir, larch, Tartarian maple, black and white poplar, birch, alder, and aspen. On the bushes grow numerous berries, which the inhabitants eat, both fresh and preserved; while roots of various kinds supply in many places the deficiency of bread. Minerals. Abundant. Its mines of gold, though not of the first importance, are not wholly inconsiderable. The mines of copper and iron are much more extensive and valuable. Zinc, arsenic, and sulphur also abound. Siberia possesses, besides, mines of talc; and among the Ourals are found specimens of that singular mineral called the asbestos. The rock-salt which supplies the vast chain of saline lakes seems to exist chiefly in the mountains along the southern frontier. Malachite, a beautiful ore of copper, is found among the Ourals. Red lead, alum, sal-ammoniac, vitriol, nitre, and natron abound, and gems of considerable value are found. Political Aspect. This presents an almost boundless extent of country, thinly occupied by wandering tribes of hunters, and held in subjection by a handful of undisciplined troops, occupying a series of fortified posts, scattered at wide intervals over this vast dominion. Lines of fortification, composed of ostrogs or wooden forts, are formed chiefly along the southern frontier, following the course of the great rivers, as a defence against the Tartars and Kirghises. The governments are organized and governed like those of European Russia, and the army of Siberia consists of 40,000 men. The civil officers compose a comparatively small class. In the small towns the manners of the inhabitants seem marked by that stupid and barbarous luxury which characterizes a people living in plenty, and strangers to any but sensual gratifications. The mass of the population consists of the native tribes, who are subjected to the Russian empire, but on whom the yoke presses very lightly, merely obliging them to pay a certain tribute, and allowing them to retain all their pursuits and habits unmolested. These tribes are very various, and wholly dissimilar to each other. COMMERCE. The commerce of Siberia consists chiefly of two branches. The first, a native one, is formed by the exportation of its metals and furs; the second is a mere transit trade, consisting of an overland intercourse between Siberia and the Chinese empire. Imp. Manufactured goods, tea, and colonial produce. Exp. Furs, metals, and precious stones. A large quantity of gold is sent to Europe. In winter, merchandise is transported on sledges, and, in summer, it is conveyed almost entirely by water. Rel. Buddhism, Mahometanism, and the Christianity of the Greek church. Pop. about 3,000,000.—The Greeks and Romans appear to have been almost as entirely ignorant of this part of the world as they were of America; and the exploration of Siberia dates from the period when Russia began to emancipate herself from the yoke of the Tartar conquerors, under which she had long groaned. It was by the Russians that Siberia was penetrated and brought under subjection as far as the frontiers of China. (See RUSSIA, NEW SIBERIA.)

SIBTHORPE, John, sib'-thorp, a learned English botanist and physician, who was the son of Dr. Humphrey Sibthorpe, professor of botany at Oxford, in which chair he succeeded his father. He made two voyages to Greece and the neighbouring countries to collect rare plants. His collections were published in a magnificent form, under the title of "Flora Græca." He also produced a "Flora Oxoniensis." B. at Oxford, 1758; D. at Bath, 1796.

SICARD, Roch Ambrose Cucurron, se'-kar, a French abbé, who devoted his life to the education of the deaf and dumb. After having for some time had the care of the institution for the deaf and dumb at Bordeaux, he was, upon a competitive examination, chosen to succeed the Abbé de l'Epée, at the Paris institution. In 1791 he was arrested at the order of the National Assembly; but, notwithstanding an eloquent appeal made in his behalf by his pupils, he was transferred to the prison of the Abbaye, which, at that period, was the preliminary step to the guillotine. When about to be executed, a person named Monnot interposed, saying, "It is the Abbé Sicard, one of the most useful men in the country: you shall run through my body to reach his;" and Sicard himself said, "I am the instructor of the deaf and dumb; and as these unfortunates prevail more among the poor than the rich, I am more to you than to the rich." This speech saved his life. In 1815 he paid a visit to England with two of his favourite pupils, and was cordially received. He wrote several works upon his system of instruction. B. near Toulouse, 1742; D. 1822.

SICILIES, TWO, KINGDOM OF THE, sis'-i-lis, the title assumed for these dominions, at the beginning of the 18th century, by the royal family of Naples. Area, 43,170 square miles. Pop. about 8,700,000. (See NAPLES, SICILY.)

SICILY, the largest island of the Mediterranean, situate between Italy and the coast of Africa, and separated on the N.E. from Naples by the Strait of Messina, and forming a portion of the kingdom of the Two Sicilies. Political Divisions. Its former divisions of the Val di Mazzara or western part, the Val di Demona or north-eastern, the Val di Noto or southern, are now obsolete, and, since 1815, it has been divided into seven intendancies; viz., Palermo, Messina, Ca-

tania, Girgenti, Noto or Syracuse, Trapani, and Calatanesetta. Ext. From east to west about 180 miles, with a breadth of 120 at its widest points. Area, about 10,600 square miles. Desc. It has sometimes been conjectured that Sicily was joined to the continent, as the principal chain of mountains, extending from east to west, seem only to be a continuation of the Apennines. There are, however, other ranges branching off from north to south, and a few insulated mountains, of which by far the greatest is Etna. This mixture of mountain and valley causes a corresponding variety of products and scenery. Rivers. Numerous; but small and unnavigable. The principal are the Salso, the Platani, Belici, and the Giaretta, the Simæthus of antiquity. Lakes. The principal are the Biviere, the Lentini, and the pool of Ennan, in the centre of the island. Climate. Pleasant in general; the winter corresponding to the spring of England, and the heat of summer being tempered by the fresh breezes from the sea. Snow is confined to the lofty mountains. Of the seasons, the spring is the most agreeable; but the drawbacks are the unhealthiness of particular districts, the occasional occurrence of earthquakes, particularly in the neighbourhood of Messina, and the debilitating effect of the sirocco, or south wind, during a few days of July and August. Zoology. The same as the southern parts of Europe. Game is found in abundance. Pro. Sicily has always been noted for its fertility. Under the Romans it was considered the granary of Italy. Agriculture is, however, very backward. The products are maize, wheat, rice, pulse, beans, and other corn; flax, hemp, vines, olives, saffron, cotton, liquorice, and manna. For silk the climate is highly favourable, also for the rich fruits of a southern latitude: wine is also produced. Merino sheep and mules are raised; but, with the exception of these, all live stock are very inferior. The tunny, swordfish, and anchovy fisheries are important. Minerals. Iron and copper; marble is very general, and stone for building is found in almost every part of the island. Agate, jasper, porphyry, and alabaster, are likewise found. Salt-mines have been discovered near Castro Giovanni, in the centre of the island; and near Messina is a large coal-mine. The sulphur-beds are of great value, there being about 150 mines wrought. They occupy an area of 2,700 square miles, and employ upwards of 12,000 men and boys. Manf. Silk and cotton goods, skins, and hides. If to these we add a few articles, such as hats, cutlery, harness, carriages, and household furniture, made at Palermo and the principal towns, we have the amount of the Sicilian manufactures. Exp. Sulphur, fruits, wine and spirits, olive-oil, sumach, silks, corn, vanilla, salted fish, linseed, manna, rags, and skins. Imp. Sugar, colonial produce, iron, hides, and manufactured goods. Inhabitants. The Sicilians resemble the Spaniards and Italians in the darkness of their complexion, and not less in the indolence of their habits. There have appeared amongst them some successful candidates in the fields of belles-lettres, poetry, and natural history. Palermo and Catania have universities, and there are colleges and academies in about twenty towns. Education is chiefly in the hands of the clergy, and is said to be better conducted than at Naples. Rel. Roman Catholic. Gov. Each intendancy is governed by a prefect with a council and secretary, and each town has its judicial court. Superior courts are held in Palermo. Pop. 2,100,000. Lat. betwen 36° 38′ and 38° 18 N. Lon. between 12° 25′ and 15° 40′ E. Sicily was successively occupied by the Phœnicians, the Carthaginians, and Romans. In the 8th and 9th centuries, the Saracens succeeded in conquering it, and in making Palermo their capital. After keeping possession of it for about 200 years, they gave way to the Normans, who, during their progress to the crusades, made the conquest of the island in the 11th century. It passed successively into the hands of France, Germany, and Spain. By the peace of Utrecht, in 1713, it was given to the duke of Savoy, with the title of king; but in 1720, the Austrians prevailed on the new possessor to exchange it for Sardinia, and added the former to the kingdom of Naples. The war of 1734, however, carried on by France and Spain against Austria, transferred the crown of Naples, or, as it is now termed, of the Two Sicilies, to a branch of the royal family of Spain. In their hands it remained without interruption, until the French revolution led, in 1799, to the expulsion of the royal family from Naples. They took refuge in Sicily, where they remained till 1815, when the overthrow of Murat restored the former family to the throne of Naples. In 1847, 1848, and 1849 unsuccessful attempts were made to shake off the Neapolitan government. (See Naples.)

Sicinius Dentatus. (See Dentatus, Lucius Sicinius.)

Siculiana, se'-koo-le-a'-na, a town of Sicily, 8 miles from Girgenti. It has a harbour, and exports some wheat. Near it are some of the most extensive sulphur-mines in Sicily. Pop. 6,000.

Sicyon, sis'-i-on, the name of a once celebrated town of Greece, in the Morea, 9 miles from Corinth. The ruins are considerable, and those of the Stadium are in good preservation.

Siddons, Mrs. Sarah, sid'-dons, an eminent English actress, who was the sister of John and Charles Kemble. When little more than an infant, she made her first appearance upon the stage, for the benefit of her father, who was a theatrical manager. At the age of 18 she married a young actor named Siddons. While performing at Cheltenham, she attracted the favourable notice of Lord Bruce and others; upon whose recommendation Garrick engaged her for Drury-Lane theatre, where she made her début, in 1775; but she incurred the displeasure of the English Roscius, and was compelled to again retire to the provinces. Her fame, however, rapidly increased. Henderson, the eminent actor, declared her to be the "finest and best of all actresses; to have in herself all that her predecessors possessed, and all that they wanted. . . . That she would never be surpassed." In 1782 she again appeared at Drury Lane. She made her first appearance in her celebrated part of Lady Macbeth in 1785, and rapidly became the leading actress of the English stage. She retired from the stage in 1812; but reappeared on some subsequent occasions, for benefits and charities. She gave readings from Shakspere and Milton, at a later period, and appeared before Queen Charlotte and the royal family, and at the universities of Oxford and Cambridge. B. at Brecon, South Wales, 1755; D. in London, 1831.

Sidi, si'-di the prefix to several small towns in N. Africa.

Sidlaw, or Sudlaw Hills, sid'-law, a mountain-range of Scotland, in the counties of Perth and Angus. They extend from Kinoul Hill, near Perth, to near Forfar, and have the remarkable summit of Dunsinane, noticed in the "Macbeth" of Shakspere. Some of their isolated masses attain an elevation of 1,400 feet above the level of the sea.

Sidmouth, Henry Addington, Viscount, sid'-mouth, an English statesman, who was the son of an eminent metropolitan physician. At the termination of his educational career at Oxford, he entered himself of Lincoln's Inn, and was called to the bar in 1784. His father had been engaged as physician to the earl of Chatham, and he was thus enabled to gain the acquaintance of William Pitt, through whose interest Addington entered the House of Commons. In 1789 he became the ministerial candidate for the office of speaker, and was elected. Upon the retirement of Pitt, in 1801, he formed a ministry, composed of what were then termed the "king's friends." He held office, but with no great distinction, until 1803, when he was thrown out by Pitt, who succeeded to power in the following year. Acknowledging the superior powers of Pitt, he gave the new ministry his support, and was in 1805 created president of the council, and at the same time raised to the peerage as Viscount Sidmouth. It is, however, affirmed that he came to be regarded as a dangerous rival by Pitt, who requested him to resign, which he did. In 1806 he was lord privy seal in the Fox and Grenville administration, and soon afterwards became president of the council on the reconstruction of the same cabinet. After remaining out of office during five years, he again became president of the council, under Perceval; and, upon the assassination of that statesman, in 1812, he accepted the post of secretary of state for the home department in the ministry of Lord Liverpool. This office he held during ten years, and by his conduct relative to the reform meeting at Manchester, in 1819, as well as upon several other occasions, he became an object of great unpopularity with the great mass of the people. He resigned this appointment in 1822; but, at the urgent request of his chief, he retained a seat in the cabinet until 1824, at which time he made his final retirement from public life. He was not a great statesman, nor even a more than ordinary debater; but his habits of decision and fearlessness made him of service in difficult times; as for instance, while he held the secretaryship of the home department. B. at Reading, 1757; D. at Richmond Park, 1844.

SIDMOUTH, a seaport and market-town of Devonshire, on the river Sid, 12 miles from Exeter. It was formerly a place of some importance, and is still greatly resorted to by visitors. Pop. 3,500.

SIDNEY, Algernon, sid'-ne, an English statesman and political martyr, who was the son of Robert, second earl of Leicester. He distinguished himself at the beginning of the civil wars by his opposition to Charles I.; became a colonel in the parliament army, and avowed himself a republican. He was nominated one of the king's judges, but was absent when sentence was passed upon Charles. Neither did he sign the warrant for the execution of that monarch. When Cromwell assumed the title of protector, Sidney retired into private life. At the Restoration he went abroad, but returned in 1667, on obtaining a pardon, the condition of which was that he should conduct himself as a peaceable subject. In 1683 he was apprehended on a charge of being concerned in the Rye-house plot, tried before Judge Jefferies, and most illegally sentenced to death. This sentence was reversed in the first parliament of William and Mary. He wrote discourses concerning government, in which he places the origin and right of power in the people, and other works. Bishop Burnet speaks of Sidney "as a man of most extraordinary courage; a steady man even to obstinacy; sincere, but of a rough and boisterous temper, that could not bear contradiction, but would give foul language upon it." Supposed to have been B. 1621 or 1622; executed 1683.

SIDNEY, Sir Henry, an eminent English statesman. He became a great favourite with Edward VI., who conferred on him the honour of knighthood, and sent him as ambassador to France. In the succeeding reign he was appointed collector of the revenues in Ireland, and in that of Elizabeth, lord-president of the marshes of Wales, and knight of the Garter. In 1568 he was constituted lord-deputy of Ireland. He caused the statutes of Ireland to be printed, and is stated, by Spenser and Sir John Davies, to have wisely governed that country. Sir R. Naunton, in the "Fragmenta Regalia," speaks of him as a "man of great parts." B. in Surrey, about 1519; D. 1586.

SIDNEY, Sir Philip, a chivalrous English soldier and poet. In his 15th year he was sent to Christ Church College, Oxford, and at the age of 17 went on his travels. He was in Paris during the massacre of St. Bartholomew, and was obliged to take refuge in the abode of Sir Francis Walsingham, the English ambassador. After visiting various cities in Hungary, Italy, and Germany, he, in 1575, returned to England, and in the following year Queen Elizabeth appointed him ambassador to the emperor Rudolphus, at whose court he contracted an intimacy with the famous Don John of Austria. On account of his declaring his sentiments freely against the queen's marriage with the duke of Anjou, in 1580, in his "Remonstrance" to her majesty, he retired from court, and in his retreat wrote his celebrated romance, called "Arcadia," and his "Defence of Poesie." In 1582 he received the honour of knighthood, and in 1585 was appointed governor of Flushing, and general of the troops sent to the assistance of the United Provinces. About this time, his reputation for wisdom and valour stood so high, that he was thought a fit person to be a candidate for the crown of Poland; but the queen would not consent to the embarkation of "the jewel of her dominions." In September, 1586, Sir Philip displayed extraordinary bravery at the battle of Zutphen, but received a mortal wound in the thigh as he was mounting his third horse, having had two slain under him previously. His conduct while leaving the battle-field illustrates his noble character. It is thus described by his biographer, Lord Brooke:—"In which sad progress, passing along by the rest of the army, where his uncle the general (the earl of Leicester) was, and being thirsty with excess of bleeding, he called for some drink, which was presently brought him; but as he was putting the bottle to his mouth, he saw a poor soldier carried along, who had eaten his last at the same feast, ghastly casting up his eyes at the bottle; which, Sir Philip perceiving, took it from his head before he drunk, and delivered it to the poor man with these words: 'Thy necessity is yet greater than mine.'" This wound proved fatal twenty-five days afterwards. His body was brought home and buried in St. Paul's Cathedral. He wrote, in addition to the works already mentioned, an "Apology for Poetry;" Sonnets; "Ourania, a poem;" and several other pieces. B. at Penshurst, Kent, 1554; D. 1586.

SIDNEY, the name of several townships of the United States, none of them with a population above 2,000.

SIDON. (See SAIDA.)

SIDONIUS APOLLINARIS, si-do'-ni-us, a primitive prelate, and Latin poet. He was the son-in-law of the emperor Avitus, of whom he wrote a panegyric of 600 verses. After discharging several high civil offices at Rome, he was chosen bishop of Clermont by the Averni, in 472, which office he discharged so well as to be accounted the oracle of France. His epistles, poems, and other works, were printed by Sirmond, with notes, in 1652. B. at Lyons, 128; D. 484.

SIDRA, GULF OF, sel'-dra, the principal inlet of the Mediterranean Sea on its African side. Lat. between 30° and 33° N. Lon. between 15° and 21° E.

SIEDLEC, seed'-lek, a town of Poland, 55 miles from Warsaw. Pop. 5,500.—In 1831 this place was the scene of several conflicts between the Russians and Poles.

SIEG, seeg, a river of Germany, in Westphalia, rising 10 miles from Siegen, and, after a course of 80 miles, falling into the Rhine, 2 miles from Bonn.

SIEGBERG, seeg'-bairg, a town of Rhenish Prussia, on the Sieg, 15 miles from Cologne. Pop. 3,500.

SIEGEN, se'-gen, a town of Prussian Westphalia, on the Sieg, 38 miles from Arensberg. Manf. Woollens, cotton, and leather. Pop. 7,000.

SIEGEN, Ludwig von, the inventor of mezzotint engraving. He was descended of an ancient Westphalian family, and became a page to one of the princes of Hesse. The new method of engraving is supposed to have been discovered between 1637-41; but it has been positively ascertained that Siegen sent to the landgrave of Hesse a proof of his mother's portrait in 1642, and that this was the first impression ever taken from a plate engraved after the mezzotint manner. Upon the conclusion of the Thirty Years war, in 1648, he retired from military service, in which he had been engaged, and devoted his leisure to perfecting the new art. He made the acquaintance of Prince Rupert at Brussels, in 1654, and communicated his discovery to him. After Rupert had taken up his residence in England, he practised mezzotint engraving, and produced a specimen of it for Evelyn's "History of Engraving," wherein it is erroneously stated that the prince was the inventor. Evelyn, who wrote a history of the art, which was intended to be read before the Royal Society, therein stated "that this invention, or new manner of chalcography, was the result of chance, and improved by a German soldier, who, espying some scrape on the barrel of his musket, and being of an ingenious spirit, refined upon it till it produced the effects you have seen." The statement made by Evelyn was the origin of the account, long believed, that Prince Rupert was the inventor of the art. Siegen produced a number of engravings of royal portraits. B. at Utrecht, 1609; D. subsequently to 1676.

SIENNA, or SIENA, se-en'-na, an ancient city of Tuscany, the capital of a province, 30 miles from Florence. Being built on three eminences, the streets are extremely uneven, winding, and narrow, so that the chief part of the town is impassable for carriages. The only handsome public square is that in which is the town-house, and which contains a beautiful fountain. The esplanade is a fine shady avenue leading to the citadel, the ramparts of which, planted with trees, and laid out in the form of terraces, afford several interesting points of view. The cathedral is a magnificent marble structure in the Gothic style of the 12th and 13th centuries. It has, besides, a city-hall, an academy of the fine arts, a university, numerous convents, a citadel, and two theatres. It has also public libraries, hospitals, literary societies, and a school of medicine. Manf. These comprise woollen, leather, paper, and hats; but all on a small scale. An active trade is carried on in corn, wine, and oil. Pop. 25,000.—Augustus sent hither a colony, and Pliny mentions the town under the name of Colonia Senensis. Its prosperity was greatest during the Middle Ages, when it enjoyed an extensive commerce, and is said to have been much more populous than at present. It long maintained itself as an independent republic; but intestine divisions favouring the designs of foreign powers, it became successively subject to French and Spanish invaders. Under the French empire of Napoleon I., it was the capital of the department Ombrone. It is the birthplace of five popes. In its neighbourhood are extensive marble-quarries. Florence and Leghorn are connected with it by railway.

SIENNE, se'-en, a river of France, in the department Manche. After a course of 40 miles, it falls into the English Channel, 7 miles from Coutances.

SIERRA, se-air'-ra, the eastern part of New Castile, so called from its mountains. The word sierra is a general name for mountainous ranges in Spain, S. America, &c.

SIERRA LEONE, se-er'-ra le-one', or lai-o'-nai, a settlement of Western Africa, situate on the Atlantic, and distinguished for the colony formed there by the British. It consists of a peninsula, 18 miles long and 12 broad, on the coast of Senegambia. Area, about 300 square miles. Desc. The name is derived from a long ridge of mountains, which rise at no great distance from the southern bank of the river. The country fully equals, in point of fertility, any other in this part of Africa. It consists generally of one vast, almost impenetrable forest, only particular spots of which have been cleared and cultivated. Rivers. The Sierra Leone. Zoology. The woods and mountains are infested with wild animals, particularly lions, from the multitude of which the country appears to have derived its name. Apes move about in vast bodies. There are also swarms of flies, mosquitoes, and particularly ants, the white species of which commit extraordinary ravages. Reptiles are also very numerous. The rivers, besides yielding an ample supply of fish for food, contain large alligators. Climate. Exceedingly unhealthy. Pro. Rice is raised wherever the ground is sufficiently watered for its production, and forms the constant food of the rich; but the poor content themselves with millet, yams, and plantains. There is great abundance of the most delicate fruits. Exp. Teak timber, canewood, palm-oil, ginger, and small quantities of hides, ivory, rice, pepper, and copal. Gov. Political authority is vested in a governor appointed by the crown, a council of five official members, and in acts of the British parliament. Pop. about 55,000, mostly blacks, and many liberated negroes from slave-ships. Lat. of Cape Sierra Leone, 8° 30′ N. Lon. 13° 18′ W.—The Portuguese were the first who discovered and formed settlements on the river Sierra Leone; but afterwards all the nations of Europe found their way here. It was not till towards the close of the 18th century, however, that the British began to turn their views towards it, with a view to the more effectual abolition of the slave-trade, by raising up an African colony, to which the slaves might be sent as freemen. A piece of ground was accordingly purchased in 1787, since which time it has been maintained to aid in the suppression of the slave-trade.

SIEYES, Emmanuel Joseph, Count, se'-ai, usually styled the "Abbé Sièyes," a celebrated French political philosopher and consul of France. Educated for the ecclesiastical profession, he rose to the position of vicar-general and chancellor of the diocese of Chartres. But, from an early period of his life, his mind was strongly disposed towards the study of political economy; and, some time before the revolution of 1789, he evinced his participation in those ideas which were to prove the destruction of the monarchy and government. When Louis XVI. summoned the states-general, Sièyes produced three pamphlets upon the questions of the day, which were read with avidity, and were the means of making a political celebrity of their author. He was elected deputy for Paris; and, upon the refusal of the nobility and clergy to unite with the "Tiers Etat," he boldly counselled the people's representatives to form themselves into an independent body. The National Assembly thus sprang into existence. In the subsequent proceedings, which resulted in the Revolution, Sièyes played a prominent and energetic part. It would appear, however, that he did not fully comprehend the alarming tendencies of the innovations of which he had been so eloquent an advocate; for, on expressing his disapprobation of some of the Assembly's decrees, Mirabeau replied to him, "You have unloosed the bull, and you complain that it gores you." In 1791 he was offered, but refused, the appointment of constitutional bishop of Paris. During his lifetime, and, indeed, until quite recently, he had lain under the stigma of pronouncing himself for the death of Louis XVI., with the sarcasm, "La mort sans phrase" (Death without phrases). It has been proved, however, that, although he was among those who voted for the death of the French monarch, he did so in silence. During the Reign of Terror, he prudently retired from the capital; and, when afterwards asked what had been his conduct in that terrible interval, he replied, "I have lived." At the death of Robespierre, he reappeared and regained his former high position. An attempt to assassinate him was made in 1797, by the Abbé Poule; but he escaped with a shattered hand. He maintained his imperturbability, however, and quietly said to his servants, "If M. Poule should return, inform him that I am not at home." In the following year he was sent to Berlin, to negotiate a treaty of alliance between France and Prussia, but without success. He became a member of the Directory upon his return. Growing more powerful every day, he was nevertheless an object of the deepest hatred with the ultra-republican party. To strengthen himself against these enemies, he entered into his famous alliance with General Bonaparte. After the revolution of the 18th Brumaire, he was appointed consul, with Bonaparte and Roger Ducos. But the ambitious Corsican soon eclipsed Sièyes, who, accustomed to command, could not obey, and consequently tendered his resignation in 1799. He retired with a reward of 600,000 francs, a grant of land, and a mansion in Paris. He was subsequently offered the presidentship of the senate, under the empire, but refused the honour, accepting, however, the title of count. When the Bourbons were restored, Sièyes was exiled; and although he returned to France after the revolution of 1830, he continued to live in retirement. Dumont thus speaks of him:—"His manner was neither frank nor engaging: he was a man with whom it was difficult to become intimate. . . . I imagined that this friend of liberty had necessarily a liking for the English nation, and, the subject being familiar with me, I introduced it to him; but I discovered, to my surprise, that in his eyes the whole English constitution was a piece of mere charlatanry. . . In a word, it was manifest that he regarded the English but as children in the art of framing a constitution, and that he deemed himself capable of giving a much better one to France." Indeed, this political philosopher was wont to declare, that "the art of government was a science which he considered he had brought to perfection." He wrote a number of political works, the most important of which were, "Political Opinions," an "Exposition of the Rights of Man," and "The Preliminary Bases of a Constitution." B. at Frejus, 1748; D. at Paris, 1836.

SIGAUD DE LAFOND, Jean Réné, an eminent French surgeon, who made several important discoveries in his profession, and wrote some valuable works upon natural philosophy, the chief of which were,—"Lessons in Experimental Physics," and "Dictionary of Physics." B. at Dijon, 1740; D. 1810.

SIGEBERT I., sig'-bert, or seezh'-bair, third son of Clotaire, who became, in 561, king of Austrasia. He made war upon Chilperic, king of Neustria, and overran a great part of his kingdom, but was assassinated in 575, by Fredegonde, wife of Chilperic.

SIGEBERT II., second son of Dagobert I., king of Austrasia, but resiged the direction of affairs to Bishop Cunibert and others. He founded a number of monasteries, and devoted his life to religious duties. His son Dagobert was supplanted by Childebert II. Sigebert is set down as a saint in the Romish calendar.

SIGEBERT, king of the East Angles, is celebrated by Bede as a man of learning and piety. He founded several churches, monasteries, and schools. After abdicating the throne, he became a monk at Burgh Castle, in Suffolk, where he was assassinated, 642.

SIGISMUND, sig'-is-mund, emperor of Germany, was the son of Charles IV. He was crowned king of Hungary in 1386, and elected emperor in 1410. After establishing several constitutional regulations for restoring the peace of the empire, he set about effecting the tranquillity of the Church; for which purpose he prevailed with Pope John XXIII. to convene the council of Constance in 1414; but he tarnished his character by granting a safe-conduct to John Huss to attend that council, and afterwards suffering him to be executed in violation of it. The Hussites, irritated at this want of faith, rose under the famous Zisca, and gained many advantages over the German forces, and they were not reduced till sixteen years afterwards. He sold Brandenburg to Frederick, burgrave of Nürnberg, whom he also created elector. Thus was the foundation of the kingdom of Prussia. B. 1366; D. at Znaym, Moravia, 1437.

SIGISMUND I., king of Poland, surnamed the Great, was the son of Casimir IV., and elected to the throne in 1506. He employed the first years of his reign in reforming public abuses, and in re-establishing the finances of his kingdom, which had been much disorganized by his prodigal predecessor Alexander. He drove the Muscovites out of Lithuania, recovered several places from the Teutonic Knights, and expelled the Wallachians, who had invaded his territories. B. 1466; D. 1548.

SIGISMUND II., surnamed Augustus, son and successor of the preceding. During his reign, Livonia was acquired, and the union of Lithuania and Poland effected. B. 1520; D. 1572.

SIGISMUND III. was the son of John III., king of Sweden, and ascended the throne of Poland in 1587, to the exclusion of Maximilian of Austria, who had been elected by the nobility. On the death of his father, he succeeded to the Swedish crown in 1594; but being a zealous Catholic, the Swedes acknowledged his uncle, Charles, duke of Sudermania, who was crowned in 1604. A long war ensued, in which Sigismund was unsuccessful. Muscovy being in a very distracted condition, he dispatched an army into that country, and was at first completely victorious. His son Vladislas was placed upon the throne; but, through the impolitic measures of Sigismund, the Polish prince was driven from Moscow, Michael Romanoff being elected, to the prejudice of Vladislas. He was a bigoted Roman Catholic, and entirely under the control of the Jesuits. B. 1566; D. 1632.

SIGMARINGEN, sig-ma-ring'-en, a town of Prussia, and which, till 1849, was the capital of Hohenzollern-Sigmaringen. It is distant about 30 miles from Constance, and is inclosed by walls, and has a castle. Pop. 2,000.

SIGNA, seen-ga, a town of Tuscany, 8 miles from Florence. Manf. Straw bonnets. Pop. 5,500.

SIGNY, seen'-ye, the name of several towns in France, none of them, however, with a population above 3,200.

SIGONI, Charles, se-go'-ne, an Italian historian and classicist, whose principal works are—an Ecclesiastical History, a number of works upon Rome, history, and antiquities, and the History of the Middle Ages. B. at Modena, about 1520; D. 1584.

SIGOURNEY, Mrs. Lydia Huntley, se-goor'-ne, an American poetess and writer, who made her first appearance as an authoress 1815, with the publication of a volume entitled "Moral Pieces in Prose and Verse." She became the wife of Mr. Sigourney, an American merchant, in 1819, and, three years afterwards, produced her best poem, "The Aborigines of America." She made a tour in Europe in 1840, and resided for some time in England. An interesting narrative of her travels was published in 1842, after her return to America, under the title of "Pleasant Memories of Pleasant Lands." She has been termed the Hemans of America. B. at Norwich, Connecticut, 1791.

SIGUENZA, se-gwain'-tha, anciently Segontium, a city of Spain, 75 miles from Madrid. It contains several churches, convents, two hospitals, a castle, and an arsenal. In the environs are salt springs. Pop. 5,000.

SIKE, or SIECKE, Henry, seek, an eminent Dutch Orientalist, who became a professor of Oriental languages, first at Utrecht, and later at Cambridge. He edited an apocryphal gospel, entitled "Evangelium Infantiæ Christi, adscriptum Thomæ." Lived at the beginning of the 18th century.

SIKHS, seeks, a warlike race of India, who commenced their career as a religious sect, adopting a kind of combination of the Mahometan and Hindoo creeds. Their dispositions were originally mild, abstracted, and almost philosophic; but persecution, and a cruel death inflicted on two of their chiefs, roused them into fury, and changed them into a race of desperate warriors. While the Mogul power, however, continued in its vigour, they could avenge their wrongs only by hasty and stolen ravages, after which, like the Scottish Highlanders, they sought the recesses of the northern mountains. The seat of their power was principally in Lahore or the Punjab. They attained to their highest pitch of power under Runjeet Singh (see RUNJEET SINGH); but, after a series of sanguinary conflicts with the British, their territories were definitively annexed to the English East-India possessions in 1849.

SIKINOS, se-ke'-nos, an island of the Greek archipelago, 20 miles from Santorin. Area, 17 square miles. Pro. Wine, figs, cotton, and the best wheat of the Cyclades. Pop. 300.

SIKKIM, sik'-kim, a N.E. state of Hindostan, with an area of 4,400 square miles and a population of 170,000. Lat. between 26° 40' and 28° N. Lon. 88° E.

SIKOKE, se-koke', the smallest of the four principal islands of Japan, lying to the S. of Niphon. Area, 17,200 square miles. Pop. Unascertained.

SILCHESTER, sil'-ches-ter, a parish of Hants, 7 miles from Basingstoke.—Here are the remains of the ancient Segontiacum, where, in 407, the usurper Constantine was invested with the purple. In 493 it was destroyed by the South Saxons.

SILENUS, si-le'-nus, a demigod, who became the nurse, preceptor, and attendant of the god Bacchus. He was, as some suppose, son of Pan, or, according to others, of Mercury. Malea, in Lesbos, was the place of his birth. After death he received divine honours, and had a temple in Elis. Silenus is generally represented as a fat and jolly old man, riding on an ass, crowned with flowers, and always intoxicated.

SILESIA, si-le'-shi-a, a large province of Prussia, situate between Poland on the E., Bohemia on the W., Austrian Silesia on the S., and Prussian Poland on the N. Area, 15,762 square miles. Desc. In the S. and S.W. it is mountainous; a long range, bearing different names, such as the Riesengebirge, the Glatz Mountains, Moravian Mountains, &c., but all included in the Sudetic chain, dividing it from Bohemia and Moravia. From Hungary it is separated by the Carpathians. In other parts it is slightly undulating. Rivers. The Oder, which, flowing from south to north, traverses it nearly in the middle, and receives the Bober, the two Neisses, the Malapane, and the Bartsch. Forests. Extensive. Zoology. Foxes and other beasts of game abound in the forests; the lynx is sometimes found in the mountains, as well as the beaver; but the latter is now rare. Pro. Corn, hemp, flax, beet-root sugar, madder, and tobacco. About 2,000,000 of sheep are reared, and excellent wool produced. Minerals. Lead, zinc, coal, iron, copper, vitriol, and cobalt. Manf. Cotton and linen fabrics, coarse woollen cloth, and hardwares. Cotton-works date only from the latter part of the 18th century, and hardware has been made extensively only within the same period. Of tanneries, there are a few. Imp. Hemp, linseed, and hides from Russia; wine, potash, and hardware from Austria; colonial produce, silk, and the fruits of southern climates, from different countries, all, or almost all, conveyed by the Oder. Pop. 3,100,000, chiefly Lutherans and Roman Catholics. Silesia was taken possession of by Frederick of Prussia in 1740, and gave occasion to a long and bloody war, begun in the year 1756, when the peace of Hubertsburg, in 1763, left it conclusively in the hands of Frederick. In 1807 it was overrun by the French, but it was not separated, at the peace of Tilsit, from the Prussian territory.

SILESIA, AUSTRIAN, that part of Silesia which was retained by Austria in 1742, when the province described in the foregoing article was ceded to Prussia. Area, 1,845 square miles. It is divided into the circles of Troppau and Teschen, and is now completely incorporated with Moravia. (See MORAVIA.)

SILHET, sil'-het, a district of British India, in the presidency of Bengal, lying on the east side of the Brahmapootra river, and constituting the north-east boundary of Bengal. Area, 3,532 square miles. Desc. Generally uneven and rugged in the N. and S.; marshy in the W. Rearing cattle is the principal occupation of the inhabitants. Pop. 390,000. Lat. between 24° 23′ and 25° 12′ N. Lon. between 91° and 92° 38′ E. Also the name of a town 260 miles from Calcutta. Pop. Unascertained. This is the head-quarters of the Bengal army for the E. division.

SILHOUETTE, Stephen de, sil'-oo-et, a French writer, who, after being master of requests to the duke of Orleans, became comptroller-general of the finances in 1757, but continued in office only eight months, owing to the failure of his schemes of reform and economy, which were turned into ridicule. His most important works were,—"General Idea of the Chinese Government;" "Political Reflections, translated from the Spanish of Gracian;" and translations of Pope's "Essay on Man" and Warburton's "Alliance of Church and State." During his short ministry, his name was much in vogue, and was given to a mode of producing likenesses from the shadow of the face, a practice much in use in his day. B. at Limoges, 1709; D. 1767.

SILISTRIA, or DRISTRA, si-lis'-tre-a, a town of European Turkey, in Bulgaria, on the Danube, 58 miles from Shumla. It is well fortified, tolerably built, and has several handsome mosques and baths. Pop. 24,000. In 1854 this place was besieged by the Russians, who, after sustaining a great loss of men, were forced to abandon all hopes of taking it. The success of the Turks was owing, in a great measure, to the assistance of two Englishmen, Nasmyth and Butler.

SILIUS ITALICUS, Caius, sil'-i-us i-tal'-i-kus, a Latin poet, who was consul in the last year of Nero's reign, and afterwards governor of the province of Asia. He is said to have become the owner of the villas of Cicero and Virgil. He wrote a poem upon the second Punic war, entitled "Punica," which, it is said, was discovered by Poggio Bracciolini, in the monastery of St. Gallen, in Switzerland. The best edition is that of Ruperti, Gottingen, 1798. B. about 25; D. 100.

SILVA, John Baptist, sil'-va, a French physician, who was of Jewish parents, but renounced his religion, and, after taking his degree at Montpellier, settled at Paris, where he gained a great reputation by his skill, and became physician to Louis XV. He wrote a "Treatise on the Use of Bleeding." B. at Bordeaux, 1682; D. 1748.

SILVA Y PIGUERON, Garcia de, a Spanish diplomatist and writer, who was at first a page to Philip II., and afterwards distinguished himself in the Spanish army in Flanders. In 1624 he was dispatched upon an embassy to Shah Abbas, king of Persia. He wrote an account of his travels, which was never published in the original Spanish; but a French translation of the work was produced in 1667, under the title of "The Embassy of Don Garcia de Silva y Pigueron into Persia." He also wrote an abridged History of Spain, and a short account of his travels, in a letter to the Marquis de Bedmar, which was published at Antwerp in 1620. B. at Badajoz, 1574; D. in Spain, 1628.

SILVESTER I., Pope, sil-ves'-ter, was elected in 314. The Arian heresy commenced in his pontificate, and he distinguished himself against the Donatists. D. 336.

SILVESTER II. was at first a monk in Auvergne; but his superior talents exciting the envy and hatred of his companions, he withdrew from the monastery and went to Spain. The duke of Barcelona took him to Italy, where he was noticed by the emperor Otho, who gave him an abbey, which he afterwards quitted, and, proceeding to Germany, became preceptor to Otho III. He was afterwards tutor to the son of Hugh Capet, by whom he was made archbishop of Rheims. By the interest of Otho, he gained the papacy in 999. He was a man of considerable learning, particularly in the mathematical sciences. D. 1003.

SIMANCAS, se-man'-kas, a town of Spain, in the province of Valladolid, 10 miles from Valladolid. Pop. 1,000.—In the fortress of this place the archives of Castile are kept.

SIMAND, se'-mand, a market-town of Hungary, 20 miles from Arad. Pop. 5,000.

SIMBIRSK, sim-beersk', a government of European Russia, on the borders of Asia. It lies along both sides of the Volga, having the government of Kasan on the north, and that of Saratov on the south. Area, 28,000 square miles. Desc. Undulating and fertile. Rivers. The Volga and the Sura, with their affluents. Pro. Wheat, buckwheat, oats, pease, tobacco, poppies, flax, and hemp. Cattle-rearing and horse-breeding are pursued. Manf. Woollens, linens, canvas, soap, leather, glass, and spirits. Pop. 1,320,000. Lat. between 52° 40′ and 55° 50′ N. Lon. between 45° 10′ and 51° 20′ E.

SIMBIRSK, the capital of the above government, is situate at the confluence of the Sviago and the Volga, 410 miles from Moscow. It contains numerous churches or chapels, and several other public buildings. The chief articles of export are corn and fish. Pop. 18,000.

SIMCOE, sim'-ko, a lake of British N. America, in Upper Canada, 40 miles from Toronto. Ext. 28 miles long, and about the same in breadth. It receives many small rivers.

SIMEON, the second son of Jacob and Leah. When he and his brethren went into Egypt to buy corn, his brother Joseph insisted on Benjamin, the youngest brother, being brought to him, and detained Simeon as a hostage for his forthcoming. He gave his name to one of the twelve tribes, which dwelt to the north of the territory occupied by the tribe of Judah. B. about 2110 B.C.

SIMEON METAPHRASTES, sim'-e-on met'-a-fras'-tees, a Greek ecclesiastical historian. He was secretary of state under Constantine Porphyrogenitus, who engaged him to write the "Lives of the Saints," which he performed. This work, which is a kind of religious romance, has been translated into Latin. Flourished in the 10th century.

SIMEON OF DURHAM, an English historian, who taught mathematics at Oxford, and was subsequently precentor in Durham Cathedral. He proceeded a history of the kings of England from 616 to 1130, the materials for which he collected in the north of England. This work was afterwards continued up to the year 1156, by John, the prior of Hexham. He also wrote a history of Durham Cathedral, under the title of "Historia Ecclesiæ Dunhelmensis," which was published in 1732. Supposed to have died about 1130.

SIMEON-SETHUS, se'-thus, a Greek author, who was the master of the wardrobe in the palace of Antiochus, at Constantinople. He was subsequently banished to Thrace by Michael the Paphlagonian. He produced a work containing a list of all eatable things, compiled from the Greek, Persian, Arabian, and Indian physicians. He also translated into Greek the fables of Pilpay, and, from the Persian, a history of Alexander the Great, which is, however, nothing else than a romance, but, according to Warton, has been translated into Latin, French, German, and Italian. Flourished towards the close of the 11th century.

SIMEON STYLITES, sti-li'-tees, the founder of a sect, was a native of Cilicia, and a shepherd till the age of 13, when he entered a monastery, after which he led a life singularly austere. He partook of food but once a week, placed himself upon a pillar (in Greek stylos), whence he acquired the name of Stylites, and his example was followed by many other devotees, who seated themselves upon pillars of different heights on a mountain in Syria, where they pretended to see visions. D. 459.

SIMETO, se-mai'-to, a river of Sicily. (See GIARRETTA.)

SIMFEROPOL, sim-fe-ro'-pol, a city of European Russia, in the Crimea, 38 miles from Sebastopol. It is the residence of all the Russian authorities in the Crimea, and has numerous minarets, domes, and bazars. Pop. 17,000.

SIMLA, sim'-la, a mountainous district of Hindostan, between the Sutlej and Giree rivers. Pop. 371,000.

SIMLA, a town in the above district. Pop. Unascertained.

SIMMERING, sim'-me-ring, a village of Lower Austria, 2 miles from Vienna. Manf. Chemicals and bronze articles. Pop. 2,500.

SIMMIAS, sim'-mi-ăs, a philosopher of Thebes, who was a friend of Socrates, and is one of the speakers in the "Phædon" of Plato. None of his works are extant.

SIMMIAS, a grammarian of Rhodes, who wrote a work upon languages, and some poems, which are included in the "Anthologia Græca." Flourished about B.C. 300.

SIMNEL, Lambert, sim'-nel, an impostor, who was the son of a joiner at Oxford, and was set up as Edward Plantagenet, earl of Warwick, son of the duke of Clarence, and heir to the English throne. He succeeded in gathering together a considerable number of adherents, who were defeated by Henry VII., at Stoke, in 1187. Simnel was subsequently employed as a turnspit in the royal kitchen.

SIMON, si'-mon, called the brother of our Lord, was the son of Cleophas, and elected bishop of Jerusalem, after the death of St. James, A.D. 62. In the reign of Trajan he was put to death by being crucified, in 107.

SIMON, Richard, an erudite French divine. He was a profoundly learned man, but entertained very free opinions, and had many antagonists. His principal works were—the "Ceremonies and Customs of the Jews," "Critical History of the Old Testament," "Critical History of the Text of the New Testament," "Critical History of the Versions of the New Testament, and of the principal Commentaries thereon;" a French translation of the New Testament, with literal and critical notes; and "History of the Origin and Progress of Ecclesiastical Revenues." B. at Dieppe, 1638; D. at the same place, 1712.

SIMON MACCABEUS. (See MACCABEUS.)

SIMON MAGUS, or the Magician, an heresiarch, who is supposed to have been the founder of the Gnostic sect. He was a native of Samaria, and perceiving the miracles wrought by Philip the Deacon, he was baptized; but, on offering money to the apostles that he might receive the Holy Ghost, or the gift of tongues, and of working miracles, he was excommunicated by St. Peter. It is from this circumstance that the term Simoniac is applied to such as purchase spiritual things. He afterwards fell into the grossest errors, and maintained that God has left the world to be governed by certain beings called Æons. The story of his acquiring a reputation at Rome by his pretended miracles, and falling from a great height in the air, in consequence of the prayers of St. Peter and St. Paul, is a mere fable.

SIMON, St., an apostle of Jesus Christ, was called Zealotes. He preached the gospel in Egypt, Libya, and Mauritania, and suffered martyrdom in Persia.

SIMON, ST. (See SAINT-SIMON.)

SIMONIDES, si-mon'-i-dees, a Greek philosopher and poet, whose compositions were principally elegiac, and particularly excellent. Fragments of his poems were published by Schneidewin, Brunswick, 1835. B. in the island of Ceos, about 556 B.C.; D. at Syracuse, 467 B.C.

SIMONIDES OF AMORGAS, a Greek poet, who wrote satires upon individuals, fragments of which have been preserved, and also a satire upon women, which is extant. Flourished in the 7th century B.C.

SIMOUR, se-moor', a hill state of India. Area, 1,000 square miles. Pop. 62,000. Lat. between 30° 25′ and 31° 2′ N. Lon. between 77° 50′ and 77° 53′ E.

SIMPLICIUS, sim-plish'-i-us, a Greek philosopher, who wrote commentaries upon Aristotle and Epictetus. Flourished in the 5th century.

SIMPLON, or SIMPELN, sim'-plawng, a mountain in the south of Switzerland, separating the canton called the Valais from the Piedmontese territory. The old road across it being impracticable for heavy carriages, a new one, called the "Route of the Simplon," was formed by order of Napoleon I., at the joint expense of France and the kingdom of Italy. Though the ascent is everywhere gradual, the highest point of the road is nearly 6,600 feet above the level of the sea. The length is 38 miles, and the width between 25 and 30 feet. It is carried through several tunnels, over upwards of 600 bridges, and has twenty station-houses for travellers. On the Sardinian side it is now nearly impassable.

SIMPSON, Sir James, simp'-son, a British general, who entered the army in his 19th year, and took part in the Spanish campaign of 1812. Promoted to the rank of captain in 1813, he was seriously wounded at the battle of Quatre Bras. He subsequently served in Ireland, and held the command-in-chief in the Mauritius, evincing on all occasions the qualities of an intelligent and zealous soldier. In 1842 he was second in command under Sir Charles James Napier, and distinguished himself in the battles of Meanee and Hyderabad. In 1846 he was appointed to the command at Chatham. In May, 1855, Sir James, who had been for some time major-general, was nominated chief of the staff in the Crimean army, under Lord Raglan, at whose death he succeeded to the command-in-chief; but, after the repulse at the Redan, he resigned his command to Sir W. Codrington. He was, however, created G.C.B. and grand cross of the Legion of Honour. B. at Edinburgh, 1792.

SIMPSON, Dr. James Young, an eminent modern physician, who, after practising his profession with considerable success, acquired a high reputation through having employed sulphuric ether, and afterwards chloroform, as an anæsthetic agent. He was triumph of science over physical suffering, he was rewarded with a prize of 2,000 francs from the Paris Academy of Sciences, and was elected a member of the learned societies both in England and upon the continent of Europe. His scientific knowledge was both various and profound, as will be perceived by the enumeration of such works as "Antiquarian Notes upon Leprosy," "Ancient Roman Medicine Stamps," "Was the Roman Army provided with Medical Officers?" and "Notes on some Ancient Vases for containing Lykion, &c." He was physician-accoucheur in Scotland to her Majesty Queen Victoria. B. at Bathgate, Linlithgow, 1811.

SIMPSON, Thomas, an eminent English mathematician. His parents were too poor to give him an education, and he was, when very young, placed at the loom as a weaver. From a travelling pedlar he gained some knowledge of arithmetic and astrology, to which he soon afterwards added geometry and algebra. He supported himself by exercising the combined occupations of schoolmaster and weaver until 1735, when he repaired to London, and worked for some time in Spitalfields, employing his leisure hours in study, and also in teaching others. So great was his progress, that, in 1737, he published his excellent "Treatise on Fluxions," which brought him into considerable notice. In 1740 appeared his book entitled "A Treatise on the Nature and Laws of Chance," which occasioned a dispute between himself and Le Moivre. In 1743 he was appointed professor of mathematics at the Royal Military Academy of Woolwich. He was also elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and a member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris. Besides the preceding works, he wrote the "Elements of Algebra and Geometry," "Select Exercises in Mathematics," and some Miscellaneous Tracts, in which important work he solved many of the most difficult problems in astronomy. B. at Market-Bosworth, Leicestershire, 1710; D. at the same town, 1761.

SIMROCH, Charles, sim'-rok, an eminent modern German writer, who produced poems, ballads, and romances, and fulfilled the functions of professor of German language and literature at the university of Bonn. His principal works were, "The Picturesque and Romantic Rhineland," and "Sources of Shakspere's Plots, in Novels, Tales, and Legends." D. at Bonn, 1802.

SIMSON, Dr. Robert, sim'-son, an eminent Scotch mathematician, who was sent, in his 14th year, to the university of Glasgow, where he rapidly acquired an extensive knowledge of the learned languages and mathematics. In 1710 he went to London, and there made the acquaintance of Dr. Halley and Mr. Ditton, the mathematical master of Christ's Hospital, from the conversation of both of whom Simson's knowledge of mathematics was greatly enlarged. He obtained the professorship of mathematics in the university of Glasgow in 1711, and retained that office during the subsequent fifty years. His most important works were a corrected edition of Euclid's Elements of Geometry, which has become the standard text of the ancient geometer; a "Treatise on Conic Sections," and a restoration of Euclid's "Porisms." Dr. Simson was one of the most profound of the British geometers. B. in Ayrshire, 1687; D. 1768.

SIMS REEVES, J., simz reevz, an eminent modern English vocalist, who was the son of a musician, and from an early period gave unmistakable indications of musical genius. In his 14th year he could perform upon several instruments, and his musical knowledge was so extensive, that even at that early age he was appointed organist and director of the choir at the church of North Cray, in Kent. Having discovered that he had a voice of good quality and extensive range, he took lessons from a professor of singing, and in his 19th year made his appearance at Newcastle, in the barytone parts of Rudolpho in the "Somnambula," and of Dandini in "Cenerentola." After a highly successful career in the provinces, he repaired to Italy for the purpose of perfecting himself in his art. He studied under Mazzucato at Milan, and afterwards appeared at La Scala as Edgardo, in "Lucia di Lammermoor," with great success. At the other great Italian theatres, he was also received with the warmest approbation. In 1847 he made his début at Drury-Lane theatre, in the part of Edgardo, and was immediately recognized as the best of English tenors. His reputation increased constantly till he came to be regarded by the general mass of the public as the greatest vocalist of his time. B. at Woolwich, 1821.

SINAI, si'-ni, or si'-nā-i, a mountain of Arabia, near the head of the Red Sea, celebrated in Scripture history as that on which the law was given to Moses. It is situate in the heart of a vast and dreary desert, the few inhabited spots of which are occupied by hordes of Arabs, who subsist by plunder, and render the road impassable, except for a large and well-defended caravan; but the range to which Sinai belongs is called by the Arabs Jibbel Musa, and consists of several lofty summits, of which Mount Horeb forms a part of the N. end. On its N.E. side is the fortified convent of Sinai, now tenanted by about twenty Greek monks. Height, 7,497 feet above the level of the sea.

SINGAPORE, or SINGAPORE, sin-ga-por', an island, with a town of the same name, near the south coast of Malacca, which gives name to the narrow sea called the Straits of Singapore. Ext. 27 miles long and 11 broad. Area, 275 square miles. Desc. Low, undulating, and densely wooded. Pro. Fine fruits, coffee, nutmegs, pepper, and catechu. These are exported with birds-nests, seaweed, and tortoise-shell. Manf. Arms and agricultural implements. Pop. 60,000. Lat. 1° 17′ N. Lon. 103° 50′ E.—The TOWN was settled by the British in 1819, and has risen to considerable importance. It has several churches and an Anglo-Indian college.

SINCLAIR, Sir John, sin'-klair, a learned Scotch author, who was educated for the legal profession, and became a member of the English bar and of the Faculty of Advocates in Scotland. He also sat in parliament and at the board of privy council. In 1791 he formed a society for improving wool, and subsequently contributed to the establishment of the Board of Agriculture in Scotland. He was an industrious writer, and, during fifty years, composed a large number of works; the most important of which were,—"A Statistical Account of Scotland;" "History of the Revenue of Great Britain;" and "An Account of the Northern Districts of Scotland." B. at Thurso Castle, Caithness, 1754; D. at Edinburgh, 1835.

SINCLAIR, Miss Catherine, a modern Scotch authoress, and the daughter of the preceding, whose biography she wrote. She produced a number of novels and miscellaneous works, the most important of which were,—"Modern Accomplishments;" "Modern Society;" "The Journey of Life;" "Modern Flirtations;" "Beatrice;" "A Tour in Wales;" "Scotland and the Scotch;" "Shetland and the Shetlanders;" and some books for juvenile reading. B. 1800.

SINDE, or SCINDE, sind, an extensive country of Hindostan, formerly included in that of Moultan, and situate on both sides of the river Indus, and now included in the presidency of Bombay. Area, 52,100 square miles. Desc. This country bears a striking resemblance to Egypt, consisting, as it does, of a level plain, with the Indus fertilizing the banks as far as the inundation extends, and afterwards becoming a sandy desert, beyond which rises a range of barren mountains. Notwithstanding this, however, it is far inferior to Egypt in point of fertility. The upper part of the country is the most productive, being watered by means of canals. The islands in the delta of the Indus are composed of sand, and are covered with a prickly shrub, very nourishing to camels; on which account a great number are bred in this district. Rivers. The Indus. Pro. Rice, wheat, barley, millet, opium, maize, indigo, sugar, cotton, pulse, and esculent vegetables. The fruits common to S. Europe are produced, with dates and plantains. The cultivation depends on the proper management of the irrigation, by means of canals and drains from the river, from which the water is frequently raised by wheels. The pasture-lands are extensive. The principal trees are banyans, palms, mangroves, and mimosas. Zoology. Camels, buffaloes, goats, sheep, horses, and asses, are the domestic animals; the wild are tigers, hyenas, wolves, and other formidable beasts of prey; and alligators abound in the pools of the delta. Manf. Coarse cloth, felt, leather, arms, cotton, silk and embroidered fabrics, and earthenware. Exp. Rice, butter, potash, hides, saltpetre, asafœtida, frankincense, indigo, horses, and camels. Imp. Sugar-candy, spices, pepper, cocoanuts, ivory, metals of all kinds, Bengal and China silks, porcelain, pearls, timber, and dried fruits. The principal port is Kurrachee, at the mouth of the Indus. Religion. Mahometanism, mostly of the Soony sect, especially the lower classes; the higher, or ameers, are of the Shiah sect. The former rulers of Sinde were the ameers, who exercised a kind of oligarchic military despotism, but did not maintain a standing army. Their subjects were divided into tribes, who held their lands on a military tenure, and were obliged to furnish a certain number of cavalry when called on; by which means a numerous army was shortly collected. They had also a considerable number of fortresses dispersed throughout the country, and garrisoned by local troops. Pop. 1,100,000. Lat. between 23° 30′ and 28° 32′ N. Lon.

between 66° 43′ and 71° 3′ E.—Of the ancient history of Sinde little is known. About the middle of the 6th century it was invaded by the Persians, and was the scene of many revolutions and of great anarchy. It was invaded from Delhi, and long continued to pay tribute to the Mogul. In 1739 all the territories west of the river Indus were ceded by the emperor Mohammed Shah to the Persian usurper Nadir Shah. The assassination of that person, in the year 1747, liberated the rulers of Sinde from their allegiance to Persia, and they again nominally professed themselves subjects of the court of Delhi. In the year 1786 the Sindian chiefs acknowledged themselves feudatories of Cabul, and agreed to pay an annual tribute, while the Shah issued a commission to Futteh Ali and his three brothers, constituting them ameers or rulers of Sinde, on his behalf. In 1808 the Bombay government sent an embassy to the ameers of Sinde, and a native agent, or chargé d'affaires, resided at Hyderabad on the part of the East-India Company. In 1841 they were defeated by Sir Charles Napier, and the country made a dependency of the British empire.

SINDE. (See INDUS.)

SINDE, a river of Hindostan, in the province of Malwa, which, after a winding course of 250 miles, falls into the Jumna 25 miles from Etawah.

SINDIAH, sin'-di-a, the name of a celebrated family of Mahratta chieftains, the most distinguished of whom were:—Sindiah Ranojee, who was at first bearer of the slippers to the Peishwa Bajerow. Being one day found asleep by his master, with the slippers tightly clasped to his breast, his fidelity was rewarded with a post in the body-guard. From that time he rose rapidly, and obtained the government of hali the province of Malwa.

SINDIAH, Madhajee, was son of the preceding, and, from an early age, followed the profession of arms. Profiting by the weakness of the Mogul emperor Shah Alim II., he became the master of Delhi in 1771, and subsequently conquered Agra, Allyghur, and almost the whole of the Doab. He engaged in his service several French officers, the most distinguished of whom, the Count de Boigne, introduced a regular system of discipline into his army. After a series of contests, Sindiah gained possession of a vast tract of territory lying to the south-west of the river Ganges, and as far as the Nerbudda. Sindiah's rule was exceedingly mild and just for an Asiatic prince, and throughout his ambitious career, he displayed the most complete contempt for all the forms of Eastern luxury. B. about 1743; D. at Poonah, 1794.

SINDIAH, Dowlut Row, grand-nephew of the preceding, who appointed him his heir. He commenced his reign in his 13th year, and, under the influence of his father-in-law, he evinced himself a rapacious and sanguinary prince. In 1803 the British declared war against him; the fortress of Ahmednuggur was taken; while, at Assaye, Major-General Wellesley totally defeated his forces and those of his ally the rajah of Berar. General Lake also routed his army in several encounters; whereupon Sindiah was driven to purchase a peace at the cost of the cession of 50,000 square miles of territory. His army of 40,000 men, trained by De Boigne, was destroyed, and 500 pieces of artillery were taken from him. He never again ventured to make a direct attack upon the British; so that, when the power of the Mahratta chiefs was entirely broken up, in 1818, he was the only one of them allowed to retain territory. B. 1781; D. 1827.

SINGBHOOM, sing'-loom, the capital of a district of the same name, in Hindostan, province of Orissa. Lat. 22° 37′ N. Lon. 85° 55′ E.—The British part of the DISTRICT has an area of 2,944 square miles and a population of 200,000.

SINGLETON, Henry, sin'-gel-ton, an English historical painter, whose facility of execution and readiness of invention were very great. West said of him, "Propose to Singleton a subject, and it will be on canvas in five or six hours." He was extensively employed by print-publishers, and many of his historical designs were highly popular in their day. He was a regular exhibitor at the Royal Academy for upwards of fifty years, but he never rose to the honours of a Royal Academician. His best works were,—"Hannibal swearing Enmity to the Romans;" "The Storming of Seringapatam;" "The Death of Tippoo Saib," and "The Surrender of Tippoo's Sons;" "Coriolanus and his Mother;" and "Christ entering Jerusalem." B. in London, 1766; D. 1839.

SING-SING, sing'-sing', a village and landing-place of the United States, in West Chester county, New York, on the Hudson, 36 miles from New York. Pop. 3,000. —Here is the principal prison of the state.

SINIGAGLIA, sin-e-gal'-ye-a, a well-built town of Italy, in the States of the Church, on the Misa, at its influx into the Adriatic, 16 miles from Ancona. Its cathedral is of the Corinthian order, and some other churches are admired on account of their architecture. The principal source of its wealth is a well-frequented fair, held annually in July. Pop. 9,000.

SINOPE, or SINOOB, si-no'-pe, or sin-oob', a seaport on the northern coast of the Black Sea, 75 miles from Samsoun. It has a naval arsenal and a building-yard, with a trade in salt, fish, oil, and cordage. Pop. about 9,000. The place was bombarded by the Russians in 1853, when a Turkish squadron of thirteen ships, lying in the roadstead, was destroyed by the Russian fleet. On this occasion 4,000 Turks perished.—Diogenes was born here.

SIOUT. (See SIUT.)

SIPHANTO, se-fan'-to, an island of the Greek Archipelago, situate to the west of Paros. Area, 34 square miles. Desc. Fertile; producing corn, silk, figs, wax, and honey. Pop. 7,000.

SIRGOOJAH, seer-goo-ja', capital of a district of British India, about 12 miles from the British frontier. Lat. 23° 5′ N. Lon. 83° 50′ E.—The DISTRICT has an area of 5,410 square miles and a population of 320,000.

SIRHIND, sir-hind', a territorial division of India, between the Jumna and the Sutlej. Area, 17,000 square miles. It is well watered by artificial means. Lat. between 29° 3′ and 31° 24′ N. Lon. between 73° 50′ and 77° 39′ E.

SIRI, Vittoro, se'-re, an Italian monk, who settled at Paris, where he was taken into favour by Louis XIV. and permitted to publish a journal entitled "Mercurio Politico," in which he gave the contemporary history of the French monarchy. The journal was continued under another title till 1670. B. at Parma, 1625; D. at Paris, 1685.

SIRINAGUR. (See SERINAGUR.)

SIRMOND, James, seer'-mawnd, a French Jesuit, who became secretary to Aquaviva, general of his order, at Rome, where he assisted Baronius in compiling his Annals. In 1613 he returned to France, and was appointed confessor to Louis XIII., which office he discharged with great reputation. He produced, among other important works, an edition of the Councils of France, editions of the works of Marcellinus, Theodoret, and Hincmar; and a great number of miscellaneous pieces on theological subjects. B. at Riom, France, 1559; D. 1651.

SIRMOND, John, nephew of the preceding, was a member of the French Academy, and historiographer of France. His works are, "Life of Cardinal d'Amboise," and Latin poems. D. 1649.

SISIOUS, sis'-i-kus, succeeded Damasius I. as bishop of Rome, in 384, under the reign of Valentinian II. He wrote a condemnation of the heresies of the Donatists, Priscillianists, &c., and also composed an epistle relative to the celibacy of the clergy. D. 398.

SISIGAMBIS, or SISYGAMBIS, sis'-i-gām'-bis, the mother of Darius, the last king of Persia, was taken prisoner by Alexander the Great, at the battle of Issus, with the rest of the royal family. The conqueror treated her with so much tenderness that, on hearing of his death, she killed herself.

SISIMIUS, si-sim'-i-us, became bishop of Rome in succession to John VII., in 707. He retained the dignity only twenty days; his death taking place at the end of that period. He was succeeded by Constantine.

SISMONDI, John Charles Leonard Simonde de, sees-mone'-de, a distinguished historian, who was descended of an ancient Tuscan family, which had settled, first in France, and, after the revocation of the edict of Nantes, at Geneva. The historian received his education at the college of Geneva; but the Revolution having swept away a considerable portion of his father's property, he was compelled to enter a banking-house at Lyons. In 1793 he went to England with his family, and, while there, he studied the English language and constitution, which knowledge was of essential service to him in after-life. In 1795 he settled in Italy as a farmer, and, in the leisure left from his agricultural pursuits, he occupied himself with the composition of his "Researches upon the Constitution of Free Peoples." His first published work was, however, the "Picture of Tuscan Agriculture," which appeared at Geneva in 1801. This was succeeded by a work upon political economy, in which the views of Adam Smith were followed. In 1805 he set out upon a tour through Italy, in company with Madame de Staël, with whom he had become acquainted at Geneva. That journey turned his attention to the history of the land of his ancestors; and, accordingly, in 1807 he published his first historical work, under the title of the "Italian Republics." He also wrote Italian biographies for the "Biographie Universelle" of Michaud. His "Histoire des Français," considered to be his greatest work, was commenced in 1819, and occupied his pen till the close of his life; but in the meanwhile he gave to the world several less-important, but, nevertheless, highly valuable works; the chief of which were, "Lectures upon the Literature of the South of Europe" (translated into English by Thomas Roscoe, and published in Bohn's Standard Library); "History of the Fall of the Roman Empire and of the Decline of Civilization;" and "Studies in Social Science." B. at Geneva, 1773; D. 1842.

SISSOPOLI, or SIZEBOLI, sis-sop'-o-le, the ancient Apollonia, a town of European Turkey, in Romania, 115 miles from Constantinople. It has one of the best harbours on the Black Sea, and is mostly inhabited by Greeks. In 1829 it was taken by the Russians.

SISTERON, sis'-te-rawng, a town of France, in the department of the Lower Alps, on the Durance, 16 miles from Digne. It has a fine cathedral and a fortress, which was the prison of Casimir, king of Poland.

SISTERS, sis'-ters, the name of some small islands in the Pacific and the Indian oceans.

SISTOVA, sis-to'-va, a town of European Turkey, in Bulgaria, on the Danube, 25 miles from Nicopolis. It has a citadel garrisoned by 3,000 men. Pop. 20,000.

SISYPHUS, sis'-i-fus, the most crafty prince of the heroic ages, who, after death, was condemned in Hades to roll to the top of a hill a large stone, which had no sooner reached the summit, than it fell back into the plain; thus rendering his punishment eternal. This sentence was passed upon him in consequence of his depredations upon his neighbours' territory, and his cruelty in laying heaps of stones upon those whom he had plundered, and suffered to expire in the most agonizing torments. The institution of the Pythian games is attributed by some to Sisyphus. To be of the blood of Sisyphus was deemed disgraceful among the ancients.

SITKA, sit'-ka, an island in the Pacific Ocean, the largest of George the Third's Archipelago, lying off the W. coast of N. America. There is a Russian settlement on its W. coast, and a magnetic observatory. Lat. 57° 3′ N. Lon. 135° 18′ W.

SIUT, se-oot', a town of Upper Egypt, on the western bank of the Nile. It is the best-built town S. of Cairo. Until recently, it was the principal seat of the slave-trade in Egypt, and is still the rendezvous of the caravans proceeding from Egypt southwards into the interior of Africa, to Sennaar and Darfur. Lat. 27° 10′ 14″ N. Lon. 31° 13′ 20″ E.

SIVAS, se-vas', a city of Asia Minor, situate on the great river Kizil Irmak, 60 miles from Tokat. It has many mosques, and bazars well supplied with goods. Manf. Coarse woollens and other fabrics.

SIVAS, or ROUM, a pashalic of Asiatic Turkey, comprising portions of Asia Minor and Turkish Armenia. It produces wheat, maize, barley, hemp, silk, cotton, tobacco, fruits, honey, copper, lead, iron, and marble. Pop. Unascertained.

SIWAH, or SIOUAH, se-wa', a considerable oasis, or fertile island, in the Libyan desert, on the route from Egypt to Fezzan. This valley is described by Horneman as 50 miles in circumference, hemmed in on every side by barren rocks. Its capital is constructed of fossil salt, the houses being grouped round a rock. Near it is the village of Gharmy, with ruins of the temple of Jupiter Ammon.

SIXTUS I., six'-tus, Pope, and successor of Alexander I. about the commencement of the 2nd century.

SIXTUS II. was the successor of Stephen I. He is stated to have been an Athenian and a pagan philosopher before his conversion to Christianity. He was one of those who suffered martyrdom in the persecution of the Christians by Valerianus, 258.

SIXTUS III. was the successor of Celestin I., in 431. He endeavoured to reconcile the disputes existing in the Eastern Church, particularly in the case of Cyril, bishop of Alexandria, and John of Antioch. Some of the epistles which he composed with regard to those controversies are extant, and are included in the collection of Constant. He was also a munificent patron of learning, and is stated to have left 5,000 silver marks to be expended in the embellishment of ecclesiastical structures. D. 440.

SIXTUS IV., Pope, was the son of a fisherman on the coast of Genoa, but became a monk of the order of the Cordeliers. His abilities procured him the chair of divinity at Padua and other universities of Italy. He also became general of his order, and was honoured with the cardinalship by Paul II., whom he succeeded in 1471. He is accused with having been a participator in the conspiracy of the Pazzi, the object of which was to destroy the Medici family. (See PAZZI.) He also endeavoured to raise a new crusade against the infidels, but without success. Sixtus issued a bull granting indulgence to those who celebrated the feast of the Immaculate Conception of the Virgin. B. 1414; D. 1484.

SIXTUS V., Pope, was the son of a gardener of Ancona. When very young, he was put to keep swine, from which situation he was taken by a Cordelier, who was pleased with his quickness, and placed him in a convent belonging to that order, in a menial capacity. He made so great a progress in learning as to be admitted into orders, and to become doctor and professor of divinity at Sienna; upon which he took the name of Montalto. After obtaining several marks of distinction, he was made cardinal in 1570. In this capacity he affected uncommon humility and devotion, and counterfeited the weaknesses of sickness and age with so much art as to dupe the whole conclave. After the death of Gregory XIII., the cardinals were divided as to the election; when, considering that Montalto was an infirm old man who could not live long, they united in choosing him to the vacant chair in 1585. The election was no sooner declared, than, to the astonishment of all, he strode into the midst of the chapel, threw away his crutch, and began to sing the Te Deum with a loud voice. He commenced his pontificate by clearing the Ecclesiastical States of the numerous bands of robbers which infested it. He also punished with great severity all kinds of vice, and was inflexible in the administration of justice. He limited the number of cardinals to seventy, raised the famous obelisk which Caligula had caused to be brought from Spain, and reformed many abuses which prevailed in the government. He excommunicated Queen Elizabeth, but is stated to have secretly admired the opposition made by the English sovereign to the ambitious projects of Philip II. of Spain. He embellished Rome with several fine structures, and built the Vatican Library. By his orders, a new version of the Bible in Latin was published. B. 1521; D. 1590.

SKAGGERRACK, or the SLEEVE, skag'-ger-rak, an arm of the German Ocean.

SKAGTOLSTIND, skag-tols-tind', the highest of the Norwegian mountains.

SKALITZ, skal'-litzh, a town of Hungary, 48 miles from Presburg. Manf. Linen and woollen goods. Pop. 9,000.

SKELLIGS, skel'-ligs, three rocky islets off the S.W. coast of Ireland, in the Atlantic Ocean. The largest has two lighthouses. Lat. 51° 46′ N. Lon. 10° 32′ W.

SKELTON, John, skel'-ton, an English poet, who was educated at the university of Oxford, and, on entering into orders, obtained the living of Diss, in Norfolk; but his conduct was very irregular. Having reflected severely on Cardinal Wolsey, in his poem entitled "Why come ye not to Court?" he was obliged to take refuge with Islip, abbot of Westminster, where he continued till his death. He wrote satires, sonnets, and an invective against Lily, the grammarian.

His poetical works have been published by the Rev. Alexander Dyce. B. either in Cumberland or Norfolk, about 1460; D. at Westminster, 1529.

SKERRIES, or SKERRY ISLES, sker'-ris, three small islands of Shetland, 15 miles from Whalsay. A general name in Scotland for isolated rocks surrounded by the sea.

SKERRIES, a fishing-town of Ireland, 17 miles from Dublin. It has a good pier. Pop. 2,500.

SKIATHI, ske-a'-the, a small island of the Grecian archipelago, 10 miles from Eubœa. Ext. 4 miles long, and about the same in breadth. Pop. Unascertained.

SKIBBEREEN, skib'-be-reen', a town of Ireland, in the county of Cork, on the Ilen, 34 miles from Cork. It has a thriving trade in corn, flour, and provisions. Pop. 6,500.—This town and the neighbourhood around suffered greatly during the Irish famine of 1847.

SKIDDAW, skid'-daw, one of the highest mountains of England, in Cumberland, 4 miles from Keswick. It is distinguished also for its grand and romantic scenery, as well as for the lakes in its different hollows and near its base. Height, 3,022 feet.

SKIERNIWICE, skeer'-ne-weece, a town of Poland, on the Bzura, 42 miles from Warsaw. Manf. Woollen and linen cloths. Pop. 2,500.—Here, in 1809, the French were defeated by the Russians.

SKINOSA, ske-no'-sa, a small island of the Grecian archipelago, 5 miles from Naxos.

SKIPTON, skip'-ton, a market-town of the West Riding of Yorkshire, 16 miles from Bradford. The town consists chiefly of one wide and long street, with a church, a grammar-school, and a town-house. Manf. Cotton goods; and there is an active trade carried on in grain and cattle. Pop. 7,200.—It has a station on the Leeds and East Lancashire Railway.

SKIRCOAT, skir'-kote, a township of the West Riding of Yorkshire, 2 miles from Halifax. Manf. Cotton goods. Pop. 7,000.

SKIRTS, or DERG, skirts, a parish of the county of Tyrone, Ulster, comprising the town of Castle-Derg. Pop. 6,000.

SKOPELOS, sko'-pe-los, an island of the Grecian archipelago, 15 miles from Eubœa. Area, 32 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, and producing wine. Pop. 2,500.

SKOPIN, sko-pin', a town of Russia, on the Werda, 50 miles from Riazan. Manf. Russia leather. Pop. 6,000.

SKREEN, skreen, the name of several parishes in Ireland, none of them with a population above 3,000.

SKUTSCH, skutch, a town of Austria, Bohemia, 12 miles from Chrudim. Pop. 4,000.

SKYE, ski, the largest island of the Inner Hebrides, on the coast of Scotland, and in the county of Inverness, separated from the mainland by the narrow strait of Loch Alsh. Ext. 50 miles long, with a breadth varying between 4 and 23 miles. Area. Estimated at about 550 square miles. Desc. Mountainous; some of its masses attaining a height of from 2,000 to 3,000 feet. Its shores are deeply indented with numerous inlets, so distributed as to render no part of the island distant more than 4 miles from salt water. Climate. Mild, but humid and variable. Pro. Potatoes; but the greater portion of the island is useless for the purposes of agriculture. Cattle, fish, and kelp, are the principal exports. Minerals. Freestone, limestone, granite, with some veins of marble, and appearances of lead and iron ore in various places. Pop. 22,000. Many curious grottos, Druidical monuments, and ancient forts, are found in this island, the inhabitants of which dwell, for the most part, in scattered villages, as convenience or the situation invites. It belongs to the Macleod family.

SKYRO, SKYROS, or SCYROS, ske'-ro, an island of the Grecian archipelago, east of Negroponte. Area, 60 square miles. It is separated by an isthmus into two parts, and produces corn, wine, madder, wax, honey, and oranges. Pop. about 3,000. To this island Theseus retired to die.

SLADE, Sir Adolphus, slaid, an English naval officer in the service of Turkey, where he was called Muschaver Pacha. He entered the English navy at an early age, and commanded a cutter at the battle of Navarino in 1828. After attaining the rank of post-captain, he was permitted to take service under the Ottoman flag, for the purpose of introducing some necessary reforms into the naval forces of the sultan. Captain Slade published two works upon the East, of some value, entitled "Records of Travels in Turkey," and "Turkey, Greece, and Malta." B. 1802.

SLAITHWAITE, slaith'-wait, a township of the West Riding of Yorkshire, 5 miles from Huddersfield. Manf. Woollen and cotton goods. Pop. 3,000.

SLANE, slain, a town of Ireland, in the county of Meath, on the Boyne, over which is a bridge, 3 miles from Drogheda. Pop. 600. Near this place the battle of the Boyne was fought by William III. against the adherents of James II.

SLAVE COAST, that portion of W. Africa between the rivers Volta and Lagos, which respectively separate it from the Gold Coast on the W. and Benin on the E.

SLANEY, slan'-ne, a river of Ireland, which, after a course of 60 miles, runs into Wexford harbour.

SLAVE LAKE, GREAT, a lake of British N. America, in the N.W. territory. Ext. About 300 miles, with a breadth of 50 at its widest points. Lat. between 60° 40′ and 63° N. Lon. between 109° 30′ and 117° 30′ W.

SLAVONIA. (See SCLAVONIA.)

SLEAFORD, NEW, sle'-ford, a market-town of Lincolnshire, on a rivulet called the Slee, 18 miles from Lincoln. It has a church, town-hall, and grammar-school. Pop. 3,100.—SLEAFORD, OLD, is about a mile from the foregoing.

SLEEMAN, Sir William Henry, sle'-man, a distinguished officer in the service of the East-India Company, who served in the Nepaulese war of 1812, and afterwards fulfilled the functions of British resident at Lucknow with admirable tact. His works, entitled "Diary in Oude," and "Rambles and Recollections of an Indian Officer," are said to be the best treatises extant upon the religion and social condition of the kingdom of Oude. He was a zealous advocate for the annexation of that country to the British possessions in India. The suppression of Thuggee was also strenuously recommended by him. B. in Cornwall, 1788; D. at sea, on his return to England, 1856.

SLEIDAN, John, slid'-dan, a German historian, whose original name was Philipson. He was for some time in the family of the Cardinal du Bellay, who allowed him a pension; but, having embraced the doctrines of the Reformation, he quitted Paris and repaired to Strasburg, where he became the historian to the Protestant League. His principal works are—a history, in Latin, of the Reformation in Germany; an abridgement of Froissart's "Chronicles," in Latin; a "Universal History," of which Voltaire made considerable use; and a Latin translation of the "Memoirs of Philip de Commines." B. at Sleida, near Cologne, 1506; D. 1556.

SLESWICK, or SCHLESWIG, sles-wik', or sles-wig', a duchy of Denmark, having Jutland on the N. and Holstein on the S., while on the E. and W. it is respectively bounded by the Baltic and the North seas. Area, 3,450 square miles. Desc. Low and flat, the whole of the W. coast being protected from the inundations of the sea by dykes. The soil is generally fertile. Pro. Barley, oats, and rye, with comparatively little wheat, hemp, or flax. Timber is scarce, but turf is abundant, and there is good pasture, on which are bred horses and horned cattle. Manf. Woollen and linen goods. Fishing forms a considerable occupation on the coast, as well as in the arms of the sea. Pop. 363,000.—Since 1851 this duchy, with that of Holstein, has been placed in closer connection with the government of Denmark.

SLESWICK, the capital of the above duchy, on the Sley, or Schlei, 70 miles from Hamburg. It is a long irregular town, with a cathedral and other churches, a town-house, orphan-house, workhouse, a patriotic union, and other associations. Manf. Woollen goods, leather, sugar, and earthenwares. Pop. 11,700. Lat. 54° 32′ N. Lon. 9° 35′ E.

SLIEVE, sleeve, the name of numerous mountains in Ireland, with heights varying from 2,000 to 3,000 feet.

SLIGO, slī'-go, a maritime county of Ireland, in the province of Connaught, bounded E. by the county of Leitrim, S. by Roscommon, S.W. and W. by Mayo, and N. by the Bay of Donegal. Area, 721 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, and in some parts interspersed with lands rich and fertile, and equally adapted for tillage or for fattening the heaviest oxen. Rivers.

The most considerable are the Sligo, the Bonnet, the Arrow, and the Moy. Lakes. Among the hills there are many lakes; among which may be named the Arrow, the Gill, and a part of the Gara. Pro. The soil being generally light, sandy, gravelly, gravelly loam, or moory, mixed with round stones, on a strong gravelly bottom, is tolerably productive of potatoes, barley, and oats. Minerals. Lead, iron, silver, and copper ores, have been discovered in different places. Manf. Linen goods are universally made. Pop. 130,900.

SLIGO, sli'-go, the chief town of the above county, and a seaport, pleasantly situate at the mouth of the river which flows from Lough Gilly to Sligo Bay, 69 miles from Londonderry. Its public buildings consist of a gaol, a barrack, a court-house, an infirmary, and a charter school. It has, besides, various charitable institutions, market-houses, news-rooms, and a theatre. It is the entrepôt of an extensive country, and is, therefore, a place of considerable trade. Pop. 11,300.—This town owes its origin to a castle and an abbey, erected here about the year 1262. The castle was destroyed and rebuilt in 1310, but is now in ruins.

SLIGO BAY, an inlet of the Atlantic, immediately to the S. of Donegal Bay. In 1588, three of the ships of the Spanish armada were stranded here.

SLOANE, Sir Hans, slone, an eminent Irish physician and naturalist. He studied in London, where he contracted an intimacy with Boyle and Ray, and afterwards went to Paris, and attended the lectures of Tournefort and Du Verney. He returned to London in 1684, and became a favourite with Dr. Sydenham, who took him into his house. The same year he was chosen a fellow of the Royal Society, and, in 1687, admitted of the College of Physicians. Shortly afterwards he went to Jamaica with the duke of Albemarle, governor of that island, as his physician; and though he resided there only fifteen months, he made a collection of not less than eight hundred different plants. On his return, in 1689, he settled in London, and, in 1694, was chosen physician to Christ's Hospital. The preceding year he was elected secretary to the Royal Society, upon which he revived the publication of the Philosophical Transactions. He was also active in promoting the establishment of a dispensary for the poor, and was one of the founders of the Foundling Hospital. In 1707 he published the first volume of his "Natural History of Jamaica;" but the second did not appear till 1725. In 1708 he was elected a member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, and, on the accession of George I., created a baronet. In 1719 he became president of the College of Physicians, having previously been elected to the same distinguished post in the Royal Society, on the death of Newton. His magnificent cabinet of curiosities was purchased by parliament for £20,000, which did not amount to a fourth part of its actual value. This collection served as the foundation of the British Museum. Several of his papers are in the Philosophical Transactions. B. at Killileagh, county Down, Ireland, 1660; D. at Chelsea, 1753.

SLOBODSKOI, slo-bods'-koi, a town of European Russia, in the government of Viatka, 16 miles from the town of Viatka. It has numerous churches and iron-foundries. Pop. 6,200.

SLONIM, slo-nim', a town of Russian Lithuania, in the government of Grodno, 44 miles from Novogrodek. It has several churches and schools. Pop. 7,500.

SLOOTEN, sloo'-ten, a town of the Netherlands, on the lake of the same name, 12 miles from Stavoren. Pop. 1,300.

SLOUGH, slou, a village of Buckinghamshire, 2½ miles from Ascot-Heath and 21 from London. The celebrated Dr. Herschel had here his residence and observatory. Pop. 1,200. It has a station on the Great Western Railway.

SLUTSK, slootzk, a town of Russian Poland, 62 miles from Minsk. Pop. 8,000.

SLUYS, or ECLUSE, slooss, a fortified town of the Netherlands, 10 miles from Bruges, with which it communicates by means of a canal. Pop. 2,000.

SMART, Christopher, smart, an English divine and poet, who, after completing his education at the university of Cambridge, where he several times obtained the Seatonian prize for the best poem, in 1753 settled in London; but, being imprudent, he became poor and disordered in his mind. He translated the Psalms, Phædrus, and Horace into English verse. His original poems possess merit. B. at Shepburne, Kent, 1722; D. in the King's Bench, 1770.

SMEATON, John, sme'-ton, an eminent English mechanician and engineer. He was intended for the law by his father, who was an attorney, but, at his own request, he was placed under a mathematical instrument maker. Having acquired considerable reputation by his inventions in hydraulics, &c., he, in 1753, was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and in 1759 he obtained the gold medal for his paper on "The Natural Powers of Wind and Water to turn Mills and other Machines depending on a Circular Motion." The two lighthouses which had been successively erected upon the Eddystone rock having been destroyed, the first by a storm and the second by fire, Smeaton was appointed to rebuild the structure, which he completed in a manner beyond expectation; and it may be justly pronounced a work unparalleled of its kind; for, having been buffeted by the storms of a hundred years, it stands unmoved as the rock upon which it is built. He also made improvements in wind and water-mills, the steam-engine; completed the harbour of Ramsgate, planned the great canal from the Forth to the Clyde, and executed a number of other great works. He published a curious account of the construction of the Eddystone lighthouse, and commenced a treatise on mills, which he did not live to complete. He was also the author of an "Account of the Improvements in Ramsgate Harbour," which were conducted by him. B. at Austhorpe, near Leeds, 1724; D. at the same place, 1792.

SMIRKE, Robert, smirk, an English artist, who was originally a coach-painter, but became one of the first pictorial delineators of his time. He was elected a Royal Academician in 1792. He made a great number of designs for booksellers, and was one of the artists engaged to illustrate Boydell's Shakspere. His best paintings were "The Combat between Don Quixote and the Giants interrupted by the Innkeeper," "The Seven Ages of Man," and "Prince Henry and Falstaff." B. 1751; D. in London, 1845.

SMIRKE, Sir Robert, an eminent English architect, and eldest son of the preceding. After receiving some preliminary instructions in art from his father, he went upon a tour in Italy, Greece, and Germany, and upon his return published "Specimens of Continental Architecture," and some smaller treatises. He found some influential patrons, and, before he he had attained his 30th year, was engaged to make the designs for Covent-Garden theatre. This structure was destroyed by fire in 1856. His next great undertakings were the Mint, and the Post-office in St. Martin's-le-Grand, which last building was completed in 1829. The most important of his other works were—the College of Physicians, the Union Club in Trafalgar Square, the extension of King's-Bench Walk, Temple; and King's College. Finally, his greatest structure is the British Museum, which was commenced in 1823, but was not completed until the year 1847. He was elected a Royal Academician in 1812, and was created a knight in 1831. B. 1780.

SMIRKE, Sydney, an eminent English architect, and younger brother of the preceding. His first important work was the Oxford and Cambridge University Club in Pall-Mall, upon which he was engaged with his brother, the Pall-Mall front being understood to be after his own designs. He superintended the restorations made in the Temple Church in 1842, and, afterwards, in conjunction with Mr. Basevi, designed the Conservative Club-house in St. James's Street. For the late Sir Robert Peel he erected a new portrait-gallery at Drayton Manor, and in 1847 he was engaged as the architect of the new Carlton Club, in designing which he employed the library of St. Mark, by Sansovino, as his model. One of the most important of his later works was the reading-room of the British Museum, erected in the inner quadrangle of that building. In this undertaking, however, he only acted under the suggestions of Mr. Panizzi, the principal librarian of the Museum. This handsome structure is of iron, its dome being (with the exception of the Pantheon at Rome, which has a greater diameter of two feet) the largest in existence. All the internal arrangements of this eminently successful work were also designed by Mr. Panizzi; but to Mr. Smirke's constructive skill is due the merit of a perfect execution of the original conception. B. about 1800.

SMITH, Thomas, smith, an eminent English statesman, who received his education at Queen's College, Cambridge, where he was elected fellow, and appointed Greek lecturer, in which capacity he introduced a new method of pronouncing that language, which became general in the university, though opposed by the chancellor. In 1539 he went abroad, and took his doctor's degree of law at Padua. In 1542 he was made regius professor of that faculty at Cambridge. Through the interest of the duke of Somerset, he was knighted and made secretary of state by Edward VI.; but, in the succeeding reign, he lost his preferments. Queen Elizabeth employed him in several embassies to France, made him secretary of state and chancellor of the Garter. Sir Thomas wrote a treatise, in Latin, on the "Right Pronunciation of Greek," printed at Paris by Stephens, in 1568; and some other works. B. at Saffron-Walden, Essex, 1515; D. 1577.

SMITH, John, an English navigator, who, between the years 1606-14, made three voyages to Virginia, and assisted to found James-town. Having fallen into the hands of the Indians, he was about to be tortured and put to death, when Pocahontas, the beautiful daughter of the chief, interposed, and, at the peril of her own life, saved that of the English adventurer. He wrote a work, entitled "A Description of New England; or, Observations and Discoveries of Captain John Smith." Like Sir Walter Raleigh, he was one of the chief founders of the Anglo-American colonies. B. 1579; D. 1631.

SMITH, John, a learned English physician, who became fellow of the College of Physicians in London. He wrote a curious book, entitled "The Portrait of Old Age; or, a Paraphrase on Ecclesiastes XII." D. 1679.

SMITH, Thomas, a learned English divine, who became fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford, and, in 1668, went as chaplain to the English embassy at Constantinople. He wrote, among other works, "Four Epistles on the Manners of the Turks," in Latin and English; an "Account of the Greek Church," and a "Life of Camden." B. in London, 1638; D. 1710.

SMITH, Sir Henry George Wakelyn, an eminent English general, who entered the army in 1805, and, after seeing a great deal of service in South America and at the capture of Copenhagen, was sent to Spain with the expedition of Sir John Moore, under whom he served until the embarkation at Corunna. He returned to Spain in 1809, and, having risen to the command of a brigade of the light division, he fought at the battles of Salamanca, Vittoria, Orthes, and Toulouse, and at the sieges of Ciudad Rodrigo and Badajoz. After serving in America, he returned to Europe in time to participate in the victory at Waterloo. His next employments were upon the staff in various parts of the world, till, in 1840, he became adjutant-general of the forces in India. He took part in the victories at Gwalior and Maharajpore, and later at Moodkee, Ferozepore, Aliwal, and Sobraon. For his services he was created a baronet and G.C.B., received the thanks of parliament, and was appointed to the colonelcy of the rifle brigade. As governor of the Cape of Good Hope, to which post he was appointed in 1847, he conducted the Caffre war, which he brought to a successful termination in 1852. Two years later, he was raised to the rank of lieutenant-general. B. in the Isle of Ely, 1788.

SMITH, Adam, an eminent Scotch writer upon political economy. He received his education first at Kirkaldy grammar-school, and subsequently at the universities of Glasgow and Oxford. After being engaged during three years in reading lectures upon rhetoric and belles-lettres at Edinburgh, he was nominated professor of logic and moral philosophy at the university of Glasgow. In 1759, by the publication of his "Theory of Moral Sentiments," he acquired reputation, which was greatly heightened and extended by his profound work entitled "Inquiry into the Nature and Causes of the Wealth of Nations," which first appeared in 1766. Some years subsequently to the publication of this work, he was, through the influence of the duke of Buccleuch, appointed a commissioner of the customs in Scotland. He was the intimate friend of Hume, and published an Apology for his life, which was severely animadverted on by Dr. Horne for its atheistical sentiments. An account of his life and writings was written by Dugald Stewart, and appended to an edition of the "Wealth of Nations." B. at Kirkaldy, Scotland, 1723; D. 1790.

SMITH, James, an English littérateur, who was educated for the legal profession, and became solicitor to the Ordnance. After contributing a number of minor pieces to the magazines, he, in 1812, published, in conjunction with his brother Horace, a volume entitled "The Rejected Addresses," which instantly became highly popular. He subsequently wrote several entertainments for the elder Charles Matthews. B. in London, 1775; D. in the same city, 1839.

SMITH, Horace, brother of the preceding, with whom he wrote "The Rejected Addresses." He was also the author of about twenty novels, the best known of which are "The Moneyed Man" and "Brambletye House." Like his brother, he also produced a number of light pieces of a humorous character, in prose and verse. B. in London, 1780; D. at Tunbridge Wells, 1849.

SMITH, Sir James Edward, an eminent English botanist, who was intended for a mercantile calling; but having, from an early period, evinced a decided predilection for scientific pursuits, his father was at length induced to send him to Edinburgh, with the view of qualifying him for the medical profession. Learning from Sir Joseph Banks, that the books, manuscripts, and natural history collections of Linnæus had been offered to him for £1,000, and that he had declined the purchase, Mr. Smith, with some difficulty, succeeded in inducing his father to become the purchaser. This magnificent collection was, after the death of Sir James Smith, who had founded the Linnæan Society, presented to that body. After taking his medical degree at Leyden, he travelled in Italy, Switzerland, and France, and, in 1792, was appointed teacher of botany to Queen Charlotte. In 1814, upon the occasion of his presenting the volumes of the Transactions of the Linnæan Society to the prince-regent, he received the honour of knighthood. He wrote extensively upon his favourite science; his most important works being "English Botany," in 36 volumes; the "English Flora," and the botanical articles in "Rees's Cyclopædia." B. at Norwich, 1759; D. 1828.

SMITH, Sir William Sydney, a distinguished English admiral, who was, in 1793, sent by Admiral Hood to destroy the French vessels of war in the harbour of Toulon, by means of fireships; but being taken prisoner, he was confined during two years in the Temple at Paris. Having effected his escape, he was sent to act against the French in Egypt, and, by his bravery and skill, compelled Bonaparte to abandon the siege of St. Jean d'Acre, in 1799. In 1805 he was created a rear-admiral, and was afterwards appointed to defend Sicily from the invasion of the French, who were then masters of Naples. In 1807 he accompanied the king of Portugal to Brazil. Not being again employed upon active service, he devoted himself to the propagation of several philanthropic works. He also assisted to found a society, the object of which was to effect the suppression of piracy in the Mediterranean. B. in London, 1764; D. 1840.

SMITH, Dr. John Pye, an eminent modern theologian and geologist, who became classical tutor in the Theological Academy at Homerton, belonging to the Independent denomination. His works are highly esteemed by theologians; the most important of them being, "The Scripture Testimony to the Messiah;" "The Mosaic Account of the Creation and the Deluge illustrated by the Discoveries of Modern Science;" and "On the Relation between the Holy Scriptures and some parts of Geological Science." Dr. Smith was a fellow of the Royal and Geological societies, and LL.D. of Marischal College, Aberdeen. B. at Sheffield, 1774; D. 1851.

SMITH, Albert, a modern English littérateur, who was intended for the medical profession, and became a member of the College of Surgeons in 1838. After a residence of some months in Paris, and a visit to Chamouni, he returned to England and joined his father as medical practitioner; but he soon quitted this employment for literature. As a magazine-writer and novelist, he achieved a decided success; his most popular productions being, "The Adventures of Mr. Ledbury;" "The Scattergood Family;" "The Marchioness of Brinvilliers;" "Christopher Tadpole;" and "The Pottleton Legacy." In 1849 he visited Constantinople, and wrote an account of his tour. In the following year he brought out an entertainment called "The Overland Mail;" in which he gave an amusing account of that route. In 1852 he commenced, at the Egyptian Hall, his successful entertainment of the "Ascent of Mont Blanc," for several years one of the most popular pieces of amusement in London. That he was possessed of a genuine vein of humour was evinced in the works already quoted, as well as in a very large number of smaller productions; such as "Evening Parties," "The Gent," "The Flirt;" some excellent burlesques, &c. B. at Chertsey, 1816; D. at Fulham, 1860.

SMITH, Dr. Robert, an eminent English mathematician, who early in life became tutor to the duke of Cumberland, and subsequently professor of astronomy in the university of Cambridge, and master of Trinity College. His principal works were, "A Complete System of Optics," an improved edition of Cotes's "Lectures on Hydrostatics and Pneumatics;" and "Harmonics, or, the Philosophy of Musical Sound." He bequeathed two annual prizes of £25 to be awarded to bachelors of arts who had shown the greatest advancement in mathematics and natural philosophy. These bachelors are called "Smith's prizemen." B. 1689; D. at Cambridge, 1768.

SMITH, Thomas Southwood, a modern English physician and writer upon medicine. He obtained his degree as M.D. at the university of Edinburgh in 1816; after which he settled in the metropolis as a physician. From an early period he devoted himself to the literature of his profession, and produced a "Treatise on Fever;" the greater portion of the articles on anatomy, physiology, and medicine, for the "Penny Cyclopædia;" and a valuable little work, entitled "The Physiology of Health." He was also one of the founders of the "Westminster Review," wherein he denounced that revolting mode of providing the schools of anatomy with the means of dissection, which was called the "resurrection" system. He acted as one of the commissioners of inquiry into the condition of factory-children; the result of whose labours was the passing of the Factory Act. Subsequently, his devotion to the cause of sanitary reform caused him to abandon his practice; and to his reports and disinterested labours was in great part due the passing of the Public Health Act. For these services he received a pension of £300 per annum. In addition to the works already mentioned, he wrote one entitled "Animal Physiology." B. about 1790.

SMITH, John Raphael, an eminent English mezzotint engraver and artist, who reproduced many of the finest portraits of Sir Joshua Reynolds. He also painted portraits himself with some skill. B. 1752; D. 1812.

SMITH, Dr. William, a modern English philologist, and the editor of several valuable classical dictionaries. He was designed for the law; but, although, after completing his education at the University of London, he kept his terms at Gray's Inn, his strong preference for the study of languages caused him to abandon jurisprudence for philological literature. He obtained the appointment of professor of the Greek, Latin, and German languages in the Independent college at Homerton and Highbury. An article on "Language," furnished by him to the "Penny Cyclopædia," was one of his first successes in that career which he subsequently worthily pursued. In 1842 he commenced the "Dictionary of Greek and Roman Antiquities," fulfilling the duties of editor himself. In the same capacity he subsequently published "The Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography and Mythology," and the "Dictionary of Greek and Roman Geography." When, in 1850, the colleges of Highbury and Homerton were united, under the designation of the New College, he was appointed professor of the Greek and Latin languages and literature there. Three years later he became classical examiner in the University of London. In 1854 he commenced the publication of a new edition of Gibbons's "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire," with notes by M. Guizot, Dean Milman, and himself. He also produced several abridged editions of his larger classical dictionaries, a "Latin-English Dictionary," based upon Forcellini and Freund; and a "Dictionary of the Bible." B. in London, 1814.

SMITH, John Thomas, an eminent English antiquarian, who studied drawing under the sculptor Nollekens and at the Royal Academy; after which he became a pupil of Sherwin, the engraver. In 1791 he commenced his fine work entitled "Antiquities of London and its Environs," which was completed in 1800. His next publication of importance was "The Antiquities of Westminster." The "Ancient Topography of London" followed. In 1816 he received the appointment of keeper of the prints in the British Museum, an office he retained until his death. Besides the preceding works, he produced "Vagabondiana, or Anecdotes of Mendicant Wanderers through the Streets of London;" and "Nollekens and his Times." B. in London, 1766; D. 1833.

SMITH, John Stafford, an eminent English composer, who, in 1802, became organist of the Chapel Royal, in succession to Dr. Arnold. His most admired compositions were the glees,—"Let happy lovers fly where pleasures call;" "Blest pair of Sirens;" "As on a summer's day;" and the madrigal, "Flora now calleth forth each flower." He also produced two musical works, entitled "Musica Antiqua," a collection of anthems; and "Ancient Songs of the Fifteenth Century." B. at Gloucester, about 1750; D. 1836.

SMITH, William, an eminent geologist, and entitled "the father of English geology." He produced the first geological map of England and Wales, and two works on "Organized Fossils." In consequence of his distinguished services, he obtained a pension of £100 from the crown, received the degree of LL.D. in Trinity College, Dublin, and the Wollaston medal of the Geological Society of London. This last mark of distinction was awarded him "in consideration of his being a great original discoverer in English geology; and especially for his being the first in this country to discover and to teach the identification of strata, and to determine their succession by means of their imbedded fossils." B. at Churchill, Oxfordshire, 1769; D. at Northampton, 1839.

SMITH, Joseph, the founder of the religious body commonly called the Mormonites. From an autobiographical account left by himself, as well as from a sketch of his life purporting to be written by his mother, it would appear that he was the son of a farmer of Sharon, Windsor county, Vermont. According to his own statement, he, when about 14 years of age, began to reflect upon the importance of being prepared for a future state, and therefore retired to "a secret place in a grove, and began to call upon the Lord . . . . After having received many visits from the angels of God, unfolding the majesty and glory of the events that should transpire in the last days, on the morning of the 22nd of September, 1827, the angel of the Lord delivered the records into my hands." These records were stated to be engraven "in Egyptian characters," on plates which had the appearance of gold, and with them Joseph Smith further stated, though in the vaguest way, that he found "a curious instrument, which the ancients called Urim and Thummim, which consisted of two transparent stones set in the rim, on a bow fastened to a breastplate." Through the medium of this instrument, he professed to be able to translate the records, which were said to have been written by Mormon, a Jewish prophet, and to contain a history of ancient America, from its first settlement by a colony that came from the Tower of Babel, at the confusion of languages, to the beginning of the 5th century of the Christian era. His own account of what was contained in the records was,—"that America, in ancient times, was inhabited by two distinct races of people. The first were called Jaredites, and came directly from the Tower of Babel; the second race came directly from the city of Jerusalem, about 600 years before Christ. They were principally Israelites, of the descendants of Joseph. The Jaredites were destroyed about the time that the Israelites came from Jerusalem, who succeeded them in the inheritance of the country. The principal nation of the second race fell in battle towards the close of the 4th century. This book also tells us that our Saviour made his appearance upon this continent after his resurrection; that they had apostles, prophets, pastors, teachers, and evangelists,—the same order, the same priesthood, the same ordinances, gifts, powers, and blessing, as were enjoyed on the eastern continent; that the people were cut off in consequence of their transgressions; that the last of the prophets who existed among them, was commanded to write an abridgement of their prophecies, history, &c., and to hide it up in the earth, and that it should come forth and be united with the Bible." Joseph Smith first made known his discovery of the engraved plates to the members of his own and his father's household. These became his first converts. When the news spread, the prophet says, "My house was frequently beset by mobs and evil-designing persons; several times I was shot at, and very narrowly escaped; and every device was made use of to get the plates away from me." He succeeded, however, in gathering together a number of believers. In 1830 he published the "Book of Mormon," which had been translated from the plates through the aid of the curious spectacles called the "Urim and Thummim." In carrying out that work, Joseph Smith always retired behind a screen, whence he dictated the record to "a scribe," named Oliver Cowdrey, who, like himself, had been baptized by an angel, to fit him for the task. After the translation had been completed, the plates were shown to eight witnesses, and the "angel again made his appearance to Joseph; at which time Joseph delivered up the plates into the angel's hands, and he (the angel) has them in his charge to this day." The foregoing is a brief account of the discovery and translation of the "Book of Mormon" according to the prophet's own statement; but there is another story told of the authorship; viz., that the volume was founded upon a religious romance, entitled "The Manuscript Found," written by one Solomon Spalding, a Presbyterian preacher. The manuscript of this work is said to have been taken to New York by the preacher's widow ten years after his death, with the view of finding a publisher for it; but by some means it came into the possession of Smith, or an associate of his, named Rigdon. In 1830 the first Mormon church, or, as the founder called it, that of "the Latter-day Saints," was established in the town of Manchester, Ontario county, state of New York. From that time the sect increased with astonishing rapidity, and churches were set up in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Pennsylvania, Missouri, and New York. Despite ridicule, persecution, and tarring and feathering, the work went on, until, in 1838, the Mormonites were expelled from Missouri. They settled in Illinois, and in "the fall of 1839" founded the city of Nauvoo ('the beautiful'), on the banks of the Mississippi. Soon, from a wild tract, the spot became a city of 1,500 well-built houses, with more than 15,000 inhabitants. This settlement received large accessions to its numbers, not alone in the shape of converts, who flocked in from foreign countries as well as from other states of America, but also from "gentile" adventurers, who were attracted to the place by its fertility of soil. And although Joseph Smith, as "sire, prophet, and revelator" of his own body, possessed commanding influence in Nauvoo, he was being constantly embroiled with the civil authorities of the state of Illinois. In 1844 the governor of that state issued a warrant against Joseph Smith, as the instigator of a riot, during which the printing-offices and premises of a "gentile" newspaper were destroyed by the Mormons. The prophet at first made symptoms of resistance, and called out his militia, of which he was lieutenant-colonel; but subsequently offered to surrender, if the governor would provide a guard for his safety until his trial should take place. He was lodged in Carthage gaol under a small guard, selected, it is affirmed, from Smith's enemies. A few days afterwards, a mob of turbulent ruffians broke into his prison, fired into the room where he was confined, and killed his brother Hiram, who was incarcerated with him. The prophet endeavoured to effect his escape by the window, but was taken and shot. His body was interred by his followers with the greatest solemnity, and he became the martyr of his sect, which, in consequence of its founder's fate, increased even more rapidly than before. Brigham Young was elected to succeed the prophet, and under their new leader the Mormons prepared to emigrate far beyond the American settlements, in order to await the realization of their founder's vision. (See YOUNG, Brigham.) Joseph Smith was B. at Sharon, Windsor county, Vermont, 1805; shot in the state of Illinois, 1844.

SMITH, Rev. Sydney, an eminent English divine and essayist, who received his education at Winchester school and New College, Oxford, of which he was elected fellow in 1790. During a subsequent tour in Normandy, he acquired the French language, and, after officiating as curate at Nether-Avon, in Wiltshire, for about two years, he became tutor to the son of Mr. Hicks Beach, member of parliament for Cirencester. He next took up his residence at Edinburgh, where he remained about five years, becoming acquainted in that interval with Henry, afterwards Lord Brougham, Francis Jeffrey, afterwards Lord Jeffrey, and other gentlemen who subsequently acquired fame in science and literature. At one of the meetings of these brilliant young men, it was suggested that the Edinburgh Review should be started. "One day," says Sydney Smith himself, "we happened to meet in the eighth or ninth story, or flat, in Buccleuch Place, the elevated residence of the then Mr. Jeffrey. I proposed that we should set up a review; this was acceded to with acclamation. I was appointed editor, and remained long enough in Edinburgh to edit the first number of the Edinburgh Review." The review made its first appearance in October, 1802. He took up his residence in London in 1804, having some time previously married the daughter of Mr. Pybus, a banker. For two years he remained without any preferment in the Church, although he had become famous as a wit, popular preacher at the chapel of the Foundling Hospital, lecturer on belles-lettres at the Royal Institution, and as a constant contributor to the Edinburgh Review. Lord Erskine was one of his earliest patrons, and presented him to the rectory of Foston-le-Clay, in Yorkshire, in 1806. This living was exchanged for that of Combe-Florey, in Somersetshire, in 1830. He was also appointed to a stall in Bristol Cathedral, and as one of the canons residentiary of St. Paul's Cathedral. His residence was, however, almost entirely fixed in London, where his brilliant wit and unrivalled conversational powers made him a welcome guest in the most distinguished circles. His contributions to literature, which are characterized by liberal views, clearness, and force of style, and wit and humour in abundance, principally were,—"Letters on the subject of the Catholics, by Peter Plymley;" "The Works," in three vols., which consists of a selection of his best articles from the Edinburgh Review; and "Sketches of Moral Philosophy." B. at Woodford, Essex, 1771; D. in London, 1845.

SMITH, Alexander, a modern Scotch poet, who was intended for the ministry; but circumstances having conspired to prevent his entering upon the necessary course of study, he was put to the business of a lace-designer, in Glasgow; while following which, he devoted his leisure to the composition of verses. Having forwarded some extracts from his "Life Drama" to the Rev. George Gilfillan, of Dundee, that gentleman was so highly pleased with the youthful poet's effusions, as to obtain a place for them in the columns of the "Critic." Although subjected to much adverse criticism, the "Life Drama" became very popular, both on its first appearance and on its republication separately. He subsequently produced a new volume of verses, entitled "City Poems." In 1854 he was appointed secretary to the Edinburgh University. B. at Kilmarnock, Ayrshire, 1830.

SMITH, a county on the N. side of West Tennessee, U.S. Area, 288 square miles. Pop. 20,000.—Another in Mississippi. Area, 615 square miles. Pop. 5,000.—Also the name of several townships, none of them with a population above 2,000.

SMITHFIELD, smith'-feeld, the name of numerous townships in the United States, with populations ranging between 2,000 and 12,000. The largest is in Rhode Island, 16 miles from Providence.

SMITHWICK, or SMETHWICK, smeth'-ik, a village of Staffordshire, 4 miles from Birmingham. Pop. 8,500, mostly employed in metal-foundries.

SMOLEN, smo'-len, an island of Norway, in the Atlantic, 18 miles from Christiansand. Ext. 16 miles long, with a breadth of 10. Lat. 63° 25′ N. Lon. 8° E.

SMOLENSK, smo-lensk', a government or province of the Russian empire, to the west of the government of Moscow, and inclosed by several other of the Russian governments. Area, 21,800 square miles. Desc. Fertile, and abounding in forests of great value. Rivers. The principal are the Duna, the Dnieper, the Oka, and Issut. The lakes are also numerous. Pro. Corn, hemp, flax, hops, and tobacco. Swine are reared in large numbers, but cattle are not numerous. Great attention is given to the rearing of bees. Minerals. Iron, copper, and salt. Manf. Leather, glass, and pitch. Pop. 1,172,000. Lat. between 53° 20′ and 56° 30′ N. Lon. between 30° 30′ and 35° 25′ E.

SMOLENSK, the capital of the above government, built partly on two hills, and partly in a valley between them, watered by the Dnieper, here a navigable stream, 250 miles from Moscow. The part to the south of the river is surrounded with a massy wall, and the whole is encompassed by a ditch and a sort of covered way. It is the see of an archbishop, and has three cathedrals, numerous churches, monasteries, and an episcopal palace. It has, besides, numerous schools, a college, hospitals, a house of correction, and assembly-rooms. Manf. Linens, leather, carpets, and soap. Pop. 14,000. Lat. 54° 50′ N. Lon. 31° 56′ 36″ E.—Smolensk was the scene of an obstinate conflict between the French and Russians in 1812; but, on quitting it in their disastrous retreat, the French blew up part of the works; and, as most of the houses were of wood, about the half of them were destroyed on these two occasions.

SMOLLETT, Tobias, smol'-let, an eminent English novelist, who was educated for a surgeon, and served on board a ship of the line at the bombardment of Carthagena. He afterwards quitted the service, and took his degree of doctor of physic; but not meeting with encouragement as a medical practitioner, he became a writer by profession. His first work of any pretensions was the novel of "Roderick Random," published in 1748, which soon ran through several editions. The year following appeared the "Regicide," a tragedy of little merit. This was followed by the novel of "Peregrine Pickle," in which were inserted Lady Vane's Memoirs; for giving place to which he received "a handsome reward." In 1754 he published the "Adventures of Ferdinand Count Fathom." He next established the Critical Review, which was chiefly conducted by him till 1763. For an article in this journal he was prosecuted by Admiral Knowles; on which he was confined in the King's Bench some time, and wrote there the "Adventures of Sir Lancelot Greaves," a feeble imitation of "Don Quixote." In 1757 he published the "History of England," which was afterwards printed in weekly numbers, attaining, in both forms, a large circulation. This work, though inaccurate and partial, brought him both profit and reputation. In 1762 he began a periodical paper, called The Briton, in defence of Lord Bute's administration, which print was replied to by Wilkes, in the North Briton. The year following he went abroad, and in 1766 he published an account of his travels. In 1771 appeared his novel of "Humphrey Clinker," which possesses great merit, though it is not equal to his former novels. He also wrote some poems, compiled a collection of voyages and travels, and translated "Gil Blas" and "Don Quixote" into English. Hazlitt, in his "Comic Writers," declares that his novels show a great knowledge of life, but less of character. Unlike Fielding, he could not probe beneath the surface; his humour, although genuine and hearty, is coarse and vulgar; he was superficial where Fielding showed deep insight; but he had a rude conception of generosity in some of his characters, of which Fielding seems incapable, his amiable persons being merely good-natured. "It is owing to this that Strap is superior to Partridge; and there is a heartiness and warmth of feeling in some of the scenes between Lieutenant Bowling and his nephew, which is beyond Fielding's power of impassioned writing." B. in Scotland, 1721; D. near Leghorn, 1771.

SMYTH, smithe, a county of the United States, in Virginia. Area, 516 square miles. Pop. 9,000.

SMYTH, William, a modern English historian, who received his education at the university of Cambridge, after which he became tutor to Thomas, son of R. B. Sheridan. He accompanied his pupil to Cambridge, where he himself finally settled. In 1809 he was appointed to the chair of modern history. His lectures upon history, commencing with the period at which the northern nations overran the Empire, and ending with the close of the French revolution, were published in 1840. He was likewise the author of "Evidence of Christianity," and some less-important works. B. at Liverpool, 1766; D. at Norwich, 1849.

SMYRNA, smir'-na (Turkish ISMEER, is-meer'), a famous commercial city of Anatolia, Asia Minor, situate at the head of the Gulf of Smyrna. It is one of the most celebrated of the ancient cities of Asia. The modern town is about 4 miles in circuit, and extends about a mile along the water, in approaching from which it makes a very beautiful appearance. The interior does not correspond with the splendour of its approach. The streets are narrow, dirty, and ill-paved, and the houses are mostly built of wood, one story high. The bazars, though well provided with goods, are by no means splendid in their structure. There are two very fine caravanseras, inclosing square courts, and which, being covered with cupolas, make a very handsome appearance. The besesteins, or shops, also are arched over, and very fine. Numerous coffee-houses and gardens are scattered along the banks of the river Meles, and extensive cemeteries occupy portions of the declivity of Mount Pagos. There is also a large Armenian academy, and several journals are printed in different languages. At the east end of the city is a large hill, on which the castle was built. Of the sumptuous edifices which rendered Smyrna one of the brightest ornaments of the Lesser Asia, scarcely any remains can now be traced, although it was the seat of one of the "seven churches" of the early Christian periods, mentioned in Scripture. The trade consists of very rich commodities, raw silk, Turkey carpets, unwrought cotton, and the beautiful goats' hair or mohair of Angora, which is used in several of our finer manufactures. It sends out also a considerable quantity of raisins, figs, muscadine wine, olive-oil, sponge, gums, nut-galls, and a variety of drugs,—as rhubarb, amber, musk, lapis lazuli, and gums. A certain number of pearls, diamonds, and other precious stones are also exported. The imports are chiefly woollen cloths, lead, tin, glass, and wrought silks. Pop. Estimated at 150,000; of whom 80,000 are Turks, 40,000 Greeks, 15,000 Jews, 10,000 Armenians, and 5,000 Franks. In 1814 the plague produced such ravages that its victims were estimated at from 50,000 to 60,000. Lat. 38° 29′ N. Lon. 27° 4′ 45″ E. Smyrna claims to be the birthplace of Homer.—The GULF OF SMYRNA is an inlet of the Ægean Sea, extending 45 miles inland, and having 22 miles of breadth at its entrance. It contains several islands, the principal of which is Long or English Island, about 5 miles in length.

SMYRNA.

SNAITH, snaith, a market-town and parish of Yorkshire, on the Aire, 22 miles from York. Pop. of parish, 12,000; of town, 1,000.

SNEEK, or SNITS, snits, a town of the Netherlands, 13 miles from Leuwarden. Pop. 7,500.

SNELL, Rodolph, snel, a Dutch philosopher, who was professor of Hebrew and mathematics at Leyden. He wrote some esteemed works on philosophy and mathematics. B. 1546; D. at Leyden, 1613.

SNELL, Willebord, a Dutch mathematician, and son of the preceding, whom he succeeded in the mathematical chair at Leyden. According to Huyghens and Vossius, he discovered the true law of the refraction of the rays of light, which has been attributed to Descartes. His work is entitled, "Cyclometricus, or the Measurement of a Circle." B. at Leyden, 1591; D. 1626.

SNEYDERS, Francis. (See SNYDERS, Francis.)

SNIADECKI, Jan, sne'-a-dek-e, an eminent Polish mathematician, who pursued his studies in Germany, Holland, and France. While a resident in England, he was presented to George III. by Herschel. He subsequently became president of the university of Wilna. His principal works were—"Philosophy of the Human Mind," and "Physical and Mathematical Description of the Globe." B. at Znin, 1756; D. 1830. —His brother was an eminent physiologist and writer upon medical and chemical science. D. 1838.

SNIATIN, sne'-a-tin, a town of Austrian Poland, on the Pruth, 24 miles from Kolomea. It has a castle and numerous tanneries. Pop. 7,500.

SNORRO, Sturulson, snor'-ro, an Icelandic historian, who, as a lawyer, linguist, mathematician, architect, and antiquary, was one of the most learned men of his time. He was the last and greatest of the Icelandic Scalds, or old Scandinavian poets, who recited the exploits of kings and warriors, the adventures of the gods, and the mysteries of religion, at the courts of Iceland, Norway, Denmark, and Sweden. His most important work was entitled the "Heimskringla," a collection of Scaldic songs, partly original, and partly the effusions of other bards relative to the chronicles of the kingdom of Norway. He also produced the "Snorra-Edda," upon the Scandinavian mythology, and the exploits of heroes contemporary with himself. B. 1178; killed in a revolt, 1241.

SNOWDON MOUNTAIN, sno'-don, the highest mountain of Wales, in Carnarvonshire. Height, 3,571 feet above the level of the sea.

SNYDERS, Francis, sni'-ders, an eminent Dutch painter and engraver. He excelled in hunting-scenes, the animals and landscapes of which are very fine. The human figures were frequently painted by Rubens. He also executed some masterly etchings. B. at Antwerp, 1579; D. at the same place, 1657.

SOANE, Sir John, sone, an English architect, who was the son of a bricklayer. He was taken into the service of Dance, the architect, as errand-boy; but his liberal master perceiving some talent in the lad, allowed him to study in his office as a pupil. He subsequently made such progress as to obtain the gold medal of the Royal Academy, for the design of a triumphal arch; and, on the recommendation of Sir William Chambers, he was sent to Italy as travelling student. He remained in the land of classic art between the years 1777-80, and while there became acquainted with Lord Cameiford, through whom he subsequently obtained the lucrative appointment of architect to the Bank of England. His earliest practice chiefly consisted in designing country mansions; but, after the Bank appointment, other valuable posts were given to him. In 1791 he became clerk of the works to St. James's Palace; in 1795, architect to the Woods and Forests; and subsequently professor of architecture to the Royal Academy, and surveyor to Chelsea Hospital. He received the order of knighthood in 1831. A large private practice, combined with these lucrative appointments and the fortune he received with his wife, the daughter of a rich city builder, made him a rich man. He quarrelled with his son, and refused to be reconciled to him even at the last. The greater part of his wealth was spent upon his house, museum, and library in Lincoln's-Inn Fields, which building was, after his death, vested in trustees for the use of the public, who, under certain regulations, are admitted to it without charge. He had no pretensions to be called a great architect. B. at Reading, 1753; D. in London, 1837.

SOANTH, or SAUNTE, sawn'-te, a district of India, in the presidency of Bombay. Lat. between 22° and 24° N. Lon. between 73° 43′ and 74° 10′ E.

SOAY, so'-ai, a small island of Scotland, near the isle of Skye.—2. Two small islands on the coast of Harris. —3. A small pasture island on the coast of Sutherlandshire.

SOBIESKI, John. (See JOHN III., of Poland.)

SOBRAON, sob'-ra-on, a village of India, on the Sutlej, 25 miles from Ferozepore, famous for the victory obtained by the British over the Sikhs, in February, 1846.

SOCIETY ISLANDS, so-si'-e-te, a cluster of islands in the South Pacific Ocean, so named by Captain Cook, in the year 1769. They are Tahiti, Eimeo, Bolabola, Huaheine, Raiatea, Lahaa, and Meura. The inhabitants, climate, and produce, are similar, in many respects, to those of Otaheite, from which island they are not above 150 miles distant, towards the north-west. They are similar in their manners, being addicted to the same superstitions and customs; and being also under a similar climate, their mode of living is generally the same. Influenced by the instructions of missionaries, the sovereigns of many of these islands, together with a large proportion of the inhabitants, have relinquished the superstitions of their forefathers, and professed their belief in the truths of Christianity. Pop. Estimated at 16,000. Lat. between 16° and 18° S. Lon. between 148° and 155° W.

SOCINUS, Lælius, so-si'-nus, the founder of the Socinian sect. He was descended of an ancient family of Sienna, and was designed by his father for the profession of the law; but having embraced the principles of the Reformation, he deemed it expedient to quit Italy in 1547. After passing through several countries, he settled at Zurich, where he was suspected of Arianism, and having put some "portentous questions" to Calvin, that theologian declined to answer them, assuring him that if he did not "timely correct this itch of inquiry, he would draw on himself great torments." Socinus profited by the hint, but more by the fate of Servetus (see SERVETUS), and retired to Poland, whence he went to Venice, and afterwards returned to Zurich. He was the author of the sect of Socinians, and gathered many followers. The opinions held by this sect were, that Christ was only a man; that the Holy Spirit is nothing more than an attribute; and that the doctrines of original sin, atonement, and divine grace, have no foundation in Scripture. A catechism of Socinianism was written by Smalcius and Moskorewski, which was translated into English by the Rev. Thomas Reeves, in 1819. Socinus was B. at Sienna, 1525; D. at Zurich, 1562.

SOCINUS, Faustus, nephew of the above, and the propagator and systematizer of his doctrines. He inherited his uncle's property, papers, and principles, but did not openly avow the latter for several years. Meantime he was entertained at the court of the duke of Tuscany; but in 1574 he went to Germany, whence he removed to Poland, where the Unitarians were established in great numbers. He was at first refused admittance into the Unitarian body, on account of the difference which existed between them and himself upon essential points of doctrine; but in the end he converted them to his own views so completely, that instead of Unitarians, they came to be termed Socinians. Socinus published several books, which are in the "Bibliotheca Fratrum Polonorum." B. at Sienna, 1539; D. near Cracow, 1604.

SOCKNA, sok'-na, a walled town of Central Africa, Fezzan, 110 miles from Boujein. Pop. 3,000.

SOCORRO, so-kor'-ro, a town of S. America, New Granada, 65 miles from Pamplona. Pop. 12,000.

SOCOTARA, or SOCOTRA, so-ko'-tra, an island of the Indian Ocean, about 120 miles to the eastward of Cape Guardafui. Area. Estimated at 1,000 square miles. Desc. Mountainous and fertile. Pro. Aloes of the finest quality, tamarinds, tobacco, and various fruits and gums. Its domestic animals are oxen, sheep, goats, camels, and civet cats. Pop. about 5,000, mostly Bedouins.

SOCRATES, sok'-ra-tees, a celebrated philosopher of Athens, was the son of a sculptor, in which art he himself attained some proficiency. Crito, observing his genius, and admiring his discourses, called him from this employment to the study of philosophy. He also served his country as a soldier, according to his duty as a good citizen, and distinguished himself in several actions, in which he saved the lives of Xenophon and Alcibiades, with whom he contracted a close friendship. On his return to Athens, he presented a remarkable contrast to his contemporaries, in the plainness of his dress and the frugality of his living. In his philosophical lectures he endeavoured to effect a general reformation by recommending virtue. He was followed by a number of illustrious disciples, whom he instructed sometimes in the groves of Academus, and at others in the Lyceum, or on the banks of the Ilyssus. The independence of his mind, and the powerful eloquence of his discourses, excited against him many enemies, particularly Melitus and Anytus, at whose instigation Aristophanes ridiculed him in his comedy called the "Clouds." Socrates was next accused before the council of Five Hundred, of corrupting the Athenian youth, of introducing innovations in religion, and of ridiculing the gods. Upon these charges he was condemned to death. The solemn celebration of the festival of the Theora stayed his execution for a month, which time he employed in discoursing with his friends on sublime subjects. He was urged to make his escape, which he might easily have done, as the gaoler's permission had been obtained; but he nobly refused, observing, "Where am I to go to avoid death?" When the term of the festival was ended, he drank off the poison with perfect composure, after making a libation to the gods, and in a few moments he expired. Thus perished Socrates, whom the oracle had pronounced the wisest man in Greece. The Athenians repented of their ingratitude, and his enemies were universally hated, and died miserably. The life and sayings of Socrates have been transmitted to us by his two most eminent disciples, Xenophon and Plato. By his wife Xantippe, rendered proverbial by the violence of her temper, he had several children. Schleiermacher, in his "Essay on the Worth of Socrates as a Philosopher," observes, "If he went about in the service of the god to justify the celebrated oracle (the Delphic response, 'Know thyself'), it is impossible that the utmost point he reached could have been simply to know that he knew nothing; there was a step beyond this which he must have taken,—that of knowing what knowledge is." B. at Athens, B.C. 468; D. at the same city, B.C. 399.

SOCRATES, surnamed the Scholastic. He wrote an ecclesiastical history from the period where Eusebius ends,—that is, from the year 306 to 439. Being a layman, and not intimately acquainted with the subjects he treated, his work is frequently inaccurate. It was published with Eusebius, &c., at Cambridge. B. at Constantinople, and flourished in the 5th century.

SODERO, so-dair'-o, an island of Sweden, in the Aland Strait. Ext. 7 miles long, with a breadth of 3.

SOERABAYA, ser-ba'-ya, a Dutch residency of the island of Java, on the N.E. coast. Pop. about 1,000,000.—The TOWN has a population of 60,000.

SOERKARTA, so-er-kar'-ta, a Dutch residency, near the centre of the island of Java. Pop. 400,000.

SOEST, so'-est, a town of Prussian Westphalia, 33 miles from Munster. It is inclosed by walls, and has various churches for different denominations of Christians. Manf. Linen, woollens, hosiery, leather, paper, and oil-mills. Pop. 9,500.—This was formerly one of the Hanseatic towns.

SŒUR, Hubert le, sur, an eminent French sculptor, who settled in England about 1630. He modelled and cast the statue of Charles I. at Charing Cross. The pedestal is from the design of Grinling Gibbons. The statue was not erected when the civil war burst forth; and the Parliament disposed of it to one John Rivet, a brazier, who lived at the "dial near Holborn Conduit." The brazier was ordered to break up the statue; but he, instead, concealed it by burying it in the ground, and, in 1674, after the Restoration, it was placed on its present site at the expense of the crown. A story used to be told about the artist's discovering that he had omitted the saddle-girth in his work, after the statue had been set up, and that thereupon he destroyed himself. But, unfortunately for this legend, it is shown that the sculptor died before the statue was erected; and, moreover, the saddle-girth is there. Le Sœur modelled many other works, which have been destroyed or lost. B. probably in France; D. in England, about 1670.

SOFALA, so-fa'-la, a city of Eastern Africa, situate at the mouth of a considerable river of the same name. At the time of the first arrival of the Portuguese, it was a place of great commercial importance. Since Mozambique became the capital of the Portuguese settlements, it has sunk into insignificance. The Portuguese, however, still maintain a fort here. Lat. 20° 15′ S. Lon. 34° 45′ E.—The RIVER has a course of about 200 miles, and is navigable only for small craft.

SOFIA, or SOPHIA, so-fi'-a, a city of European Turkey, on the Bogana, 85 miles from Nissa. It has a very extensive trade, which is for the most part in the hands of Greeks and Armenians, and contains a number of handsome baths and mosques; but the streets are narrow, uneven, and dirty. Pop. Estimated at 50,000. This place was founded by Justinian, on the ruins of the ancient Sardica.

SOLAGPOOR, so-haj-poor', a town of British India, in the district of Saugur and Nerbudda. It has a civil establishment, and is the capital of a territory with an area of 3,000 square miles and a population of 80,000.

SOHAM, so'-ham, an irregularly-built market-town of Cambridgeshire, on the Cam, 5 miles from Ely. It has a church, a spacious building, in the form of a cross; also a charity-school and almshouses. Pop. 4,800.

SOHO, so-ho', a suburb of Birmingham, where there are extensive iron-works. (See BIRMINGHAM.)

SOIGNIES, swoin'-ye, a town of Belgium, 25 miles from Brussels. It has both breweries and distilleries, and a trade in lime. Pop. 6,500.—The FOREST OF SOIGNIES stands to the S.E. of Brussels, and has a length of 15 miles and a breadth of 6. At its S. extremity is the field of Waterloo.

SOISSONS, swois'-sowng, a town of France, in the department of the Aisne, on the river Aisne, 18 miles from Laon. It is ill built, but has a cathedral, the church of Notre Dame, an academy, theatre, and a pleasant walk on the banks of the Aisne. Manf. Coarse linen, stockings, thread, leather, and ropes. Pop. 9,500.—Under the reign of Clovis this place was the capital of a kingdom. That monarch made it a residence at the commencement of his reign.—The CANAL of Soissons connects the Aisne with the Ourcq and the Marne.

SOK, sok, a river of Russia, rising in the government of Orenburg, and, after a course of 130 miles, joining the Volga 15 miles from Samara.

SOLANDER, Daniel Charles, so-lan'-der, an eminent Swedish naturalist, and the pupil of Linnæus. He took his degree as doctor of medicine at Upsal, and in 1760 visited England. At the request of Sir Joseph Banks, he accompanied him in the voyage round the world with Captain Cook. In 1773 he was appointed under-librarian of the British Museum. He wrote a "Description of the Collection of Petrifactions found in Hampshire," and given to the British Museum; "Observations on Natural History in Cook's Voyage," and left a mass of valuable manuscripts, which are contained in the British Museum. B. at Nordland, Sweden, 1736; D. 1782.

SOLANI, so-la'-ne, a river of India, which is crossed by the Ganges Canal by means of a magnificent aqueduct, erected at a cost of £300,000.

SOLANO, so-la'-no, a town of Spain, 103 miles from Madrid. Manf. Linen and woollen goods. Pop. 4,300.

SOLANO, F. M., Marquis of Socarro, a Spanish nobleman, who, in 1796, entered the army of the French republic as a volunteer. He subsequently became captain-general of Andalusia and governor of Madrid; but was, in 1808, killed by the people of the latter city for alleged sympathy with the French invaders. This was the first act of resistance offered by the Spaniards to Napoleon.

SOLARIO, Antonio de, so-la'-re-o, an eminent Italian painter, who was by birth a gipsy, whence he was termed Il Zingaro. He was taken into the house of Colantonio del Fiore, a Neapolitan artist, as a maker of iron implements. The daughter of Colantonio and Solario fell in love with each other; but the father declared that his child should marry no one whose reputation as a painter was not as great as his own. Solario thereupon proceeded to study the art, and, in nine years, made such progress that he gained Colantonio's consent to the marriage. This story closely resembles that told of Quentin Matsys. Solario also excelled as an illuminator of MSS. and Bibles. B. in the Abruzzi, about 1382; D. 1455.

SOLDAU, sol-dou, a town of E. Prussia, on the Polish frontier, 12 miles from Neidenburg. Pop. 2,000.

SOLDIN, sol'-din, a town of Prussia, 70 miles from Berlin. Manf. Woollen goods. Pop. 5,500.

SOLENT, THE, so'-lent, a part of the sea between the mainland and the Isle of Wight, having a length of 18 miles and a breadth of 3.

SOLESMES, so'-laim, a town of France, in the department of the North, 9 miles from Cambray. Manf. Cotton goods. Pop. 5,700.

SOLEURE, so'-lur' (Germ. SOLOTHURN, so-lo-toorn'), a town in the north of Switzerland, and the capital of a canton of the same name, 19 miles from Bern. It stands at the foot of Mount Jura, on the Aar, which divides it into two parts; and it has several good edifices, a museum with a collection of fossils from the Jura, a government-house, theatre, arsenal, barracks, college, and public library. Pop. 5,400. Here, in 1817, Kosciusko died. The CANTON has an area of 255 square miles and a population of 70,000. Rearing live-stock is the principal branch of industry.

SOLFATARA, sol-fa-ta'-ra, a lake of Italy, in the Campagna di Roma, near Tivoli, about 500 feet broad, and containing several floating islets. Near it are the ruined baths of Agrippa.

SOLFERINO, sol-fe-re'-no, a village of Italy, occupied by the Austrians on the 24th of June, 1859, when they were defeated by the French-Sardinian army at the battle which took its name from this village.

SOLIGNAC, Peter Joseph, Chevalier de, so'-leen-yak, a French historian, who became secretary to Stanislaus, king of Poland, and wrote a history of that country. His other works are, an "Eloge upon Stanislaus;" the "Amours of Horace;" and a treatise on education. B. at Montpellier, 1687; D. 1773.

SOLIKAMSK, sol-i-kamsk', an old town of European Russia, in the government of Perm, and 112 miles from Perm. It has salt-springs and copper-mines. Pop. 4,500.

SOLIMAN, Ebn Abd-al-Malek, sol-i-man', the seventh caliph of the Ommiyades race, who commenced his reign in 715. He conquered the territory upon the south coast of the Caspian, and dispatched his brother Moslemah to besiege Constantinople with a powerful fleet and army; but the fleet was destroyed by the Greek fire. He was about to proceed to reinforce Moslemah when he D. in Syria, 717.

SOLIMAN, Ebn Cutulmish, the founder of the first Turkish dynasty in Asia Minor. He was a Seljukian prince, and was, in 1074, provided with an army for the conquest of the West, by Malek Shah, sultan of Persia. He subjugated almost the whole of Asia Minor, and planted his capital at Nicæa, less than a hundred miles from Constantinople. In 1081 he obtained possession of Antioch by stratagem; but, refusing to pay tribute for the city, as its former masters, the Greeks, had done, he was involved in a war with its suzerain, Moslem-ebn-Korcish, prince of Aleppo, and is supposed to have been either killed in battle or to have perished by his own hand after a defeat, in 1086.

SOLIMAN, Ebn-al-Hakem, a Moorish chief, who became king of Cordova, in 1009. After undergoing various changes of fortune, he lost his kingdom and life in 1016. The discovery of the Azores is stated to have been made during his reign.

SOLIMAN, Tchelibi, 'the noble,' the son of Bajazet I., after whose defeat at Angora, by Timur, in 1402, he made his escape to Europe, and established himself at Adrianople, where he reigned during several years. In 1406 he attempted to subdue the Asiatic provinces, but was recalled to Adrianople by an insurrection excited against his rule by his brother Mousa, who was defeated. The latter again marched against Soliman in 1410, and defeated and slew him, near Adrianople. Mousa was himself dethroned in 1413, by Mahomet I. Soliman was a patron of literature, and one of the bravest and most generous princes of the line of Othman.

SOLIMAN I. (tenth Ottoman sultan), surnamed the Magnificent, succeeded his father Selim I. in 1520. Having concluded a truce with Ismael, sophi of Persia, and quelled a rebellion in Syria, he turned his arms against Europe. In 1521 he took Belgrade, and in the following year Rhodes fell into his hands, after an obstinate defence. In 1529 he made himself master of Buda, and then laid siege to Vienna, whence he was obliged to retreat, with the loss of 120,000 men. In 1534 he marched into the East, and took Tauris from the Persians, but was soon afterwards defeated by the Shah. His forces were also repulsed before Malta; but he took the isle of Chios in 1566. He was a poet, legislator, and warrior of eminent greatness for an Oriental. He encouraged arts and literature, made roads, bridges, erected noble mosques and public buildings, and superintended the compilation of an administrative code. B. 1493; D. at Szigeth, Hungary, 1566.

SOLIMAN II. became sultan upon the deposition of his brother, Mahomet IV., in 1687. His life had been spent, up to his 49th year, in the seraglio, where he had devoted himself to the study of the Koran. Under his weak rule, the Turks were defeated in Hungary and in Servia. D. at Constantinople, 1691.

SOLIMENA, Francis, so-le-mai'-na, an Italian painter, whose reputation was so great that many princes of Europe invited him to their courts, which he declined. The emperor Charles VI. conferred on him the honour of knighthood. He was also a poet. B. near Naples, 1657; D. at Naples, 1747.

SOLIMOENS, so'-li-mo-ens, a name given to the river Amazon. (See AMAZON.)

SOLINUS, Caius Julius, so-li'-nus, a Roman writer, whose "Polyhistor," a compilation of historical and geographical remarks, was published by Salmasius at Paris, in 1629. Solinus has been called Pliny's ape, from his having so closely followed that writer. Supposed to have lived in the 3rd century.

SOLIS, Antonio de, so'-lees, a Spanish historian and dramatic poet. He became secretary to Philip IV., and historiographer of the Indies, but afterwards entered into holy orders. He wrote many comedies and poems, but his great work is the "History of the Conquest of Mexico." It has been translated into English by Townshend. B. at Placenzia, 1610; D. 1686.

SOLIS, Juan Diaz de, an eminent Spanish navigator, who, with Pinzon, discovered Yucatan, in 1507, explored the bay of Rio Janeiro in 1512, and learning from the natives that a great river (Paraguaya) existed further along the coast, he set sail for Spain, and obtained the king's permission to make conquests upon its banks. He returned to Rio Janeiro, and proceeding in a south-westerly route, landed near a river between Realdonado and Montevideo; but was there killed by the Indians, in 1515.

SOLLOGUB, Count Vladimir Alexandrowitch, a modern Russian novelist and poet, who, after acting as attaché to the Russian embassy at Vienna, turned his attention to literature, and in 1841 produced a novel called "Tarantas; or, Travelling Impressions of Young Russia." This book became very popular, and was, soon after publication, translated into the English and other languages. He subsequently wrote other works of fiction, some essays, plays, and a collection of poetical pieces. In 1850 he was rewarded with the appointment of state-councillor in the government of Transcaucasia. His latest contributions to the literature of his country consist of articles sent from Tiflis to the "Transactions of the St. Petersburg Geographical Society." He is a spirited and witty writer. B. at St. Petersburg, about 1815.

SOLLER, sol'-lair, a town of Spain, in the island of Majorca, 14 miles from Palma. It has a harbour, defended by two forts, and exports oranges and wine. Pop. 7,000.

SOLMS, solmes, an old principality of Germany, situate on the Lahn, now subdivided into several mediatized principalities, belonging to different branches of the house of Solms.

SOLOFRA, sol'-lo-fra, a town of Naples, Principato Ultra, 7 miles from Avellino. Manf. Woollens, leather, and jewellery. Pop. 6,400.

SOLOMON, sol'-o-mon, king of Israel, was the son of David and Bathsheba. He was anointed king B.C. 1015. His reign was glorious, and the fame of his wisdom spread into distant regions; so that the most illustrious persons visited Jerusalem to hear him, "for he spake three thousand proverbs, and his songs were a thousand and five." He built a magnificent palace for himself, and a famous temple to the Lord, which he dedicated with great solemnity. In his latter years he tarnished his glory by falling into idolatrous and licentious practices. The sacred canon contains three of his books,—the "Proverbs," a miscellaneous body of ethical sentences; the "Ecclesiastes," a treatise on human vanity; and the "Song of Solomon." In the Apocrypha there is a book called the "Wisdom of Solomon," though it is of more modern date. During his reign the kingdom of Israel attained its greatest prosperity; but the commencement of its decline dates from his death. B. 1033 B.C.; D. 975 B.C.

SOLOMON, Ben Job Jalla, an African prince, who being sent by his father, in 1731, to the sea-coast to sell slaves, was taken prisoner, and sold to an English captain, by whom he was carried to America, and disposed of to a planter. General Oglethorpe purchased his freedom, and brought him to England. While in England he was employed in the library of Sir Hans Sloane in translating Arabic manuscripts. He was afterwards sent back to his own country with many valuable presents.

SOLOMON BEN VIRGA, a Spanish rabbi and physician, who wrote a history of the Jews, from the destruction of the Temple to his own time, a Latin version of which was printed at Amsterdam in 1651. Flourished in the 16th century.

SOLOMON ISLANDS, a group in the South Pacific Ocean. The principal are, Bougainville, Bouka, Choiseul, Guadalcanar, St. Ysabel, Arsacides, Malayta, and St. Christoval. Desc. Volcanic but fertile, and abounding in woods. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. between 5° and 12° S. Lon. between 154° and 163° E.—Also a group in the Indian Ocean.

SOLON, so'-lon, legislator of Athens, and one of the seven wise men of Greece. He was descended from the royal house of Codrus, and was the relation of Pisistratus. After studying philosophy at Athens, he travelled into various countries to increase his knowledge. On his return home, he found his countrymen divided by faction, and the state reduced to a wretched condition. Having composed a poem upon the loss of Salamis, he recited it in the Agora with so much effect that an expedition was organized for the recovery of the place. Of that undertaking, Solon was appointed the chief, and the result proving brilliantly successful, he became the most popular man in the state, and was soon afterwards unanimously elected archon and sovereign legislator. He discharged his high office with great wisdom and integrity, introducing reforms in every department, ameliorating the condition of the poor, and amending the rigorous code of Draco. After completing his legislation, he asked to be allowed to retire from Athens for ten years, which request being acceded to, he went upon a journey into Egypt and Asia Minor. Subsequently to his return, Pisistratus became tyrant of Athens, and Solon, finding that he could not prevent his retaining absolute power, encouraged him to rule the people with moderation. B. in the island of Salamis, about B.C. 638; D. about B.C. 559.—For an account of Solon's laws, see Thirlwall's "History of Greece," vol. ii.

SOLOR, so'-lor, an island of the Malay Archipelago, off the E. extremity of Flores. Ext. 30 miles long, with a breadth of 15. Lat. 8° 47' S. Lon. 123° 8' E.

SOLTIKOV, Simon, sol'-ti-kof, a Russian general, who was the favourite of the empress Elizabeth, and commanded the army which defeated Frederick the Great at Kunersdorff. He became a marshal, and governor of Moscow. D. 1772.

SOLTIKOV, Ivan, a Russian general, and son of the preceding. He conducted two highly successful campaigns against the Swedes, and was, in 1796, created a marshal by Paul I., and, in the following year, governor of Moscow. D. at Moscow, 1805.

SOLTIKOV, Count Sergius, was of the same family as the preceding, and was the first lover of Catherine II., while she was yet grand-duchess. He was banished from court by the empress Elizabeth, and took up his residence in Sweden, where he died.

SOLWAY FIRTH, sol'-wai, a navigable arm of the sea, extending eastward from the Irish Sea, and forming a part of the boundary of England and Scotland. It runs inland for about 40 miles, and progressively diminishes in breadth to 1¼ from 24. Several rivers fall into it.

SOMBREUIL, Mademoiselle de, som'-bru(r)-e, daughter of the governor of the Invalides, with whom she was, in 1792, thrown into the prison of the Abbaye. When the massacre of the prisoners in that place occurred, she, in order to save her father's life, consented to drink a glass of blood. Despite her devotedness, he perished a few months afterwards. D. 1823.

SOMERS, John Lord, sum'-ers, an eminent English lawyer and writer upon jurisprudence, who was educated at Trinity College, Oxford, whence he removed to the Middle Temple. He distinguished himself at the bar, and, in 1681, was concerned in writing a piece entitled, "A Just and Modest Vindication of the Proceedings of the two last Parliaments." He was one of the counsel for the seven bishops; in the Convention Parliament he represented the city of Worcester, and, after the flight of James II., was one of the managers for the House of Commons, at a conference with the Lords upon the word "abdicated." After the prince of Orange ascended the English throne as William III., Somers was appointed solicitor-general, and, in 1692, attorney-general and lord keeper. In 1697 he was made chancellor, with the title of Lord Somers; but, in 1700, the seals were taken from him, and he was impeached of high crimes and misdemeanours; he was, however, acquitted by the Lords. Between the years 1708-10 he was president of the council, under Queen Anne; but, after the latter date, his health became too infirm to admit of his playing any important part in the politics of his time. A collection of scarce pamphlets, principally from his library, was published in 1748, under the title of "Somers's Tracts," and, afterwards, in 1815, upon which occasion the "Tracts" were edited by Sir

Walter Scott. The principal works of Lord Somers were—"Brief History of the Succession of the Crown of England," and "The Security of Englishmen's Lives; or, the Trust, Power, and Duties of the Grand Juries of England." Burke, in his "Reflections on the Revolution in France," observed: "I never desire to be thought a better Whig than Lord Somers, or to understand the principles of the revolution of 1688 better than those by whom it was brought about." Lord Somers was a great constitutional lawyer, a virtuous patriot, and a patron of learning. D. at Worcester, about 1650; D. 1716.

SOMERSET, sum'-er-set, the name of several counties in the United States.—1. In Maine. Area, 3,840 square miles. Pop. 36,000.—2. In New Jersey. Area, 232 square miles. Pop. 20,000.—3. On the south side of Pennsylvania. Area, 1,000 square miles. Pop. 25,000.—4. In Maryland. Area, 500 square miles. Pop. 25,000.—Also numerous townships, none of them with a population above 3,000.

SOMERSET, a county in the E. part of Tasmania, Van Diemen's Land. It is watered by several rivers.

SOMERSET, a division of the Cape Colony, S. Africa, intersected by the Great Fish River. Wheat and barley are the principal crops, and sheep and cattle are reared. Area, 4,000 square miles. Lat. between 30° 20′ and 33° 25′ S. Lon. between 25° 12′ and 26° 45′ E.—The capital town is 80 miles from Graham-Town.

SOMERSET, NORTH, a tract in the Arctic region of British N. America, forming the N. part of Boothia Felix. It was discovered by Sir E. Parry in 1819. Lat. between 73° and 74° N. Lon. W. of 90° W., and having E. Prince-Regent Inlet. On the N., Barrow Strait separates it from Cornwallis Island; and Cape Clarence is its N.E. extremity.

SOMERSET, Robert Carr, more properly Ker, Viscount Rochester, and afterwards Earl of, one of the favourites of James I. He was a descendant of the Kers of Fernihurst, and was at first a sewer or page to the earl of Dunbar. Sir Thomas Overbury, while on a visit to Scotland, became acquainted with him, and brought him to London, where he was introduced to the notice of King James, who made him his favourite, with the intention of teaching him Latin. The handsome Ker rose rapidly; he was created a knight of the Bath, Viscount Rochester, and, upon his marriage with the profligate countess of Essex, in 1613, earl of Somerset. The accomplished Sir Thomas Overbury had assisted Ker with his pen until this period. He had, however, always opposed the marriage, and when he found that his advice had been so completely disregarded, his resentment towards the countess of Essex was expressed in bitter satire, and in conversation. Through the machinations of the countess, Overbury was committed to the Tower, where, some time afterwards, his death took place in a mysterious manner. (See OVERBURY, Sir Thomas.) During two years, the earl of Somerset and his wife rested under the suspicion of having got rid of Overbury by poison. In 1615, James having by this time taken into his favour George Villiers, another handsome youth, Somerset and his countess were brought to trial. Their guilt was clearly established; nevertheless, they escaped, while their agents were executed. Somerset lost the king's favour, and retired into the country, with his wife, upon a pension of £4,000 per annum. The old king invited him to court a year before his death; but Ker never again appeared in public life. D. 1645.

SOMERSETSHIRE, sum'-er-set-sheer, a maritime county of England, bounded on the N.W. by the Bristol Channel; N. by Gloucestershire and the county and city of Bristol; E. and S. E. by Wiltshire and Dorsetshire; and S. and W. by Devonshire. Area, 1,645 square miles. Desc. Diversified, and possessing every gradation of surface, from the lofty mountain and barren moor, to the rich and highly cultivated vale, and thence descending to the unimproved and unimprovable marsh and fen. The Quantock hills extend northward from Taunton, and descend into a cultivated vale of some extent. Westward, the county is entirely mountainous and hilly, and is divided into various ranges, running from east to west, and from which numerous lateral branches are detached. Along the slope and skirts of the hills, the low land is dry and well cultivated; but thence towards the coast it forms a vast and wide-spreading district of water-formed lands known by the name of the Marshes; in the middle of which, and separating them into two great divisions, runs an elevated range. Rivers. These rise chiefly in the high grounds within the county, and none of them are of any great magnitude, except the Avon, which rises in Wiltshire, and divides the county from Gloucestershire. It is the principal river. The others are the Parret, the Ivel, the Tone, the Brue, and the Axe. Pro. This county stands high in reputation for its agricultural and rural produce. The plains are remarkable for their luxuriant herbage, which furnishes not only a sufficiency for its own consumption, but also a considerable surplus for other markets. London, Bristol, Salisbury, and other parts of the kingdom, are annually supplied with oxen, sheep, and hogs, together with farm produce in great abundance. Grazing and the dairy form the great objects of the husbandry of the hill district; grain not being raised to such an extent as to supply its own consumption, so that vast quantities are imported from the adjacent counties of Wilts and Dorset. The best goose feathers for beds come from the marshes here. Much cheese is made in the lower parts of the county; and that of the Chedder district is said to exceed any in the kingdom. Minerals. Lead, calamine, and coal, the latter of which is also found in great abundance, and, in various parts, to the north of the Mendip hills. Besides these, limestone, paving-stone, tiling-stone, freestone, marl, and fullers' earth, are found in different parts of the county. Manf. These consist chiefly of articles of clothing, such as woollens, silks, gloves, linens, and stockings. Paper, glass, ironwares, wool-cards, leather, and sheets, are also made. Several canals facilitate its intercourse with the adjacent districts. Pop. 445,000. This county in Saxon times was the scene of many important events.

SOMERSWORTH, sum'-ers-werth, a township of the United States, New Hampshire, 33 miles from Concord. Manf. Cotton and woollen goods. Pop. 5,000.

SOMERTON, sum'-er-ton, a market-town and borough of Somersetshire, on a branch of the river Parret, 5 miles from Ilchester. It has a church, an excellent free school, and a well-endowed almshouse. Pop. 2,200.—Somerton is supposed to have been a Roman citadel, and a residence of the W. Saxon kings.—The name of several other parishes in England.

SOMERVILLE, Mrs. Mary, sum'-er-vil, an eminent modern scientific writer, who is stated to have been instructed in the mathematical and physical sciences by her father, an officer in the Royal Marines. After becoming the wife of Dr. Somerville, she distinguished herself by making some experiments on the magnetic influence of the solar rays of the spectrum. It was to Lord Brougham, however, that her introduction to scientific literature was chiefly due. That enlightened nobleman engaged her to supply the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge with a popular resumé of the great work of the French mathematician Laplace, entitled the "Mécanique Céleste." The popular account of this profound work was given to the public under the title of "The Mechanism of the Heavens," in 1832. She subsequently produced—"On the Connection of the Physical Sciences," and "Physical Geography." Her services to literature were acknowledged by an honorary membership of the Royal Astronomical Society, and a pension of £300 per annum from the civil-list fund. In her admirable works, such abstruse subjects as gravitation, the figure of the earth, the tides, heat, electricity, and comets, are treated of with a clearness, easiness, and precision of style which make her writings a valuable offering to the non-scientific reader. B. at Burntisland, Fifeshire, 1790.

SOMERVILLE, William, an English poet, who, after completing his education at the university of Oxford, settled upon his paternal estate, where he diverted his leisure with poetical composition. He wrote "The Chase," "Field Sports," some fables and tales. B. at Edstone, Warwickshire, 1692.

SOMMA, som'-ma, a town of Italy, situate at the foot of Vesuvius, 9 miles from Naples. It has a castle, an hospital, and a trade in wine and fruits. Pop. 7,500.

SOMMA, a town of Lombardy, 4 miles from the Lake

Maggiore. Pop. 3,200.—Here the Romans were defeated by Hannibal, shortly after his passage of the Alps.

SOMMARIVA, John Baptist de, som'-ma-re'-va, director of the Cisalpine republic. He was educated for the law, and practised as an advocate until the outburst of the French revolution, when, adopting the republican theories, which at that period were the passport of an able and ambitious man to fame and position, he became secretary-general of the directory of the Cisalpine republic, and subsequently director. After the Austrian occupation, he took up his residence at Paris. He was a man of cultivated tastes, and expended the whole of his large fortune in forming a collection of art-treasures which became famous throughout Europe. B. at Milan, about 1760; D. 1826.

SOMME, som, a river of France, rising in the department Aisne, and, after a course of 115 miles, falling into the English Channel between Crotoy and St. Valery.

SOMME, a maritime department in the north of France, comprising the western part of Picardy, and bounded W. by the English Channel and N. by the department of the Pas-de-Calais. Area, 2,368 square miles. Desc. Generally flat, but fertile. Rivers. The Somme. Pro. Corn, hemp, lint, hops, apples, and inferior wines. Its marshes furnish large quantities of turf. Manf. Cotton and woollen goods, soap, paper, beetroot, and sugar. Pop. 571,000.—This department is traversed by the Northern Railway, and by the one which runs from Boulogne to Amiens.

SOMMEN, som'-men, a lake of Sweden, 15 miles E. of Lake Wetter. Ext. 25 miles long and 8 broad.

SOMMERVILLE, sum'-er-vil, the name of several townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 4,000.

SOMMIÈRES, som'-me-air, a town of France, in the department of the Gard, 14 miles from Nimes. Pop. 4,000.

SOMNER, William, som'-ner, a learned English antiquary, who published "The Antiquities of Canterbury," a "Saxon Dictionary," and a treatise on "The Roman Ports and Forts in Kent." B. at Canterbury, 1606; D. 1669.

SOMNUS, som'-nus, son of Erebus and Nox, one of the infernal deities, who presided over sleep. According to Hesiod, his palace is a dark cave, where the sun never penetrates. At the entrance are a number of poppies and somniferous herbs. The god himself is represented as asleep on a bed of feathers, with black curtains. The Dreams stand by him, and Morpheus, as his principal minister, guards his slumbers from interruption.

SONDERHAUSEN, son-der-how'-zen, a town of central Germany, 28 miles from Erfurt. It has a castle and a gymnasium, and is the residence of a prince. Pop. 5,500.

SONE, sone, a river of India, tributary to the Ganges, joining the Patna after a course of 465 miles.

SONEPORE, sone'-por, a raj of India, subject to Bengal. Area, 1,167 square miles. Pop. 66,000. Lat. of centre, 21° N. Lon. 84° E.

SONNEBURG, son'-ne-boorg, a town of Prussia, 11 miles from Custrin. Manf. Woollen goods. Pop. 5,600.

SONNENBERG, son'-nen-bairg, a town of Germany, 40 miles from Weimar. Manf. Toys and musical instruments. Pop. 4,000.

SONNERAT, Peter, son'-ne-ra, an eminent French traveller, who, early in life, was taken by his father to the Isle of France (Mauritius). His life was spent in travelling and exploration. He introduced the bread-fruit, the cocoa, and other trees to the islands of France and Bourbon. His principal works were,—"Voyage to New Guinea," and "Voyage to the East Indies and China." B. at Lyons, 1745; D. at Paris, 1814.

SONNINI DE MANONCOURT, Charles Nicholas Sigisbert, son-ne'-ne, an eminent French naturalist, who entered the service of his country as marine engineer, and, in 1772, was dispatched to the colony of Cayenne, where he rendered great services, for which he was created lieutenant. He was subsequently engaged as engineer in Africa, and, after travelling in Greece and Asia Minor, he returned to France; but his post having been taken from him at the Revolution, he devoted himself to science. He wrote "Travels in Upper and Lower Egypt;" "Travels in Greece and Turkey;" and also contributed to the "Natural History" of Buffon. B. at Luneville, 1751; D. at Paris, 1812.

SONORA, so-no'-ra, the most N.W. department of the Mexican Confederation, extending along the Gulf of California, and bounded W. by the sea, S. by the province of Guadalaxara, and E. and S. by the departments Chihuahua and Sinaloa. Its northern limits are very uncertain. Desc. Greatly diversified and well watered. Pro. European grains, cotton, wine, and live-stock. Minerals. Gold, silver, and pearls. Pop. Unascertained, but small. Lat. extending to the N. from lat. 27°. Lon. between 107° 30′ and 113° W.—Also a TOWN in the department. Pop. 8,500.—Also a RIVER, which gives its name to the department. Length, about 300 miles.

SONSONATE, son-so-na'-tai, a town of Central America, 50 miles from San Salvador. It stands in an extremely rich district, and has some splendid churches. Pop. 10,000.

SOOLOO ISLES, soo-loo', a chain of islands, deriving their name from Sooloo, the principal island in the group, in the Eastern Archipelago. They extend from Borneo to Mindanao, and are comprehended between lat. 4° and 7° N. The island of Sooloo is situate in lat. 6° N., lon. 119° E., and has an extent of 30 miles long and 12 broad. Pop. Unascertained.

SOONDA, soon'-da, the capital of a district of Hindostan, formerly extensive and populous; but being taken by Hyder Ali, it was destroyed. Lat. 14° 34′ N. Lon. 74° 58′ E.

SOOPA, soo'-pa, the principal place of a subdivision in the presidency of Madras, British India. Pop. Unascertained.—The SUBDIVISION has an area of 2,052 square miles and a population of 38,000.

SOPHIA, so-fi'-a, princess and regent of Russia. She was the daughter of Alexis Michaelowitch by his first marriage, as Peter the Great was the offspring of the second. When Peter and Ivan V. were proclaimed joint sovereigns of Russia, Sophia was intrusted with the high functions of regent. She was an ambitious and turbulent woman, and excited a revolt against Peter, whom she wished to remove from the government, but was defeated and banished. She D. in a convent, 1704.

SOPHOCLES, sof'-o-klees, a celebrated tragic poet of Athens. His first tragedy was produced upon the stage B.C. 468, and upon that occasion he won the prize, although he contended against Æschylus, the greatest dramatist of his time. In 440 B.C. he brought out his thirty-second play; after which he distinguished himself as a statesman and a general. Sharing the command with Pericles, he bore an honourable part in several battles. Of his private life nothing is known. He is stated to have composed 130 plays, and, although he had Æschylus, Euripides, and other illustrious writers for his rivals, he gained the first prize twenty times. Only seven complete plays of his are extant. There are several English translations of his works. B. 495 B.C.; D. 406 B.C.

SOPHONISBA, sof'-o-nis'-ba, the daughter of Hasdrubal, general of the Carthaginian forces, and the wife of Syphax, king of Numidia. When her husband was defeated by Masinissa, she fell into the hands of the victor, who married her. This union, however, was soon interrupted by Scipio Africanus, who obliged Masinissa to quit his new spouse; on which she poisoned herself, B.C. 203.

SORA, so'-ra, a town of Naples, on the Garigliano, 60 miles from Naples. It has a cathedral and the remains of a Gothic castle. Pop. 8,000.

SORANUS, so-rai'-nus, a physician of Ephesus, who practised at Rome under Trajan and Hadrian. Some of his medical treatises are extant, and were published in Greek, at Paris, in 1554, and at Basil in 1528. Flourished in the 1st century.

SORAU, so'-rou, a town of Prussia, in the province of Brandenburg, 56 miles from Frankfort. Manf. Woollen and linen goods. Pop. 8,000. It has a station on the railway from Berlin to Silesia.

SORBIÈRE, Samuel, sor'-be-air, a French writer, who abandoned the study of divinity for that of physic. He corresponded with Hobbes, whose letters he used to send to Gassendi as his own, and having transcribed the answers, sent them to Hobbes, who, in consequence, conceived a high opinion of his abilities. His "Journey to England" is full of gross falsehoods, and his other works are trifling. B. in France, 1615; D. at Rome, 1670.

SORBONNE, Robert de, sor'-bun, a learned French ecclesiastic, and founder of the college at Paris which bears his name. He was confessor and chaplain to St. Louis, who had a great esteem for him, and gave him the canonry of Cambray. He founded the college of the Sorbonne in 1252. B. in Champagne, 1201; D. 1274.

SORBY, Henry Clinton, sor'-be, a modern English geologist, who contributed some excellent papers on the structure of rocks, to the Transactions and Proceedings of the learned societies of England. He was elected fellow of the Royal Society in 1857. B. at Sheffield, 1826.

SOREL, or WILLIAM-HENRY, sor'-el, a town of Lower Canada, situate at the confluence of the Richlieu, or Sorel river, with the St. Lawrence, 35 miles from Three Rivers. It has a barracks, an arsenal, and a fort. Pop. Unascertained.

SOSIGENES, so-sij'-e-nees, an astronomer of Egypt, who was invited to Rome by Julius Cæsar, for the reformation of the calendar. He fixed the year at 365 days, called the Julian year, which commenced B.C. 46. His works are lost.

SOSTRATUS, sos'-tra-tus, a celebrated architect of Cnidos, who was invited to Egypt by Ptolemy Philadelphus, at whose command he constructed the tower of Pharos, in the Bay of Alexandria, on which he placed this inscription:—"Sostratus, of Cnidos, son of Lexiphanes, to the gods who protect navigation." This structure was one of the seven wonders of the ancient world. He flourished 273 B.C.

SOTADES, sot'-a-dees, a Grecian poet, who invented a kind of irregular iambics, which were called by his name. Having written a satire against Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, he was thrown into the sea in a chest of lead. Flourished in the 3rd century B.C.

SOTHEBY, William, sothe'-be, an English writer, who, after serving as an officer in the 10th dragoons, retired to his estate near Southampton, where, as well as in London at a subsequent period, he devoted his leisure to literature. He produced some tragedies and poems, and translated Wieland's "Oberon," the "Georgics" of Virgil, and Homer's "Iliad" and "Odyssey." B. in London, 1757; D. 1833.

SOTO, Dominic, so'-to, a learned Spanish divine, who studied at Alcala and at Paris; after which he entered among the Dominicans. He became professor of divinity at Salamanca, and was appointed confessor to Charles V., who sent him to the council of Trent. His principal works are, "Commentary on the Epistle to the Romans," commentaries upon Aristotle, and some Latin treatises on theology. B. at Segovia, 1494; D. at Sulamanca, 1560.—There was another Dominican of this name, who went to England with Philip II., husband of Mary, for the purpose of restoring the Roman Catholic religion in the two universities. He wrote some theological works. D. 1563.

SOTO, Ferdinand de, a Spanish adventurer, who accompanied Pizarro to Peru. He subsequently obtained from Charles V. the required permission to conquer Florida, and was also nominated governor of Cuba. In 1528 he restored Havannah, which had been despoiled by some French pirates. In 1539 he penetrated into Florida, and made several expeditions to the neighbouring countries, in one of which he was slain, about 1542.

SOTTEVILLE, sot'-veel, the name of several parishes in France, none of them with a population above 5,000.

SOUBISE, Benjamin de Rohan, baron of Frontenai, soo'-beese, a celebrated French Huguenot general. He was the brother of the duke de Rohan, the chief of the Reform party, and acquired the art of war under Maurice of Nassau, in Holland. In 1621 the Protestant assembly of Rochelle invested him with the command in Brittany, Anjou, and Poitou. Louis XIII. in person besieged him in St. Jean d'Angeli, and summoned him to surrender; upon which Soubise wrote in reply, "I am his majesty's very humble servant; but the execution of his commands is not in my power.—BENJAMIN DE ROHAN." The place was, however, taken by the king, after an obstinate defence of a month. Soubise received the royal pardon, but he did not desert the cause of the Reformation; and in 1622, at the head of 8,000 men, he made himself master of Olonne and threatened Nantes. On being again defeated and proscribed as a rebel, he fled to Rochelle, and afterwards repaired to England and next to Germany, to implore succours; but failed in both countries. He received the royal pardon in 1622, and remained peaceable during three years; but, at the termination of that period, he suddenly seized upon the Isle of Rhé, made a dash upon the royal fleet at Blavet, in Brittany, boarded and took the vessels, and cannonaded the fort, by which he was repulsed. He, however, maintained the command of the sea between Nantes and Bordeaux. Proclaimed admiral of the Protestant church, he next gave battle to the royal fleet, but was defeated, after a smart engagement; upon which he attacked the royalists at the Isle of Rhé with 3,000 men. Again vanquished, he had recourse to flight, and, passing over to England, induced Charles I. to interpose in his behalf. Although Charles obtained his pardon, Soubise remained in England, and soon afterwards sailed with an English fleet, under the command of the duke of Buckingham, for Rochelle, where they were refused admittance. A second expedition, under Denbigh, the brother-in-law of Buckingham, also failed. Still Soubise persevered; and a third expedition was about to set sail from Plymouth, when Buckingham, who was to have had the command of it, was assassinated by Felton. The English officers who had seen Soubise and the duke in animated conversation a few hours before, and not being acquainted with the French language, accused the Huguenot leader of the murder. Soubise would probably have been sacrificed to the popular resentment, had not Felton come forward and admitted the deed. The earl of Lindsey took the command; but, while he and Soubise were quarrelling together, the Rochellais were compelled to capitulate. His after-years, during which he was constantly intriguing against the French monarchy, were passed in England. B. 1589; D. in England, 1641.

SOUCHAI, John Baptist, soo'-shai, a French writer, who was counsellor to the king, and professor of eloquence in the royal college. He published a translation of Sir Thomas Browne's "Vulgar Errors," an edition of Ausonius, and dissertations in the "Memoirs of the Academy of Belles-Lettres." B. near Vendôme, 1687; D. 1746.

SOUCIET, Stephen, soo'-se-ai, a French divine, who was librarian in the college of Louis the Great. His works are—"Astronomical Observations made in China;" "Dissertations on Difficult Passages of Scripture;" "Dissertations against the Chronology of Sir Isaac Newton." B. in France, 1671; D. 1744.

SOUDAN, soo'-dan, the name given by the Moors of Northern Africa to a vast tract of territory in the interior of that continent. (See NIGRITIA.)

SOUFFLOT, James Germain, soof'-flo, a French architect, who improved himself in Italy, and, on his return to France, became superintendent of the royal buildings. His greatest work is the church of St. Geneviève at Paris. B. near Auxerre, 1714; D. 1781.

Soulié, Melchior Frederick, soo'-le-ai, a French novelist and dramatist, who was educated for the bar, and was admitted as an advocate; but, obtaining little practice, he turned his attention to literature, for which he had always a marked predilection. He produced a small collection of poems, in a volume entitled "Amours Françaises," which attracted no notice. The young author, left without any resources, was compelled to take service as foreman to an upholsterer. In this situation he remained until 1828, when his drama entitled "Romeo and Juliet" having been successful upon the stage, he was enabled to take his place among the littérateurs of his day. With the production of "Clotilde" his reputation as a dramatist was fixed. He next commenced contributing romances to the French newspapers, and succeeded so well in this new walk, that in a short time he became the most popular romancist of the day. This position he occupied until 1843, when Dumas and Eugene Sue, following in his steps, somewhat eclipsed his fame. He remained, however, a popular writer until his death. His best romances are—"Mémoires du Diable," "Deux Cadavres," and "L'Homme de Lettres." B. at Foix, department of Ariège, 1800; D. at Bièvre, 1847.

Souloque, or Faustin I., soo-look', ex-emperor of Hayti, was born a slave, but was manumitted while in his childhood. At 14 he assisted in expelling the French from Hayti. He rose through the different grades of the republican army until, in 1840, he declared himself emperor; in which capacity he evinced himself a cruel, violent, and ignorant individual. He was driven from Hayti in 1859, and, after first seeking an asylum at Jamaica, retired to the south of France. B. 1789.

Soult, Nicholas Jean-de-Dieu, soult, marshal of France and duke of Dalmatia. The son of a notary, he was designed for the same profession; but while at college, he evinced so great a distaste for study, that he was permitted to follow the bent of his own inclinations, which were decidedly military; and, accordingly, he entered the army as a private soldier in 1785. His progress was at first slow enough; in 1791 he was but a sergeant. In that year, however, Marshal Luckner, having noticed him, gave him a commission as sub-lieutenant, and appointed him to drill a regiment of volunteers. During the subsequent nine years, Soult distinguished himself in more than twenty fights, and his rise was consequently rapid. He was a general in 1800, at which time he was appointed commander-in-chief in Piedmont. During the short suspension of hostilities which followed the peace of Amiens, he resided at Paris, where he lost no opportunity of conciliating the favour of Bonaparte, who was at first prejudiced against him. He succeeded so well, that, although he had never fought under Napoleon, he was one of the marshals created by the emperor on his coronation. He was next appointed to organize the great army assembled upon the heights of Boulogne, and called the Army of England. His conduct at Austerlitz, in 1805, was so brilliant that, after the battle, Napoleon thanked him, and called him one of the best of living strategists. Now acknowledged as among the most skilful of the French generals, he maintained this brilliant reputation throughout the German campaign of 1806-7. In 1808 he was sent to Spain; and, after having entered Madrid, he was directed to intercept Sir John Moore, who was marching from Portugal. The English commander, apprehensive of being hemmed in, commenced his retreat upon Corunna, whither he was followed by Soult; but, upon that glorious field, where Sir John Moore fell, the English made a stand, and inflicted a decisive repulse upon their assailants, who suffered too much to prevent the British troops from embarking in their vessels. Soon afterwards he was met by his great opponent Wellington, who, passing the Douro, drove the French general from his position, captured nearly all his artillery, and his suite and baggage. Soult made a masterly retreat through Galicia and upon Zamora. He next superseded Marshal Jourdan as major-general of the army of Spain. In 1810 he established himself in the rich province of Andalusia, and, in order to relieve Massena in Portugal, he was commanded by Napoleon to besiege Badajoz, which was taken in the following year. Massena was, nevertheless, compelled to evacuate Portugal, after many fruitless attacks upon the strong lines of Torres Vedras. Thus relieved of a formidable opponent, Wellington resolved to retake Badajoz. Soult prepared to relieve the fortress, but was totally defeated at Albuera. The English were, however, compelled to raise the siege in consequence of the advance of Marmont. But in 1812, Wellington re-appeared before Badajoz, which, after a terrible conflict, was captured by him. Soult was thus compelled to retreat from Seville; the defeat of Marmont at Salamanca, and the surrender of Madrid to Wellington, caused Soult to abandon Andalusia, which he had held during three years. In 1813 he was recalled from the Peninsula by the emperor; but the disaster experienced by the French at Vittoria compelled Napoleon to send him once more to Spain. Now followed the most brilliant period of Soult's career, one wherein he displayed consummate skill as a general; but he was overmatched by the English commander, who, although Soult defended himself undauntedly wherever he could take up a position, drove the enemy before him, until French territory was entered and Toulouse taken possession of, in 1814. After the abdication of Napoleon, Soult attached himself to the Bourbons, and was appointed minister of war; but when Napoleon re-appeared in Paris, he again took service under his old master. As quarter-master-general he fought at Waterloo, after which he was banished from France. He was, nevertheless, permitted to return in 1819. Charles X. created him a peer; he became minister of war under Louis Philippe, who sent him as his representative to the coronation of Queen Victoria. The same monarch also created him marshal-general of France, a dignity which had lain in abeyance since the death of Marshal Turenne. Soult was only excelled in his knowledge of the art of war by the emperor and his great opponent, the duke of Wellington. His conduct in the province of Andalusia, where he levied cruel extortions upon the population and robbed the convents and mansions of the nobles of the pictures or whatever valuables his agents could pounce upon, reflects great discredit upon his name. B. at Saint Amand-du-Tarn, either 1765 or 1769; D. at the castle of Soult-Berg, 1851.

MARSHAL SOULT.

Soultz, soultz, the name of several parishes and towns in France, none of them with a population above 4,000.

Sound, or Oresound, sound, the strait or narrow sea between the island of Zealand, in Denmark, and the continent of Sweden, through which vessels pass from the North Sea into the Baltic. It is about 4 miles across, and the Danes were wont to exact a toll on all ships that passed through it.

SOUR, or TSOUR, soor, a seaport-town of Syria, 28 miles from Acre. It is situate on the E. part of a peninsula, which in antiquity was the site of the maritime city of Tyre.

SOURABAYA, soo-ra-bi'-a, a large seaport-town of Java, on the N.E. coast, and the capital of one of the three provinces into which the island is divided by the Dutch. It is situate at the mouth of a navigable river, 1½ mile from the seashore. The river separates the European part of the town from the Chinese and the native quarter. The houses are very good, and some are elegant, particularly the country seats of private individuals. Its public buildings are a general hospital, a fine arsenal, and other extensive works, calculated for equipments on a very large scale; a mint, and large storehouses. Sourabaya is situate within that narrow strait which is formed by the islands of Java and Madura, and is defended by batteries. The mouth of the river is also defended. Pop. 130,000. Lat. 7° 12′ 30″ S. Lon. 112° 44′ 7″ E. When the French had possession of Java, it was intended to have erected Sourabaya into a port of consequence; and General Daendels expended large sums in the construction of works for the defence of the harbour, and was proceeding in his plans when the island was taken by the British.

SOUTH, Robert, an eminent English divine, who was educated at Christ Church, Oxford, where, in 1660, he was chosen public orator of the university. In the following year he was appointed chaplain to Lord Clarendon. In 1676 he accompanied the English ambassador to congratulate Sobieski on his election as king of Poland, of which country he wrote an account. After his return he was presented to the rectory of Islip, in Oxfordshire. Though he concurred in the revolution of 1688, he refused a bishopric. His sermons are remarkable for their wit and eloquence. B. at Hackney, 1633; D. 1716.

SOUTH, Sir James, an eminent modern English astronomer, who was educated for the medical profession, and practised as a surgeon during several years. His devotion to the pursuit of astronomical science led him to relinquish his first profession in order to prosecute his researches. For his laborious observations relative to the double stars, he was awarded the gold medal of the Royal Society, together with Sir John Herschel. Of the same society he was elected a fellow in 1821. About 1826 he removed to the observatory at Campden Hill, Kensington. He was knighted at the accession of William IV., in 1830; and, upon the same occasion, received an epistle intimating that the sum of £300 per annum should be placed at his disposal for the prosecution of astronomical inquiry. He contributed many papers of the highest value to the "Annals of Philosophy," the "Quarterly Journal of Science," and to the Memoirs of the Astronomical Society. He was also a member of the Imperial Academy of Science, St. Petersburg, and of the Brussels Royal Society of Sciences. B. in London, towards the close of the last century.

SOUTH, John F., an eminent modern English surgeon, and brother of the preceding. He was one of the surgeons of St. Thomas's Hospital, and some time president of the Royal College of Surgeons, London. He wrote a number of valuable works upon zoology, as well as upon subjects more immediately connected with his profession; as, "Household Surgery; or, Hints on Emergencies;" "A Description of the Bones;" "The Dissector's Manual." B. in London, early in the present century.

SOUTH AMERICA. (See AMERICA, SOUTH.)

SOUTHAMPTON, south-hămp'-ton, a town of the county of Hants, and a county of itself, situate on a tongue of land which is bounded by that water S. and W., and by the river Itchin E., 12 miles from Winchester. It presents a picturesque appearance from different points of view. The principal street runs from the quay northwards, and is upwards of a mile long, and is particularly handsome and spacious. The entrance to this street from the land side is by the Bar-gate, a venerable piece of antiquity. Of the public buildings there are five parish churches,—St. Michael's, All Saints, Holy Rood, St. Lawrence's, and St. Mary's. St. Michael's forms the eastern side of the square of the same name, and consists of a nave, chancel, and side-aisles, with a low tower rising from the centre, and terminating in a fine slender octagonal spire, which forms a very conspicuous object. It contains a handsome monument to the Lord Chancellor Wriothesley. There are, besides, several chapels for various Christian denominations. The other public buildings are—the assembly-rooms, a commodious theatre, a military asylum for the orphans of soldiers, on the same plan as the well-known institution at Chelsea; a free grammar-school, Sunday-schools, schools on the plans of Bell and Lancaster, and almshouses. Besides these, there are polytechnic and mechanics' institutions, an infirmary, a botanic garden, and the surveying and engraving departments of the Ordnance Board. There are various buildings of considerable antiquity in different parts of the town, and the Bargate, already mentioned, is a curious ancient fortified gate-house. Manf. Silks and carpets; but a considerable trade is done in wine, corn, timber, &c. Hemp, iron, and tallow, are imported from Russia, and tar and pitch from Sweden. Shipbuilding is also carried on. Pop. 36,000. Lat. 50° 54′ N. Lon. 1° 24′ 2″ W.—This place has a regatta and annual races. It is a station for the West-India, Mediterranean, East-India, and China mails, and has steam communication with all the ports in the S. of England, Ireland, and the Channel Islands. By railway it is connected with London and the centre of England.

SOUTHAMPTON, the name of several townships of the United States, with populations varying between 1,000 and 7,000.

SOUTHAMPTON, a county in the S.E. part of Virginia, U.S. Area, 614 square miles. Pop. 15,000, of whom nearly half are slaves.

SOUTHAMPTON ISLAND is situate on the N. side of Hudson's Bay, British N. America. Little is known regarding it. Lat. between 62° and 66° N. Lon. between 80° and 87° W.

SOUTH AUSTRALIA. (See AUSTRALIA, SOUTH.)

SOUTHCOTT, Joanna, south'-kot, a notorious English visionary, and founder of a sect. Until her 40th year she had been employed as a domestic servant at Exeter. In 1792 she suddenly came forward in the character of a prophetess, and, for a time, drove a considerable trade as the vender of sealed packets, which were to insure everlasting bliss hereafter to the purchasers. She then repaired to London, where her "warnings," and "prophecies," and "communications," had a large sale. Her confidence increasing, she announced herself as having conceived the "Second Shiloh." A cradle was made for the forthcoming Prince of Peace, large sums were collected, and, on the night when the accouchement was predicted to take place, crowds of her followers assembled before her house to hear the first tidings of the event. But the time passed away without any second Shiloh appearing. At her death, which occurred shortly afterwards, it was ascertained that she had been suffering from dropsy. D. in Devonshire, 1750; D. 1814.

SOUTH-END, a watering-place of Essex, on a declivity facing the mouth of the Thames, 4 miles from Rochford.

SOUTHERN, Thomas, suth'-ern, a dramatic writer, who entered himself of the Middle Temple, but afterwards abandoned law for literature. His principal dramatic works were,—"The Persian Prince;" "Isabella, or the Fatal Marriage;" and "Oroonoko," tragedies; "The Disappointment;" "The Rambling Lady;" and "The Wives' Excuse," comedies. D. at Oxmanstown, county Dublin, 1660; D. 1746.

SOUTHEY, Robert, sow'-the, an eminent English poet and general writer, who was the son of a linendraper at Bristol. He was sent to Westminster school in 1788, from which establishment he was dismissed four years afterwards, in consequence of having written a sarcastic attack upon the system of corporal punishment pursued in the school. He was, however, entered of Balliol College, Oxford, it being intended that he should take holy orders. For this pursuit he himself had little sympathy; indeed, he was quite unqualified for it, being then a sceptic both in politics and religion. At Oxford he declared that he learned only two things—to row and to swim; but, even while there, that literary industry, which is almost without a parallel, became a habit with him. About a year after leaving Oxford, he made the acquaintance of Coleridge, and the two poets married on the same day two sisters. After supporting himself for a short time by lecturing on history, at Bristol, he sold his poem, entitled "Joan of Arc," to Cottle, the Bristol bookseller, for 50 guineas. His maternal uncle, the Rev. Mr. Hill, chaplain of the British factory at Lisbon, at whose expense Southey had been kept at Oxford, visited England shortly after his nephew's first appearance as a poet, and endeavoured to induce him to enter the Church; but although Southey had by this time become reconciled to her doctrines, he steadily refused to take orders. On his uncle's return to Lisbon, Southey accompanied him, and remained in Spain and Portugal during six months. In 1796 he produced "Letters from Spain and Portugal;" and, in the following year, entered himself as a student of the law at Gray's Inn. He wrote to his publisher, "I advance with sufficient rapidity in Blackstone and Madoc. I hope to finish my poem and begin my practice in about two years." At the end of this time the poem was completed, but the law was given up as impracticable. After a second visit to Lisbon, he obtained, upon his return to England, an appointment as private secretary to the chancellor of the Exchequer for Ireland; but in six months the poet relinquished what he called "a foolish office and a good salary." This was in 1801, and with this year dates his entrance upon literature as a profession. He obtained sufficient employment from the booksellers, and after making several successful appearances as an author, he, in 1804, settled at Greta Hall, near Keswick, Cumberland, where the remaining years of his life were passed. Writing to a friend, he gives an account of his mode of life. "My actions are as regular as those of St. Dunstan's quarter-boys. Three pages of history after breakfast (equivalent to five in small quarto printing); then to translate and copy for the press, or to make my selections and biographies, or what else suits my humour, till dinner-time; from dinner-time till tea I read, write letters, see the newspaper, and very often indulge in a siesta. After tea I go to poetry, and correct, and re-write, and copy till I am tired, and then turn to anything else—to supper; and this is my life." And thus it continued to be until his death. In 1807 he received a pension from the government; in 1813 he succeeded Mr. Pye as poet-laureate, and under the ministry of Sir Robert Peel, a second pension of £300 per annum was bestowed upon him. He was at the same time offered a baronetcy by Sir Robert; but this Southey declined, as being too poor to support the dignity. He lost his first wife in 1837, and two years later was united to Miss Caroline Bowles, the poetess. He was the author of more than 100 volumes of poetry, history, travels, &c.; and, moreover, produced 126 papers of various lengths, upon history, biography, politics, and general literature. The full enumeration of all his works would occupy at least a column of this page. The principal efforts of his life of unwearied industry were,—"Joan of Arc;" "Madoc;" "Thalaba, the Destroyer;" "The Curse of Kehama," poems; the Lives of Nelson, Bunyan, John Wesley, Kirke White prefixed to his Remains; the History of the Peninsular War, of Brazil, and of Portugal; "Sir Thomas More; or, Colloquies upon the Church;" "The Doctor;" and essays moral and political. His Life and Correspondence, edited by his son, were produced in 1850. His son-in-law, the Rev. J. Wood Water, also gave to the public his common-place books. B. at Bristol, 1774; D. at Keswick, Cumberland, 1843.

SOUTH-HAMS, several small villages in Devonshire, near Torbay.

SOUTH HUNTINGDON, a township of the United States, in Rhode Island, 28 miles from Providence. It has a court-house and a gaol. Pop. 4,000.

SOUTH ISLAND, the name of several small islands in the Pacific Ocean and Eastern Seas.

SOUTH MOULTON, mole'-ton. (See MOLTON, SOUTH.)

SOUTH PORT, a village and chapelry of Lancashire, at the mouth of the Ribble, 7 miles from Ormskirk. Pop. 5,000.

SOUTHWARK, south'-wark, a parliamentary borough in the county of Surrey, of which it is the principal town, and also a suburb of the city of London. It is commonly called the Borough, and, together with the adjacent parishes, with which it is united by a continued range of buildings, constitutes that great division of the metropolis which lies to the south of the Thames. It contains many good streets, and is one of the principal commercial quarters of the metropolis. There are five parishes; viz., St. Olave, part of which is in the city of London; St. John Horsleydown; St. Saviour, commonly called St. Mary Overy; St. Thomas; and Christ Church. St. Olave's church is situate in Tooley Street, near the south end of London Bridge, and is a plain building. Eastward of St. Olave's is the parish of St. John Horsleydown, having been originally a grazing-ground for horses. St. Thomas's Church stands on the south side of the street of the same name. St. Thomas's Hospital is a noble charity appropriated to the reception of indigent persons labouring under sickness or accidental injuries. The building consists of four quadrangles, into the first of which, facing the street, is the entrance by large iron gates, which occupy one side of the square. The other three sides are encompassed with a colonnade. Near St. Thomas's is the kindred institution of Guy's Hospital, a great and singular monument of private munificence. It is named after its founder, Thomas Guy, a citizen and bookseller of London, who, by industry and frugality, amassed a very large fortune, which he determined, when arrived at his 76th year, to apply to this benevolent purpose. St. Saviour's Church, commonly called St. Mary Overy, originally belonged to a nunnery, founded by a female, prior to the Norman conquest, and endowed by her with the profits of the ferry across the river at this place, before the erection of London Bridge. The present church is built on the plan of a cathedral, though of small dimensions. The tower in the centre rises in three stories, the walls finishing with battlements, and being adorned at the angles with turrets and pinnacles. Contiguous to the priory of St. Mary Overy, formerly stood Winchester House, the town residence of the prelates of that see. It was erected about the year 1107, by Bishop Gifford, and was one of the most magnificent structures in the city or suburbs of London. It continued to be the abode of his successors till the beginning of the 17th century, when it was forsaken for the more agreeable residence at Chelsea. What is now called Bankside was formerly a range of dwellings, licensed by the bishop of Winchester, "for the repair of incontinent men to the like women." Here was a gaol, called the Clink; also the principal theatre of its time, called the Globe, where the plays of Shakspere were first represented and the memory of which is still retained in the name of Globe Alley. Not far from St. Saviour's Church is the Borough Market, a spacious area, surrounded with stalls and other conveniences. At the end of the High Street is St. Margaret's Hill, the site of the ancient church of the same name, which was converted into a sessions-house and prison, since removed to Mill Lane, and denominated the Borough Compter. A part of it faces Blackman Street, to the east of which the Marshalsea, a court of law and a prison, originally intended for the determination of differences between the king's menial servants, and under the control of the knight-marshal of the royal household. Southward of the Marshalsea, and on the same side, is the church of St. George the Martyr. The original building was of very ancient foundation. The present structure was erected in 1736. In the old church was interred Edward Cocker, the celebrated arithmetician, and also the noted Bishop Bonner, who died in the Marshalsea, in 1569. In Union Street is the public office of Union Hall, a handsome building; and at the south-east end of Blackman Street, in Horsemonger Lane, is the county gaol and house of correction for Surrey. The Queen's Bench prison is situate at the south-west corner of Blackman Street. Of the parishes adjacent to Southwark, Christ Church was taken out of that of St. Saviour. The present church was erected in 1737, and stands on the west side of the road leading from Blackfriars Bridge. In this parish are a charity school, a workhouse, and a neat almshouse. On the west side of Blackfriars Road, very near the bridge, is the building formerly occupied by the extensive museum collected by Sir Ashton Lever, and which now forms the premises of the Surrey Institution. The Surrey Chapel, on the east side of Blackfriars Road, is a large octagonal building, erected for the use of the Methodists by the friends of Rowland Hill, who preached here. Farther to the south stands the Magdalen Hospital, for the reception, maintenance, and employment of unfortunate females. In the central point, where the great south roads from London, and the roads from Westminster, Southwark, Newington, and Lambeth, unite, stands the obelisk, a plain structure of freestone, erected in 1771, during the mayoralty, and in honour of Brass Crosby, Esq., who had been confined in the Tower with Alderman Oliver, for the conscientious discharge of his duty as a magistrate. At the end of Blackfriars Road, near the obelisk, is the Surrey theatre. Between the obelisk and Queen's Bench prison, is the school where Lancaster first practised his system of education. St. George's Fields, so frequently noticed in English history, and which, about half a century ago, were little better than a continued swamp, have, since the erection of Westminster and Blackfriars bridges, been completely covered with streets. Of the parishes adjacent to Southwark, Newington Butts lies contiguous to the parish of St. George, at the distance of about a mile from London Bridge. Bermondsey parish is bounded on the west by St. John's, St. George's, and St. Olave's, and by those of Deptford and Rotherhithe on the east. In June, 1861, one of the most extensive fires that has ever taken place in London since the great fire of 1666, occurred at the east end of Tooley Street, in the neighbourhood of London Bridge. It raged, without intermission, for many days, when Mr. Braidwood, manager of the fire brigade, fell a sacrifice to his efforts to extinguish the flames. While we write (July 1), the amount of property destroyed is estimated at £1,500,000, and the conflagration still continues. (See LONDON.)

SOUTHWARK, a district of the United States, forming a suburb of Philadelphia, with which it communicates by a bridge across the Delaware. It has numerous factories and shipbuilding-yards. Pop. 40,000. This place is separately incorporated from Philadelphia.

SOUTHWELL, south'-wel, a market town of Nottinghamshire, on the little river Greet, 12 miles from Nottingham. The church forms the most interesting object in the town, and has long been celebrated for its antiquity, and for the beauty and variety of its architecture. The archbishop of York had formerly a palace here. Another building deserving of notice is the county Bridewell, which is used as a prison for the various manors belonging to the archbishopric within the county. Manf. Silks, lace, and stockings. Pop. 3,600.

SOUTHWELL, Robert, an English Jesuit, who was descended of an ancient Norfolk family. After receiving his education upon the continent, and becoming prefect of the Jesuits' College at Rome, he went to England as a missionary. In 1592 he was apprehended on a charge of conspiring against the government of Queen Elizabeth; but, although he was put to the torture ten times, nothing could be elicited from him, further than that he had come to England for the purpose of making converts to the Roman Catholic faith. In 1595 he was tried in the court of King's Bench, found guilty, and hanged at Tyburn. He wrote a number of works, both in prose and verse, upon theological matters. B. 1560; hanged 1595.

SOUTHWICK, south'-wik, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 3,000.

SOUTHWOLD, south'-wolde, a market-town of Suffolk, at the mouth of the river Blythe, 20 miles from Yarmouth. Its principal buildings are a church, gaol, guildhall, and some batteries. It has a considerable trade in the herring and sprat fishery, and also in salt and old beer. Pop. 2,200.—In 1672 an obstinate engagement took place in Southwold or Sole Bay, between the combined fleets of the Dutch and French, and the English, during which the earl of Sandwich was blown up in his ship.

SOUVESTRE, Emile, soo'-vestr, a modern French writer, who studied the law, and attempted to set up as an advocate at Rennes; but, not obtaining a practice, he went to Paris, where he wrote a drama entitled "The Siege of Missolonghi," which, after some delay, was accepted at the Théâtre Français; but it was so mutilated under the pruning-knife of the censor, as to become unfitted for theatrical representation. Left without resources, he became assistant to a bookseller at Nantes. In 1830 he commenced writing for the provincial newspapers. In 1836 he produced a work upon the manners, customs, and literature of Brittany, the "Wales of France," the materials for which he had been collecting during several years. The work was eminently successful, and in 1836 Souvestre again repaired to Paris; but on this occasion under favourable auspices. During the subsequent eighteen years, he occupied a high position as a contributor to the "Revue des deux Mondes," the "National," the "Siècle," and other leading Paris publications. His best works were—"Les Confessions d'un Ouvrier," "La Maison Rouge," "Voyage dans le Finistère," "Le Riche et le Pauvre," and "Un Philosophe sous les Toits," which last has been translated into English under the title of "An Attic Philosopher." All his books exhibit the workings of a pure and thoughtful mind; they are written in a charming style, and are unexceptionable in point of morality. B. at Morlaix, Brittany, 1806; D. at Paris, 1854.

SOUWAROFF. (See SUWAROFF.)

SOUZA, Manuel Faria, a Portuguese poet, who was at first engaged in various diplomatic capacities, but subsequently devoted himself to literature. His works, which are numerous, are chiefly composed in Spanish. As a critic, he was, says Machado, long revered as an oracle. His principal works are—a vast collection of sonnets, "Commentary on the Lusiad," "Epitome of the History of Portugal," and an account of the labours of the Jesuit missionaries in China. B. at Sonto, Portugal, 1590; D. at Madrid, 1649.

SOUZA-BOTELHO, Jose Maria, soo'-za-bo-tail'-yo, a Portuguese diplomatist, who represented his country at the courts of Sweden and France. An enthusiastic admirer of Camoens, the greatest poet of Portugal, he devoted his leisure to the production of a standard edition of that writer's works. The edition was brought out in 1818. He also purposed to write the History of Portugal; but failing health prevented his accomplishing the task. B. at Oporto, 1758; D. 1819.

SOWERBY, sou'-er-be, three townships of England, in Cumberland and Yorkshire, none of them with a population above 8,000.—The largest is in Yorkshire, 1 miles from Halifax.

SOZOMENUS, Hermius, so-zo-me'-nus, an ecclesiastical historian. He was a native of Palestine, whence he passed to Constantinople, where he practised as an advocate. He wrote an Ecclesiastical History from 323 to 439, which was printed at Cambridge with Eusebius and Socrates, 1720. Flourished in the 5th century.

SPA, or SPAA, spa, or spaw, a town of Belgium, romantically situate on the banks of a rivulet, 17 miles from Liege. A number of its houses are of wood. Its streets, however, four in number, and built in the form of a cross, are wide and regular. The adjacent country being rugged and unproductive, Spa can boast of little else than its far-famed medicinal springs and baths. These waters were known to the Romans, and are mentioned by Pliny. They all spring from the adjacent hills, which are formed of calcareous earth, mixed with siliceous substances. They are all chalybeates, and their effect is diuretic and exhilarating. Pop. 4,000.

SPACCAFORNO, spak'-ka-for'-no, a town of Sicily, 12 miles from Noto, on a hill near the S. coast. It has many churches and convents. Pop. 8,000.

SPAGNOLETTO, Joseph Ribera, span'-yo-let'-to, a celebrated Spanish painter, who, after studying the works of the greatest masters, settled at Naples, where he was employed by the viceroy and other distinguished persons. His subjects were mostly tragical scenes, which he painted with uncommon force and expression. B. near Valence, 1588; D. at Naples, 1656.

SPAIN, spain (Sp. ESPANA, es-pan'-ya), a kingdom in the S.W. of Europe, bounded by the Atlantic, the Mediterranean, Portugal, and France. It occupies the greater part of the Iberian peninsula, and is separated from France by the Pyrenees. Islands. The Balearic Isles, the principal of which are Majorca, Minorca, and Iviza. Political Divisions. Spain is divided into a number of provinces, which formed as many separate governments under the Moors, or under the Christian chieftains. The whole were united under one head about the close of the 15th century; but the divisions, and even the titles (generally of kingdom, for what has become a province), were retained, and were attended with consequent discrepancies in the mode of administration. The old provinces are Andalusia, Aragon, Asturias, New Castile, Old Castile, Estremadura, Catalonia, Galicia, Leon, Murcia, Valencia, Navarra, Alave, Biscay, and Guipuzcoa. These have been subdivided into new provinces, to the number of forty-nine. Area, 182,708 square miles. Desc. No country in Europe, except Switzerland, possesses an equal extent of mountainous surface. The Pyrenees, forming its north-eastern barrier, are second only to the Alps, and are connected with, or rather continued by, the long Cantabrian chain, which extends throughout the north of Spain, parallel to the Bay of Biscay, until it terminates in Cape Finistère. The culminating peak of this range is Maladetta, which attains an elevation of 11,424 feet above the level of the sea. The Pyrenees have a steep descent on the Spanish side, and are crossed by above 100 passes for mules and foot-passengers. Near the middle of this great range (about lon. 4° 15′ W.) a secondary chain separates from it, and stretching to the southward, extends, in a long irregular line, all the way to Cabo-de-Gata, in the province of Granada. From this great range, called by some the Iberian Mountains, there project four other chains, which extend from east to west till they reach the Atlantic. The Sierra Nevada in the S. has for its highest summit Mulhacen, which is the loftiest summit in Spain, and has an elevation of 11,660 feet above the level of the sea. The interior, comprising part of Old and New Castile, forms an elevated table-land, containing several towns, at a height above the level of the sea not usual in the rest of Europe. This table-land may be regarded as comprising several plains, as it is intersected by various ranges of mountains. Rivers. In each of the valleys formed by these mountains, flows one of the great rivers of Spain, to which the smaller streams are tributary. These are the Douro, the Tagus, the Guadiana, the Guadalquivir, the Ebro, and the Minho. Spain, however, is not a well-watered country; for, although the rivers are long, their water-volume is small. The Douro drains the N. of the central table-land, and, in its lower course, the N. of Portugal. The Tagus is the largest river in the peninsula, and drains the central portion of the table-land, between the Castilian mountains and the Sierra de Toledo, and, in its lower course, Central Portugal. The Guadiana drains the S. of the table-land, and the Guadalquivir drains another district S. of the great table-land. The Ebro drains the N. E., and has a rapid course; whilst the Minho forms the N. boundary between Spain and Portugal. Climate. Very dry except on the N. and N. W. coast. Zoology. The bull, wolf, bear, lynx, boar, and monkey. The S. parts sometimes swarm with locusts. Forests. Less extensive than any other large country of Europe. Pro. The agricultural products are wheat, maize, rice, barley, and oats. The Spanish hemp and flax are both of the best quality, and might, were their culture extended, be made the basis of very extensive manufactures. In Granada, coffee, cotton, sugar, and cocoa, are raised to an extent limited only by the want of capital. Vines are cultivated in every province; in the south-west, near Xeres, are made the well-known sherry and tent wines; in the south and east, the Malaga and Alicant wines. The fruits are olives, oranges, lemons, almonds, and in the warmest provinces, the pomegranate and the palm. Mules are in general use for travelling; and, as to horses, the famed breed of Andalusia is considered as degenerating. The breed of sheep called Merino has the wool finer and more valuable than any other. Minerals. Abundant: they comprise lead, quicksilver, iron, marble, and good building-stone. The iron-works of Biscay, Aragon, and Asturias, have been of great note for several centuries. Precious stones are found on excavating particular spots; and there are indications of coal-mines in various parts, though they are not as yet extensively wrought. Salt forms one of the chief products of Spain: it is procured by evaporating sea-water, a process to which the climate of Spain is as favourable as that of Portugal and Sardinia. Manf. Iron, leather, and silk; wine is an important article. If we except Catalonia, where both silks and cottons are made in large quantities, the only manufactures conducted with spirit are the twisting of silk and the working of Sparto or Esparto grass (Spanish broom) into mats, baskets, shoes, and other articles. The manufacture of tobacco, arms, gunpowder, and others are carried on by the government. COMMERCE.—Imp. From the Baltic, corn and naval stores; from Greece, the coast of Africa, and the Euxine, they are in general confined to corn. The others comprise colonial produce, manufactured goods, and salt and dried fish. Exp. These consist chiefly of wool, wine, brandy, fruit, olive-oil, silk, salt, and barilla. The trade is almost confined to France and England. The tunny, pilchard, and anchovy fisheries, are valuable. Army, 140,000 men. The military establishments of Spain were entirely new-modelled by the revolution of 1820. Navy. 6 ships of about 90 guns; 12 frigates of about 40 guns; 26 vessels with from 6 to 30 guns; and 40 steamers. The Spanish navy suffered severely from the war with England, begun in 1796. Rel. The Roman Catholic. Gov. The government of Spain was long a limited monarchy, the people being represented by their Cortes. But after the union, in the 15th century, of the different provinces into one kingdom, the concentration of power in the executive branch enabled the latter to dispense with the Cortes, and to encroach on the privileges of the provinces; so that, on the accession of the house of Bourbon, in 1700, there remained hardly any vestige of independence, except in Biscay. Since 1833, a constitutional representative monarchy has been adopted. In Spain there prevails a great deal of aristocratic pride, and a scrupulous distinction of classes. The nobility bear, as in Britain, the titles of duke, marquis, or count, and are styled, collectively, "Titulados." The gentry are called "Hidalgos," a term applied to all who are of genteel birth, or whose designations, such as doctor in law, or doctor in medicine, distinguish them from the mass of agriculturists, merchants, and manufacturers. Pop. 14,300,000. Lat. between 36° 1′ and 43° 45′ N. Lon. between 3° 20′ E. and 9° 21′ W.—The foreign possessions of Spain are Cuba and Porto-Rica in the W. Indies, the Philippine and Ladrone islands in the Pacific Ocean, and Ceuta in N. Africa.—Spain was first known to the Phœnicians, subsequently to the Carthaginians, and, in the 3rd century before the birth of Christ, to the Romans. It was completely subdued under Augustus, after which it enjoyed tranquillity for nearly 400 years. This state of peace was disturbed by the eruption of the northern barbarians,—the Suevi, the Vandals, and the Alani. Christianity was introduced about the end of the 6th century; the invasion of the Moors took place in the beginning of the 8th, and they overran the whole country except the Asturias. They were finally expelled in the year 1492. Under Charles V., Spain made a great figure in the general affairs of Europe. He reigned forty years, and, in 1556, abdicated in favour of his son, Philip II., who died in 1598, and bequeathed to his successor, Philip III., Belgium, Naples, Sicily, and Portugal. Charles II., the last prince of the Austrian branch, reigned from 1668 to 1700; after which began the well-known war for the succession to the Spanish dominions, in which the claim of Austria was supported by the grand alliance against Louis XIV. Notwithstanding the opposition of the allies, however, the grandson of Louis XIV. reigned in Spain, relinquishing the Belgic provinces to the house of Austria. Philip V., the first king of the French line, had a long and turbulent reign. After him, Ferdinand VI., a prudent prince, introduced various reforms, and maintained peace; but dying in 1759, his son, Charles III., went to war with Great Britain. Peace ensued in 1763, and continued till 1778, when Spain, at first neutral in the contest of Britain with her North-American colonies, was prevailed on to take up arms against her, and obtained, at the peace of 1783, the Floridas and the island of Minorca. Charles IV. succeeded to the crown in 1788, became soon after a party to the coalition against republican France; but was, after Prussia, the first of the great powers to conclude a treaty of peace, in 1795. In little more than a year after this, the cabinet of Spain joined its late opponent, and declared war against Britain. The abdication of the royal family of Spain took place at Bayonne, in May, 1808. It was followed by the general resistance of the inhabitants, by the invasion of their country by Napoleon I., and by the subsequent expulsion of the French by the troops of Great Britain, combined with those of Portugal and Spain. The dissatisfaction and indignation excited by the tyrannical proceedings of Ferdinand, led, in the beginning of 1820, to a revolution of great importance, by which the constitution of the Cortes, as established in 1812, was restored, and such salutary restraints established on the power of the crown, as seemed best calculated for securing the rights of the people. In 1823 Spain was again invaded by French troops, under the Duke d'Angoulême, whose object was to put down the new government, and to restore Ferdinand to absolute power. They penetrated the country without resistance; and having laid siege to Cadiz, the king was given up to them, and afterwards the town. Since that period, there have been repeated insurrections and civil wars. In 1833, on the death of Ferdinand VII., the queen-mother, Christina, was appointed queen-regent during the minority of his daughter Isabel, to whom, by his will, he bequeathed his throne. On this Don Carlos, the late king's brother, laid claim to the crown, when a civil war, which lasted till 1810, ensued. In that year the partisans of Don Carlos were finally defeated. In 1854 various insurrectionary movements took place, on account of the arbitrary measures of the Spanish government; but, in the same year, the constitutional government was re-established, and the queen-mother banished from the kingdom. From that period Spain seems to have been gradually taking a higher and more decided position among the European nations, notwithstanding she has failed in some of her pecuniary obligations, and vainly, if not hypocritically, endeavoured to suppress the traffic in slaves.

SPALATRO, spa-la'-tro, a seaport of Dalmatia, on the Gulf of Venice, 110 miles from Ragusa. It stands on a peninsula in the form of a semicircle, connected with the mainland by a narrow isthmus, and has a harbour spacious and deep. Manf. Woollens, silk, and leather. The fishery on the Adriatic is considerable, as well as the shipping business, and the town contains several splendid Roman edifices. Pop. 10,400. Lat. 43° 30′ N. Lon. 16° 26′ E.

SPALDING, spawl'-ding, a neat market-town of Lincolnshire, on the Welland, which runs through the town, 15 miles from Boston. It has a church with a handsome spire, several chapels, a theatre, a free grammar-school, and a town-hall or court-house. It has a considerable traffic in coals, corn, and wool. Pop. 9,000.

SPALDING, John Joachim, an eminent German theologian and preacher, whose works are highly esteemed, his sermons being regarded as among the best specimens of German pulpit oratory. B. 1714; D. 1804.

SPALDING, George Ludwig, an eminent German philologist, who was the son of the preceding. He at first studied theology, with the view of becoming a pastor, but subsequently devoted himself entirely to philology. For the purpose of producing an improved edition of Quintilian, he spent nineteen years in the critical study of that writer's works. He held the important office of counsellor in the ministry of public instruction. B. 1762; D. 1811.

SPALDING, Samuel, a modern English philosophical writer, who, after pursuing a distinguished educational career at the University of London, composed a work, entitled the "Philosophy of Christian Morals." In 1834 he went upon a voyage to the Cape of Good Hope, in the hope of arresting the progress of a pulmonary disease under which he was suffering, but died almost immediately after his arrival. B. in London, 1807.

SPALLANZANI, Lazarus, spal-lan-dza'-ne, an eminent Italian naturalist, who became professor of philosophy at Pavia, where he was distinguished by his experiments in physiology. In 1785 he went to Turkey, and made many observations on geology and extinct volcanoes. He also visited Germany, and received particular marks of attention from the emperor Joseph II. His principal works are, "Experiments on the Reproductions of Animals," "Essay upon Animalculæ in Fluids," "Microscopical Experiments," "Memoirs on the Circulation of the Blood," "Travels in the Two Sicilies and the Apennines," and "Observations on the Transpiration of Plants." B. near Reggio, 1729; D. at Pavia, 1790.

SPANDAU, span'-dou, a fortified town of Prussia, in the Middle Mark of Brandenburg, at the confluence of the Havel and the Spree, 11 miles from Potsdam. It has a large workhouse, and a manufactory, for government, of fire-arms. The citadel stands outside the town, on an island in the Havel. In it Baron Trenck was confined. Pop. 9,500.—This place was taken by the Swedes in 1631, and by the French in 1806. It has a station on the Berlin and Hamburg Railway.

SPANHEIM, Frederick, span'-hime, a learned divine, who obtained the professorship of philosophy at Geneva, which he resigned in 1642, and was elected professor of divinity at Leyden. He wrote several works upon theology. B. at Amberg, in the Upper Palatinate, 1600; D. at Leyden, 1649.

SPANHEIM, Ezekiel, a learned German writer and statesman, was the eldest son of the preceding. He was appointed professor of eloquence at Geneva at the age of 20. He soon afterwards became tutor to the son of Charles Louis, elector palatine, who employed him in several important missions. From this service he passed into that of the elector of Brandenburg, who made him a baron and minister of state. After the peace of Ryswick he was sent to France, and thence to England. His principal works are, commentaries upon ancient authors; a dissertation, in Latin, upon ancient coins; letters and dissertations on medals; and translated from the Greek into French, the "Cæsars" of Julian, with notes. B. at Geneva, 1629; D. in England, 1710.

SPANHEIM, Frederick, a learned divine, brother of the preceding. He was educated at Leyden, where he took his degree of doctor in divinity; after which he became professor in that faculty at Heidelberg, and next at Leyden. His principal work is an Ecclesiastical History. B. at Geneva, 1632; D. 1701.

SPANISH TOWN, or ST. JAGO DE LA VEGA, spăn'-ish, a seaport of Jamaica, 10 miles from Kingston. It is the residence of a governor or commander-in-chief, and the seat of the superior courts of the islands. Pop. 6,000. Lat. 18° 1′ N. Lon. 76° 44′ W.

SPANISH TOWN, the capital town of the island of Trinidad. (See PORT OF SPAIN.)

SPARKS, Jared, sparks, a modern American biographical writer, who was educated for the service of the Unitarian ministry; upon the occasion of whose ordination, in 1819, Dr. Channing preached his famous sermon on "Unitarian Christianity." His earliest publications were chiefly upon theological and controversial subjects; but, in 1829, he produced his first work in biography, under the title of "Life of John Ledyard, the American Traveller." His subsequent publications were,—"The Writings of George Washington, selected and published from 200 folio volumes of Original Manuscripts," in 12 volumes,—a national work; "The Life of Washington;" "The Life of Benjamin Franklin;" and "Correspondence of the American Revolution, being Letters of Eminent Men to George Washington." For many years past he is understood to have been engaged upon a great work,—"The History of the American Revolution." In 1839 he was appointed professor of ancient and modern history in Harvard University. Washington Irving speaks of Mr. Jared Sparks "as among the greatest benefactors to American literature." B. in Connecticut, at the close of the last century.

SPARRMANN, Andrew, spar'-man, an eminent Swedish naturalist and traveller, who accompanied Captain Cook in his voyage round the world. He also resided for some time at the Cape of Good Hope. After his return to Stockholm, he was, upon the death of Baron Geer, the entomologist, appointed to succeed him as conservator of the museum. His travels, which are as interesting as they are valuable, have been translated into English. Linnæus named a species of plants in his honour. B. in Sweden, about 1747; D. at Stockholm, 1820.

SPARROW, Anthony, spăr'-ro, a learned English prelate. In 1667 he was consecrated bishop of Exeter, whence he was translated to Norwich. He wrote, "Rationale upon the Book of Common Prayer," and compiled a collection of articles, injunctions, and canons. B. in Suffolk, about 1620; D. at Norwich, 1685.

SPART, EL CAPE, spart, the N. W. point of Africa, in the kingdom of Fez, at the entrance of the Strait of Gibraltar. Height, 1,043 feet above the level of the sea.

SPARTA, spar'-ta, an ancient city of Greece, in the Morea, 3 miles from Mistra. Its remains chiefly consist of a temple and a theatre.

SPARTA, the name of numerous villages in the United States.

SPARTACUS, spar'-ta-kus, a Thracian shepherd, famous for his victories over the Romans. He was one of the gladiators of Lentulus; but, escaping with thirty others, he placed himself at the head of a numerous army, with which he defeated the Romans in several battles. At length Crassus was sent against him, and after a bloody contest Spartacus was slain, B.C. 71.

SPARTANBURG, spar'-tan-berg, a district in the N. of S. Carolina, U.S. Area, 1,036 square miles. Pop. 27,000.

SPARTIANUS, Ælius, spar'-shi-ai-nus, a Latin historian, who wrote the lives of the emperors from Julius Cæsar to Diocletian; of which only a few are extant among the "Scriptores Historiæ Augustæ." Flourished in the 4th century.

SPASK, spask, the name of three towns of European Russia, none of them with a population above 6,000.

SPECKTER, Erwin, spek'-ter, an eminent German painter, who studied under Cornelius at Munich, after which he repaired to Italy for the purpose of becoming acquainted with the works of the old Italian masters. He was engaged by Cornelius to execute several of the frescoes in the Pinakothek at Munich, but his death took place before the building was ready for his drawings. His principal frescoes were made for the villa of Dr. Abendroth at Hamburg. He also wrote a work entitled "Letters of a German Artist from Italy." B. at Hamburg, 1806; D. at the same city, 1835.

SPECKTER, Otto, a modern German artist, who was the brother of the preceding. He particularly distinguished himself as a designer of subjects for children's books. His drawings of animals are often charmingly quaint. Several of his works have been reproduced in England. B. at Hamburg, 1817.

SPEED, John, spede, an English historian and antiquary. He was brought up to the trade of a tailor, which occupation he is supposed to have followed till late in life. Through the liberality of Sir Fulk Greville, he was enabled to publish his large works, the materials for which he had amassed through a long series of years. He was the author of the "Theatre of Great Britain," the "History of Great Britain," and "Tables of Scripture Genealogies," formerly bound up with the Bible. B. at Farrington, Cheshire, 1542; D. in London, 1629.

SPEEN, spene, a parish of Berkshire, 2 miles from Newbury, where the second battle of Newbury was fought in 1648. Pop. 3,300.

SPEIGHT'S TOWN, spites, a seaport-town of the island of Barbadoes, on the west coast, 10 miles from Bridgetown. It is a handsome town, and has a spacious church, dedicated to St. Peter. It is defended by two forts, besides another in Heathcote's Bay. Lat. 13° 15′ N. Lon. 58° 31′ W.

SPELMAN, Sir Henry, spel'-man, a learned English antiquary, who was knighted by James I., by whom he was employed in public affairs and much esteemed. His principal works were, a book against sacrilege, or the alienating the church lands, under the title of "De non-Temerandis Ecclesiis;" "Glossarium Archæologicum;" and an edition of the English Councils. B. in Norfolk, 1562; D. 1641.

SPENCE, Joseph, spence, an English divine and writer, who was, in 1742, appointed professor of modern history in the university of Oxford, and in 1754 prebendary of Durham. He wrote an "Essay on Pope's Odyssey," a work entitled "Polymetis," and a compilation entitled "Anecdotes of Men and Books." B. in Hampshire, 1699; drowned, 1768.

SPENCE, William, an eminent modern English entomologist, who assisted Kirby in producing the celebrated "Introduction to Entomology." He also produced, amongst other smaller treatises, one entitled "Observations relative to the Circulation of Blood in Insects." He was a member of the Royal and Entomological societies.

SPENCER, spen'-ser, the name of two counties in the United States.—1. In Kentucky. Area, 125 square miles. Pop. 7,000.—2. In Indiana. Area, 190 square miles. Pop. 9,000.—Also the name of several townships, none with a population above 3,000.

SPENER, Philip James, spai'-ner, a Lutheran divine, who became counsellor in ecclesiastical affairs to the elector of Brandenburg, but who is rendered remarkable as being the founder of the Pietists, which sect held that the word of God cannot be understood without the illumination of the Holy Ghost. B. in Alsace, 1635; D. at Berlin, 1705.

SPENSER, Edmund, an eminent English poet, who was educated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts; but, not obtaining a fellowship, he quitted the university. His earliest poem was the "Shepherd's Calendar," first published in 1579, which he dedicated to Sir Philip Sidney, who became his patron, and introduced him at court. In 1580 he was appointed by the earl of Leicester secretary to Lord Grey, viceroy of Ireland, and obtained a grant of lands at Kilcolman, in the county Cork, where he built a house, and finished his celebrated poem entitled the "Faerie Queen." In the rebellion begun by the earl of Tyrone, he lost his estate and was plundered; upon which he retired to London. He was buried near Chaucer, in Westminster Abbey. Pope says: "There is something in Spenser that pleases us as strongly in one's old age as it did in one's youth. I read the 'Faerie Queen' when I was about 12, with a vast deal of delight." Mr. Craik, in his "Sketches of Literature and Learning in England," observes: "Without calling Spenser the greatest of all poets, we may still say that his poetry is the most poetical of all poetry." B. in London, 1553; D. in London, 1599.

SPERANSKI, Michael, spe-ran'-ske, an eminent Russian statesman and administrative reformer, who became secretary of the imperial council under Alexander, in which capacity he remodelled the system of taxation, introduced an improved penal code, a new system of finance, and an enlarged plan of national education. B. in the government of Vladimir, 1771; D. 1810.

SPERLING, Otto, spair'-ling, a German physician and botanist, who became physician to the king of Denmark; but, being connected with the plot of Count Ulfeld, he was sent to prison, where he died. He published a catalogue of plants in Denmark. B. at Hamburg, 1602; D. 1681.

SPEUSIPPUS, spu-sip' pus, the nephew, disciple, and successor of Plato. He is considered as the founder of the Academic school of philosophy; and among his disciples were a number of females. He wrote upon plants, animals, and natural objects; but of his works only a few fragments remain. D. at Athens, B.C. 339.

SPEY, spai, a large and rapid river of Scotland, in Inverness-shire, rising from Loch Spey, and, after a course of upwards of 100 miles, falling into the sea, about 8 miles E. of Elgin.

SPEZIA, LA, or SPECCIA, sped'-ze-a, a town of the Sardinian states, 40 miles from Genoa. Its principal building is a citadel. Pop. 10,000.

SPEZIA, GULF OF, the ancient Portus Lunæ, a bay of the Mediterranean, in the eastern part of the Genoese territory. Ext. 7 miles long, with a breadth of from 2 to 6. In this gulf the poet Shelley was drowned.

SPEZZIA, spet'-ze-a, a small island of Greece, in the Gulf of Nauplia, 10 miles from Hydra. Area, 26 square miles. Pop. 8,000.

SPHINX, sfinks, a monster which had the head and breasts of a woman, the body of a dog, the tail of a serpent, the wings of a bird, the paws of a lion, and a human voice. It had been sent by Juno, to punish the family of Cadmus, to Thebes, where it proposed enigmas, and devoured the inhabitants, who were unable to explain them. The Thebans were, however, informed by the oracle, that the Sphinx would destroy itself as soon as one of its enigmas was explained. This enigma was:—"What animal walked on four legs in the morning, two at noon, and three in the evening." Creon, king of Thebes, promised his crown and his sister Jocasta in marriage to him who could give a successful answer. Œdipus at length explained the riddle, observing that man walked on his hands and feet when young, or in the morning of life, at its noon he walked erect, and in the evening of his days he supported his infirmities upon a stick. The Sphinx no sooner heard this answer, than it dashed its head against a rock, and expired.

SPIEROE, spe'-re(r), an island of Norway, at the entrance of the Gulf of Christiania. Lat. 59° 4′ N. Lon. 10° 59′ E.

SPIGELIUS, Adrian, spi-je'-li-us, a learned Dutch professor, who filled the chair of anatomy and surgery at Padua. One of his most important works was entitled, "On the Structure of the Human Body." B. at Brussels, 1578; D. 1625.

SPIKE ISLAND, spike, an island on the W. side of Cork Harbour, half a mile from Queenstown. Area, 180 acres. It is fortified, and is the principal convict establishment in the south of Ireland. Pop. 2,000.

SPILIMBERGO, spe-lim-bair'-go, a town of Lombardy, on the Tagliamento, 15 miles from Udine. Pop. 3,500.

SPINDLER, spin'-dler, a modern German novelist, who made his first appearance as an author in 1824. His collected works comprise 100 volumes. Many of his best novels have been translated into English; such as "The Natural Son;" "The Jew;" "The Jesuit, a picture of Manners and Character; and "The Enthusiast." B. at Breslau, about 1795.

SPINOLA, Ambrosio, Marquis of, spe-no'-la, a celebrated Italian general. He entered the service of Philip III. of Spain early in life, and, after distinguishing himself against the Dutch, was appointed general-in-chief in the Netherlands. In 1604 he took Ostend, after a desperate siege. This feat greatly enhanced his reputation, which he continued to maintain, although opposed to the brave and skilful Maurice, prince of Nassau. He afterwards signalized himself in Italy. B. at Genoa, 1569, D. 1630.

SPINOZA, Benedict, spe-no'-za, was the son of a Portuguese Jew, resident at Hamburg. He studied under the chief rabbin, and afterwards applied to theology; but, having avowed some sceptical opinions respecting the Mosaic law, he was excommunicated; on which he was baptized and professed the Christian religion. An attempt being made to assassinate him, he deemed it prudent to retire from Amsterdam, first to the house of a physician named Vanden Ende, and afterwards to the neighbourhood of Leyden, where he employed himself in making microscopes and telescopes, by which he was enabled to earn a subsistence. About 1664 he took up his residence at the Hague, where he spent the remainder of his life. Spinoza invented a system of metaphysics called by his name, the basis of which is, that matter is eternal, and that the universe is God. This he published in a work entitled "Tractatus Theologico-Politicus;" and the same is refined upon in a mathematical form in his posthumous works. (See Hallam's "History of the Literature of Europe," vol. iv.) B. at Amsterdam, 1632; D. at the Hague, 1677.

SPIRDING, spir'-ding, a lake of East Prussia, 75 miles from Konigsberg. Ext. 10 miles long.

SPIRES, speer, an ancient town of Germany, at the confluence of the Spirebach and the Rhine, 17 miles from Landau. The only interesting building is the old cathedral, now falling into decay. It is inclosed by walls, has an old palace, a city hall, gymnasium, orphan asylum, house of correction, and museum of antiquities. Manf. Tobacco, vinegar; and there are sugar-refineries. Pop. 10,200.—In this city forty-nine diets were held; and at one, in 1529, the protest to the emperor was made, which gave rise to the religious designation of Protestants. On one occasion it was the winter quarters of Julius Cæsar, and in the Middle Ages the residence of several German emperors.

SPITALFIELDS, spit'-al-feelds, a quarter of the British metropolis, comprising the parishes of Christchurch and Bethnal Green. It is the principal seat of the English silk manufacture, introduced by French refugees after the revocation of the edict of Nantes in 1685.

SPITHEAD, spit-hed', a noted roadstead for shipping in the English Channel, situate between Portsmouth and the Isle of Wight, directly facing Portsmouth harbour. It is about 20 miles in extent, and is said to be capable of holding 1,000 vessels in safety. Its security has obtained for it from sailors the name of the "king's bedchamber," and it is the principal rendezvous of the British navy.

SPITI, spe'-te, a district of Asia, Little Tibet, near where the Sutlej breaks through the Himalaya. Its villages are from 12,000 to 13,000 feet above the level of the sea. Lat. between 32° and 33° N. Lon. 78° E.—Also a RIVER, which forms the W. branch of the Sutlej, above the Himalaya.

SPITZBERGEN, spitz-ber'-gen, a group of islands in the Northern Ocean, formerly supposed to make part of the continent, and distinguished by the name of East Greenland. The sea in the neighbourhood abounds in whales. This country has been long the common resort of the whale-fishing ships of different nations. It was explored in 1773 by Captain Phipps. Lat. of its northernmost island, 80° 48′ N. Lon. 20° 29′ E. This is the most N. known land on the globe.

SPLUGEN PASS, sploo'-gen, a route across the Rhætian Alps, between the Grisons (Switzerland) and Lombardy. Its summit is nearly 7,000 feet above the sea.

SPOHN, Frederick Augustus William, spon, an eminent German philosopher, who was educated at the universities of Wittemberg and Leyden, at which latter he, in 1819, was appointed professor of ancient literature. He produced a number of valuable works on philology, criticism, and geography. The most important of these works were, an edition of Homer's "Odyssey;" of Hesiod; a treatise upon Egyptian Hieroglyphics, and a revised edition of the "Panegyrics" of Isocrates. B. at Dortmund, 1792; D. at Leipzig, 1824.

SPOHR, Louis, spor, a celebrated German musician, who was at first a violin player in the private band of the duke of Brunswick. His reputation commenced with the year 1804, upon the occasion of his travelling over Germany and giving concerts. At the congress of Vienna, in 1814, he stood forth against every rival as the first violin player of his time. After a course of travel in Italy, he was, in 1818, appointed director of the music at the theatre at Frankfort-on-the-Maine. About this time he commenced writing those operas which made his name famous throughout Europe. The most popular of these works are, "Azor," "Faust," "Zemira," and "Jessonda." On leaving Frankfort he was appointed chapel-master to the duke of Hesse-Cassel. His oratorios and orchestral pieces are frequently performed in England. His "Violin School" is the best work of the kind which has ever been written. For the Norwich musical festival he expressly composed his oratorio, "The Fall of Babylon," which, together with "The Last Judgment" and "The Crucifixion," are classed among the finest works of their order. He also produced songs, ballads, cantatas, and orchestral pieces, which are highly esteemed in Germany. B. at Seesen, in the duchy of Brunswick, 1783.

SPOLETO, spo-lai'-to, a town of the States of the Church, and formerly the capital of a duchy of the same name, on a hill, near the small river Mareggia, 24 miles from Rieti. The buildings commonly noticed by travellers are the cathedral and the castle, the former presenting a front of five Gothic arches, supported by Grecian pillars. The castle is a vast stone structure, surrounded with a rampart. It is an archbishop's see, and has some interesting remains. Manf. Hats and woollens. Pop. 8,000.

SPON, Charles, spawng, a learned French writer and eminent physician, who practised with great success at Lyons. He published the "Prognostics" of Hippocrates in hexameter verse. B. at Lyons, 1609; D. 1684.

SPON, James, an eminent French writer, and son of the preceding. In 1675 he made a tour in Dalmatia, Greece, and the Levant, of which he printed an account. He was the author of many valuable and curious works, as, "Recherches des Antiquités de Lyon," "Voyage de la Grèce et du Levant," "Histoire de la Ville et de l'Etat de Genève," 1680. B. at Lyons, 1647; D. 1686.

SPONDANUS, John, or DE SPONDE, de(r)-spond, a learned French writer, who produced a commentary on Homer's "Iliad" and "Odyssey," which was dedicated to the king of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV. of France. He also edited Aristotle's "Logic." B. 1557; D. 1595.

SPONDANUS, Henry, a learned French writer, and younger brother of the preceding. He studied the civil and canon law, and his learning and eloquence attracting the notice of Henry IV., then prince of Bearn, he was made by him master of the requests at Navarre. In 1595 he abjured the Protestant religion, and on taking orders was preferred to a bishopric, in 1643. Spondanus published an abridgment of Baronius's "Annals." B. 1568; D. 1643.

SPORADES, or the 'Scattered Islands,' spor'-a-dees, a subdivision of the Grecian Archipelago, belonging partly to Turkey and partly to Greece. They surround the Cyclades.

SPOTLAND, spot'-land, a township of Lancashire, in the parish of Rochdale, of which town it forms a suburb. Pop. 25,000.

SPOTSWOOD, or SPOTISWOOD, John, spots'-wood, a learned Scotch prelate. In 1603, upon the accession of James to the throne of England, he was one of the Scotch clergy appointed to attend the king, and in the same year was advanced to the archbishopric of Glasgow, and made one of the privy council in Scotland. In 1615 he was translated to the see of St. Andrews. He was afterwards the favourite of Charles I., who, in 1635, made him lord high chancellor of Scotland; but the general dissatisfaction obliging him to leave that country, he retired to London. At the request of James I. he wrote his "History of the Church of Scotland, from the year 203 to the end of the reign of James VI." Burnet, in the "History of His Own Times," says that Spotswood "was a prudent and mild man, but of no great decency in his course of life; for he was a frequent player at cards, and used to eat often in taverns; besides that, all his livings were scandalously exposed to sale by his servants." B. in the county of Edinburgh, 1565; D. in London, subsequently to 1639.

SPOTSWOOD, Sir Robert, second son of the preceding, was eminent for his abilities and knowledge of jurisprudence. He was created a lord of session by King James, and afterwards lord president of the same court by King Charles; but was put to death by the Covenanters for adhering to the marquis of Montrose. Executed 1646.

SPRAGGE, Sir Edward, sprăg, a distinguished English admiral, was a captain in the first engagement with the Dutch in 1665, when, for his gallant conduct, he was knighted by the king on board the Royal Charles. He attracted the particular notice of the duke of Albemarle in the four days' battle in 1666, and, in the following year, he burnt a number of Dutch fire-ships when they came up the Thames, which threw their whole fleet into confusion, and caused them to retreat. In 1671 he destroyed, in the Mediterranean, seven Algerine men-of-war. He was sunk in his boat in an engagement with Van Tromp in 1673, as he was going from his disabled ship to another. His remains were interred in Westminster Abbey.

SPRANGER, Bartholomew, sprang'-er, an eminent Dutch painter, who, after studying under various masters, went to Italy, where he was patronized by Cardinal Farnese and Pope Pius V. On his return to Germany he became chief painter to the emperor Maximilian II., whose successor, Rudolph, gave him a patent of nobility and a pension. B. at Antwerp, 1546; D. at Prague, about 1625.

SPRAT, Thomas, sprăt, a learned English bishop. After the Restoration he entered upon holy orders, and was one of the first members of the Royal Society, of which he wrote the history. He became chaplain to the king, dean of Westminster, and bishop of Rochester. He was also dean of the chapel royal, and was one of the commissioners for ecclesiastical affairs in the reign of James II. He, however, complied with the accession of William III. He wrote, "The Plague of Athens," a poem; a poem on the death of Cromwell; "The Life of Cowley;" "History of the Rye-House Plot;" "Relation of the wicked Conspiracy of Stephen Blackhead and Robert Young;" and Sermons. B. at Fallaton, Devonshire, 1636; D. at Bromley, Kent, 1713.

SPREE, spre, a river of Germany, rising in the kingdom of Saxony, and, after a course of 220 miles, joining the Haval at Spandau. It is connected with the Oder by Frederick-William's Canal.

SPREMBERG, sprem'-bairg, a town of Prussia, on an island in the Spree, 15 miles from Cottbus. Pop. 5,000.

SPRENGEL, Matthew Christian, spreng'-el, an eminent German historian, who became professor of philosophy at Gottingen, and, at a subsequent date, of history at Halle. He produced, among other important works, "History of the Principal Discoveries in Geography, from the earliest times to that of Japan, in 1542;" "History of the Revolutions in India, from 1756 till 1783;" "History of the Mahrattas;" "Manual of the Statistics of the Chief States of Europe." This last work is particularly useful to the student of history. It is to be regretted that it extends no later than the year 1793. B. at Rostock, 1746; D. 1803.

SPRENGEL, Curt, a celebrated German botanist, physician, and writer upon medicine and medical history. The son of an erudite divine, who superintended his early education, he made such progress in learning, that, in his 14th year, he was not only proficient in Greek, Latin, and some modern languages, but had acquired a fair knowledge of Hebrew and Arabic. At the same early age he also produced a work on botany, in a series of letters entitled "Botany for Ladies." He proceeded to the university of Halle in 1781, and, three years afterwards, took his degree in medicine. In 1789 he was appointed professor extraordinary of medicine at Halle. In 1797, after he had become ordinary professor of medicine in the university, he published at Halle his "Manual of Pathology." He soon afterwards succeeded to the chair of botany, and although he received tempting offers from many other learned bodies, including the university of Berlin, he refused to quit Halle, where he remained until the close of his life. He was an honorary member of more than seventy learned societies. The most important works of this, one of the most learned men of his time, were,—"The History of Medicine;" "Institutiones Medicæ," in which he gave a complete account of the science of medicine; "Antiquitates Botanicæ;" "History of the Vegetable Kingdom,"—written in German; and "Physiological and Descriptive Botany;" a German translation of the "Natural History of Plants" by Theophrastus; and an edition of the "Genera Plantarum" of Linnæus. B. at Bolderkow, Pomerania, 1766; D. at Halle, 1833.

SPRENGEL, William, a celebrated surgeon, and son of the preceding. He was professor of surgery at Grieſwald. D. 1828.

SPRINGFIELD, spring'-feeld, a post-township of the United States, and capital of Hampden county, Massachusetts, on the Connecticut, 24 miles from Hartford. It has cannon-foundries and cotton and hardware factories. Pop. 12,000. Also the name of numerous other townships, with populations varying between 2,000 and 7,000.

SPRING-GARDEN, a town of the United States, being a suburb to Philadelphia, in Pennsylvania. It has numerous factories. Pop. 60,000.

SPROTTAU, sprot'-tou, a town of Prussian Silesia, on the Bober, 71 miles from Breslau. Manf. Woollens and linens. Pop. 5,000.

SPRUNER, Carl von, sproo'-ner, an eminent modern German historian and geographer, who pursued his studies at the military school of Munich. He received the commission of lieutenant in 1825, and rose through the intermediate grades, until, in 1855, he was created a major on the staff. Devoted to historical and geographical studies, he employed his leisure in producing a number of works thereon, which are of the highest value. The chief of these works are,—"The Country of Bavaria;" "Historical Tables of the German States;" "Atlas of History and Geography;" "Historical Guide to Bavaria;" "Historical Chart of Europe;" "Prince Rupert the Cavalier;" and "Historical Study and Atlas of History and Geography for the use of Schools." For his acquirements he was appointed a member of the Munich Academy of Sciences and a doctor of philosophy. B. at Stutgardt, 1803.

SPURN-HEAD, spurn, a promontory in the E. coast of the East Riding of Yorkshire, at the entrance of the Humber, 20 miles from Hull. Lat. 53° 34′ 7″ N. Lon. 0° 7′ 2″ E.

SPURZHEIM, John Gaspar, spurts'-hime, the associate with Dr. Gall in propagating the system of phrenology. While a student of medicine at Vienna, he attended the lectures of Gall, whose chief follower he became. (See GALL.) With Gall he travelled through Germany, France, and Denmark, lecturing in the principal towns on their system. In 1813 he withdrew from his chief, and repaired to England, where, during three years, he lectured and wrote upon the system. In the interval 1817-25, he resided at Paris; but, in the latter year, he returned to England, where he found his theories had become popular. With the view of disseminating his doctrines, he sailed for the United States in 1838, but died soon after his arrival there. He wrote extensively upon phrenology, and made some important discoveries relative to the anatomy of the brain. B. at Longwich, near Treves, 1776; D. at Boston, U.S., 1832.

SQUARCIONE, Francis, squar'-che-o'-nai, an eminent Italian painter, who travelled in Greece to make designs after the remains of antiquity, and on his return to Italy gained so great a reputation, and founded so large a school (he had 137 pupils), as to be called the father of painters. B. at Padua, 1394; D. at the same city, 1444.

SQUILLACE, squc-la'-chai, a town of Italy, kingdom of Naples, 35 miles from St. Severino. Pop. 3,000.

SQUIRE, Samuel, squire, a learned English prelate, who became fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge; in 1760, dean of Bristol, and in the year following bishop of St. David's. His most important works are,—"A Defence of the Ancient Greek Chronology and an Enquiry into the Origin of the Greek Language;" an "Enquiry into the Nature of the English Constitution;" and "Indifference to Religion inexcusable." B. at Warminster, Wiltshire, 1714; D. 1766.

STAAL. (See STAËL.)

STAAL, Madlle. de Launay, Baroness de, stal, a French authoress, who became servant to the duchess of Maine; and, being noticed by Fontenelle for her accomplishments, she acquired the friendship of many persons of distinction. She married the Baron de Staal, captain in the Swiss Guards. Her Memoirs and Letters, which are very curious, were published after her death. B. at Paris, about 1684; D. 1750.

STABROEK, stal'-brook, the old Dutch name for George-town, British Guiana.

STACKHOUSE, Thomas, stăk'-house, an English divine, who wrote, among other works on popular theology, "A Review of the Controversy concerning Miracles," "A System or Body of Practical Divinity," and "A History of the Bible." B. about 1681; D. at Benham, Berks, 1752.

STADE, stad, a fortified town of Hanover, on the Schwinge, 22 miles from Hamburg. It has a council-house, merchants' hall, gymnasium, and churches. Pop. 6,500.

STADTBERG, stat'-bairg, a town of Prussian Westphalia, on the Dymel, 9 miles from Paderborn. Pop. 3,000.

STADTHAGEN, stat-ha'-gen, a town of Germany, on the Dymel, 9 miles from Minden. It has a castle and a ducal mausoleum. Pop. 2,000.—A station on the Hanover and Minden Railway.

STAËL, Anne Germaine de, sta'-el, a celebrated French authoress, who was the daughter of Necker, minister of finance under Louis XVI. After receiving a most careful education, she applied herself to literary composition, and produced several plays and tales; but the first of her works which attracted notice was her "Letters upon the Writings and Character of Rousseau." This appeared in 1788, previously to which she had become the wife of the Baron de Staël-Holstein, the Swedish ambassador, a nobleman very much older than herself. Upon the outburst of the revolution, her parents retired from France; but, as the wife of the representative of a friendly power, she was allowed to remain. Her sympathies were at the outset entirely with the revolution. The sufferings of the royal family, however, awoke in her breast a horror of the abuses which were being perpetrated under the name of liberty. She was even courageous enough to print a defence of Marie Antoinette, under the title of "Reflections upon the Trial of the Queen;" but, during the Reign of Terror, she was compelled to seek safety out of her native country. Upon the establishment of the Directory, she returned to Paris. Enjoying a large share of influence in political circles, she, from the first, divined and denounced the ambitious projects of Bonaparte. Accordingly, when the successful general became first consul, one of his first edicts was the banishment of Madame de Staël from Paris, declaring that he left the whole world open to the eloquent and ambitious lady, but reserved the French capital for himself. She thereupon set out upon a course of travel in Switzerland and Italy, the results of which were expressed in her novels of "Delphine" and "Corinne." In 1810 appeared at Paris, although she herself was debarred therefrom, her celebrated work entitled "De l'Allemagne." In this production she portrayed the habits, literature, and political tendencies of the German people. Immediately after publication, 10,000 copies of the book were seized by Napoleon's minister of police. Madame de Staël, from her retreat at Coppet, on the banks of the Lake of Geneva, protested against this act. The minister of police answered: "Your last work is not French, and I have stopped its publication. Your exile is a natural consequence of your constant behaviour for years past. I have thought that the air of France was not suitable to you, for we are not yet reduced so low as to seek for models among the nations you admire." Resolved to escape the galling system of espionage to which she was now subjected by the French police, she set out for Russia, afterwards repairing to England. Her next work, an impassioned denunciation of Napoleon and his arbitrary rule, was named "Ten Years of Exile." She returned to Paris upon the abdication of Napoleon, in 1814, and was allowed to remain, even after the emperor's return from Elba. At the restoration of the Bourbons, she retired to Switzerland, and never again interfered with politics. Subsequently to the death of the Baron de Staël, she privately married M. Rocca. In her retirement she occupied herself with the composition of her famous work, entitled "Considérations sur la Révolution Française." In this work, which did not appear until after her demise, she gives a graphic account of the stormy period when France was torn by faction and delivered over to republican fury. Her political associate, Benjamin Constant, says: "If she had painted individuals more frequently and more in detail, her work, though it might have ranked lower as a literary composition, would have gained in interest." Nevertheless, the work contains some admirable sketches of Mirabeau, Calonne, Brienne, Pethion, and other leaders of party, with whom she had come into contact. She also produced essays on the Influence of the Passions, on Suicide, and on Fiction. Altogether, she was one of the most remarkable personages of a remarkable age. B. at Paris, 1768; D. in Switzerland, 1817.

STAFFA, stăf'-fa, a small island of the Hebrides, celebrated for its basaltic pillars, and for its remarkable natural caverns, about 15 miles west of the island of Mull, and 9 from Icolm-kill. Desc. It is of an irregular oval shape, and about a mile and a half in circumference, presenting an uneven table-land, terminating, nearly all round, in cliffs of variable height. The cave of Fingal, which fronts the south-west, is much celebrated. "The mind can hardly form an idea," says Sir Joseph Banks, "more magnificent than such a space, supported on each side by ranges of columns, and roofed by the bottoms of those which have been broken off to form it." The height of the cave, within, diminishes very soon to a mean measure, varying from 50 to 42 feet. The length is 227 feet. There are other caves; namely, Mackinnon's, or the Scart or Cormorant's cave, and the Boat cave.

STAFFORD, stăf'-ford, a market-town and borough of Staffordshire, on the Sow, about three miles from its junction with the Trent. The town is of an irregular oval figure, and contains two churches,—St. Mary's and St. Chad's, several chapels, the county-hall, the assembly-room, the county infirmary, the gaol, a lunatic asylum, and a free school. Behind the county-hall is a convenient market-place. Manf. Boots and shoes. There is also a considerable business carried on in tanning. Pop. 12,000. The earliest authentic mention of Stafford is in the Saxon Chronicle, A.D. 913. It is the birthplace of Isaak Walton, and has a station on the London and North-Western Railway.

STAFFORD, a county in the N.E. part of Virginia, U.S. Area, 297 square miles. Pop. 9,000.

STAFFORD, the name of several townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 3,000.

STAFFORD, an ancient English family, originally from Normandy, the founder of which was Robert Tani, contemporary and follower of William the Conqueror, who created him governor of the castle of Stafford. Several members of this family have played a great part in English history, particularly Humphrey, general of Henry VI., who fought against the duke of York, and, for his services, was recompensed with the dukedom of Buckingham in 1465. Henry, his grandson, succeeded him in the dukedom. He was for some time the favourite of Richard III., and his second in his ambitious schemes; but having revolted against the king, he was, on being captured, decapitated in 1483. His son Edward was charged with treason under Henry VIII., and also perished upon the scaffold in 1521. This house having become extinct in the male line, its honours were continued through William Howard, who married Mary, the heiress of the Staffords. (See below.)

STAFFORD, William Howard, Viscount, an English nobleman, who is chiefly remarkable in history as the last victim to the Titus Oates plot. He was a Roman Catholic, and had been a stanch adherent to the fortunes of Charles I.; but, according to Burnet, "he thought the king had not rewarded him for his former services as he had deserved; so he often voted against the court, and made great applications always to the earl of Shaftesbury. He was on no good terms with the duke of York." Titus Oates denounced him, in 1678, to the House of Commons, as one who had been nominated by the general of the order of Jesuits to the office of paymaster of the forces. Two days afterwards Stafford surrendered himself, and several months later he was tried and found guilty, by a majority of the House of Lords, of having, among other crimes, offered rewards to several persons to kill the king. He protested his innocence both at his trial and subsequently. On the morning before his death he "denied," says Burnet, "all that the witnesses had sworn against him." A bill to reverse his attainder passed the Lords in 1685, but was thrown out in the House of Commons. His widow was, however, created countess of Stafford for life by James II., three years later, and in 1824 the viscount's attainder was reversed. In the succeeding year, Sir William Jerningham, having proved his claim through his descent from the granddaughter of the viscount, was granted the barony. B. 1612; executed 1680.

STAFFORDSHIRE, an inland county of England, nearly in the centre of the kingdom, bounded N. by Cheshire and part of Derbyshire, E. by Derbyshire and Warwickshire, and between these, for a short way, by Leicestershire, S. by Worcestershire, and W. by Shropshire and Cheshire. Area, 1,184 square miles. Desc. Diversified; a range of hills runs along the north-western border, spreading out towards the north, over the whole breadth of the county. To this bleak and hilly district in the north and north-west, the other parts of the county in the south, middle, and east, present a striking contrast, being generally level, or only interspersed with gentle eminences. Rivers. These rise mostly in the high grounds within the county. The chief are the Trent, with its tributaries, the Dove, the Manyfold, and the Hamps or Hanse, the Churnet, the Blythe, the Teyn, the Sow, the Penk, and the Tame. The Stour and Smestal run southwards into the Severn Pro. The principal crops are, wheat, rye, barley, oats, beans, peas, vetches, buckwheat, hemp, flax, turnips, potatoes, cabbages, rape; to these may be added clovers, trefoils, and two or three of the real grasses. Minerals. Abundant; comprising coal, iron, limestone, copper, and lead. In some places the limestone approaches to, and passes into, marble. The marble is of various kinds. Alabaster occurs in great abundance. Freestone of very good quality is found in this county, and there are extensive quarries of it in different places. Clays of every description are abundant, and form the principal material of its potteries. Manf. Various and extensive. Besides iron-foundries, blast-furnaces, and slitting-mills, and other branches of the iron trade, which, especially in the southern districts, employ great numbers of people, they consist chiefly of potters' ware, glass, hardware articles, nails, toys, and japanned goods. The potteries of Staffordshire have acquired the most extensive celebrity, not only from their vast extent, but from their perfection, and from the great improvements which were introduced into the manufacture by the inventive genius and indefatigable labours of Wedgwood. It was about the year 1760 that he began to produce those different kinds of ware which are now in universal demand. The manufacture of glass is most considerable in the vicinity of Stourbridge. Wolverhampton, and the many populous villages in its neighbourhood, are distinguished for their manufacture of locks, buckles, steel toys, and particularly watch-chains; Walsall and its neighbourhood for shoe-buckles and clasps. Vast quantities of nails are also made in many of the country parishes. Wolverhampton and Bilston produce a variety of plated, lacquered, japanned, and also some enamelled goods. There are also manufactures of tobacco- and snuff-boxes, shoes, and hats. Tin and brass are among the productions in Staffordshire; and there are several smelting and brass-works near the copper-mines. The cotton manufactures are very considerable; and there is a manufacture of salt, obtained by boiling brine. The silk trade is carried on to a large extent; also the tape manufacture. The trade of the county has been greatly advanced by the extensive system of inland navigation, which at once connects this county, not only with the metropolis, but with the Severn, the Mersey, and the Humber, and the three corresponding ports of Bristol, Liverpool, and Hull. Pop. 610,000. This county belongs to the diocese of Lichfield.

STAGNELIUS, Eric John, stag-ne'-li-us, a poet, and surnamed the Swedish Shelley. He evinced a genius for poetry, even from his earliest years, and shortly after the termination of his career at college, he produced his first work, "Vladimir the Great," an epic poem, the subject of which was the conversion of the Russians to Christianity. He held an appointment in the department of Ecclesiastical Affairs of Sweden, and, throughout his life, continued to produce poems, which are held to surpass all other productions of the same kind in the Swedish language. After his death, his works were collected into three volumes. A complete German translation of his poems appeared in 1851. An English translation of a few of his lyrics was given in the "Foreign Review." B. 1793; D. 1823.

STAHL, George Ernest, stal, a celebrated German chemist. He was educated at Jena, where he took his doctor's degree in 1683; but, upon the establishment of the university of Halle, in 1694, he was appointed professor of anatomy and chemistry there. Acquiring great reputation in this office, he was, in 1716, invited to Berlin, and made counsellor of the court and physician to the king. Stahl was more eminent in chemistry than in medicine, because he was less fanciful. He made many important discoveries, the chief being his theory of phlogiston, which, although erroneous in itself, led to the discovery of great truths in chemistry. He composed a number of learned works in Latin, upon medical science, and upon chemistry. His phlogistic theory, which held its ground for nearly a century, was given in a work entitled "Zymotechnia Fundamentalis." D. at Anspach, 1660; D. at Berlin, 1734.

STAINES, stains, a market-town of Middlesex, on the Thames, over which there is a strong timber bridge, 19 miles from St. Paul's Cathedral, London. The church consists of a chancel, nave, and north aisle. Pop. 2,600.

STAINTON, stain'-ton, the name of several parishes in England, with populations varying between 150 and 3,000.

STAIR, James Dalrymple, Earl of, stair, a Scottish general and statesman, who exerted himself in arousing his countrymen against James II. William III. soon after his accession, created Dalrymple a colonel.

He served under Marlborough in 1702; represented the English nation at the court of Poland during the interval 1709-13, and in France during the regency. He induced the regent D'Orleans to expel the Pretender from French territory, and in the reign of George II. he became grand-admiral of Scotland, and was created a field-marshal. He was nominated to the command of the English forces in Germany, and gained over Marshal the duke de Noailles the battle of Dettingen, in 1743. He also frustrated the attempt made upon English territory, in 1745-6, by the Pretender, Charles Edward. B. at Edinburgh, 1673; D. 1747.

STALBRIDGE, stäl'-bridj, a market-town of Dorsetshire, on a branch of the Stour, 7 miles from Sherborne. Here is a large ancient church, a charity-school, and other schools. Manf. Stockings, chiefly. Pop. 2,000.

STALEYBRIDGE, stai'-le-bridj, a market-town and chapelry of Lancashire and Cheshire, 6 miles from Stockport. Manf. Principally cotton goods. Pop. 21,000. It has a station on the Manchester and Birmingham Railway.

STALIMÉNE. (See LEMNOS.)

STAMFORD, stăm'-ford, an ancient and considerable market and borough town of Lincolnshire, on the Welland, at the south-western angle of the county, on the borders of Rutlandshire and Northamptonshire, 12 miles from Peterborough. One of its parishes is in Northamptonshire, but the greater part of the town is built on the slope of a hill on the Lincoln side of the river. Its principal buildings are, several churches, a town-hall, a theatre, and assembly-rooms. Stamford formerly contained several monastic establishments, and is related by tradition to have been, at one time, the seat of a university. It has various schools, and its charitable foundations are numerous. Pop. 9,000.—This was a place of note in the time of the Danes and the Saxons.

STAMFORD, a township of British N. America, Upper Canada, to the W. of the Falls of Niagara.

STAMFORD, the name of several townships in the United States, none with a population above 6,000.

STANCO, stan'-ko, a small island in the Grecian archipelago. (See COS.)

STANFIELD, Clarkson, stăn'-feeld, an eminent modern English painter, who first studied marine effects, in depicting which he subsequently became so skilful, from the forecastle of an English man-of-war. Curiously enough, he was a seaman on board the vessel in which Douglas Jerrold served as a midshipman. Abandoning the navy, he became a scene-painter at the old Royalty theatre, near Wellclose Square, in London, at that period a popular resort of the English sailor. Becoming eminent as a scene-painter, he was engaged for Drury-Lane theatre. During many years he worked hard for the stage, but found time to paint small pictures of coast scenery and shipping, and in the latter walk he achieved so high a reputation that, in 1832, he was elected an associate of the Royal Academy. Three years later, he became R.A., by which time he had entirely withdrawn himself from theatrical work. From this period he was one of the most brilliant and popular contributors to the yearly exhibitions of the Royal Academy. True to nature, manly in style, and a thorough master of the technicalities of his art, he was one of the great ornaments of the English school of landscape-painters. Several of his pictures—far from being the best, however—are included in the British collection at the South Kensington Museum. Perhaps his finest productions are—"The Victory bearing the Body of Nelson towed into Gibraltar, seven days after the Battle of Trafalgar;" "The Abandoned;" "Port-na-Spana, near the Giant's Causeway, with the Wrecked Vessels of the Spanish Armada;" and "St. Sebastian during the Siege under the Duke of Wellington." A collection of lithographs from his sketches on the Rhine and Moselle was published. He also designed a great many subjects for Heath's "Picturesque Annual." B. at Sunderland, about 1800.

STANFORD, stăn'-ford, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 2,000.

STANFORD, the capital of Lincoln county, Kentucky, U.S. It has a court-house and gaol. Pop. 7,000.—2. In Duchess county, New York, 16 miles from Poughkeepsie. Pop. 2,200.

STANHOPE, Charles, third Earl of, stăn'-hope, an English nobleman, chiefly celebrated for his mechanical inventions, the most important of which was the printing-press which is named after him. He also designed improvements in the construction of canal locks, and made some researches into the action of the electric fluid. He opposed the ministry of his time, and considered the French revolution as a great step towards social improvement. He wrote a few works, the most remarkable of which were his "Reply to Mr. Burke's Reflections upon the French Revolution," and a refutation of Dr. Price's "Plan for a Sinking Fund." He was the father of the celebrated Lady Hester Stanhope. B. 1753; D. 1816.

STANHOPE, George, an eminent English divine, who became chaplain to William III. and afterwards to Queen Anne, and also dean of Canterbury. His most important works were,—"A Paraphrase and Comment upon the Epistles and Gospels;" translations of Thomas à Kempis; Rochefoucauld's "Maxims;" St. Augustine's "Meditations;" "Charron on Wisdom;" Epictetus's "Morals;" &c. B. in Derbyshire, 1660; D. 1728.

STANHOPE, James, first Earl of, a celebrated English nobleman, who early entered upon a military career, and distinguished himself so much at the siege of Namur, in 1695, that William III. gave him a company in the Guards, and the rank of lieutenant-colonel. In 1705 he served as a brigadier-general under the earl of Peterborough at the siege of Barcelona. He was afterwards created major-general and commander-in-chief of the British forces in Spain, by Queen Anne. In 1708 he captured Port Mahon, and obtained possession of the island of Minorca; subsequently gaining the victories of Almanza and Saragossa; but, being intrusted with the defence of Brihuega, he was obliged to surrender it, after a gallant resistance, to the duke de Vendôme. George I. appointed him secretary of state, and in 1714 sent him as ambassador to Vienna. In 1717 he was appointed first lord of the treasury and chancellor of the Exchequer; but relinquished these offices on being created a peer soon afterwards. B. 1673; D. in London, 1721.

STANHOPE, Philip Dormer. (See CHESTERFIELD, Earl of.)

STANHOPE, Philip Henry, fifth Earl of, an eminent English historian and statesman, who, after completing his education at Oxford, entered the House of Commons as the representative of Wotton-Basset, in 1832. He was afterwards member for Hertford during the interval 1835-52. He held office as under-secretary of state for Foreign Affairs in the short ministry of the duke of Wellington, 1834-5; and again as secretary to the Board of Control, in the administration of Peel, in 1845-6. As an historical writer, his reputation was founded upon his "History of the War of Succession in Spain," and "History of England from the Peace of Utrecht to the Peace of Versailles, 1713—1783." He also produced several less-important works, such as the "Life of Louis, Prince of Condé;" the "Life of Joan of Arc," &c. A collection of his essays contributed to the "Edinburgh Review" was published in 1849. The Copyright, or Lord Mahon's Act, was carried by him; and to his exertions is chiefly due the governmental scheme of forming a national portrait-gallery. In 1855 he succeeded to the earldom of Stanhope, before which period he had been styled Lord Mahon. B. at Walmer, Kent, 1805.

STANISLAUS I., Leczinski, stan'-is-laws, king of Poland, was the son of the grand treasurer of that kingdom. In 1704 he was deputed by the assembly at Warsaw to Charles XII. of Sweden, who had just conquered Poland. That monarch caused him to be crowned king at Warsaw in 1705; but when Charles was defeated, in 1709, Stanislaus was obliged to leave his kingdom. On the death of Augustus, in 1733, he returned, in hopes of being acknowledged; but the power of the emperor of Germany and the empress of Russia prevailed against him, and he was again obliged to fly. He died at an advanced age, in consequence of his night-gown taking fire. He was the author of some productions in French and Polish, which were printed under the title of "The Works of a Liberal Philosopher." B. 1677; D. 1766.

STANISLAUS AUGUSTUS PONIATOWSKI, king of Poland, was the son of a Lithuanian nobleman. After receiving a liberal education, he went upon a course of travel, and resided a considerable time in England, where he became intimate with Sir Charles Hanbury Williams, whom he accompanied in his embassy to St. Petersburg. At this court the elegance of his person and his accomplishments recommended him to the favour of the grand-duchess, afterwards Catherine II., which gave such offence to the empress Elizabeth, that she made representations to Augustus III., king of Poland, by whom he was recalled. On the death of that monarch, in 1763, Catherine interposed her influence so effectually in behalf of her favourite, that he was elected king of Poland, to the great discontent of a large party of the nobility of that kingdom. Too weak to avert the calamity, Stanislaus saw 13,500 square miles of his kingdom divided between Russia, Prussia, and Austria, in 1772. A second partition took place in 1793. In the following year Kosciusko gathered together an army, chiefly composed of peasants, with which he fought with the most astonishing bravery against the overwhelming masses of Russia. But, being defeated and taken prisoner, the Russians entered Warsaw. Stanislaus was forced to resign his crown, and the remainder of Poland was, in 1795, divided between Russia, Austria, and Prussia. The unfortunate monarch retired first to Grodno, whence he was called to St. Petersburg, where he remained until his death. B. at Wolczyn, Lithuania, 1732; D. at St. Petersburg, 1798.

STANISLAWOW, stan'-is-law-ow, a fortified town of Austrian Poland, and capital of a circle, 75 miles from Lemberg. It has a gymnasium. Pop. 11,000.

STANLEY, stăn'-le, a township of the West Riding of Yorkshire, 2 miles from Wakefield. Pop. 7,500.—The name of several other townships, none of them with a population above 3,000.

STANLEY, a county of the United States, S. Carolina. Area, 353 square miles. Pop. 7,000.

STANLEY, Thomas, a learned English writer, who, at the conclusion of his educational career at Cambridge, where he took his degrees in arts, entered himself of the Middle Temple. He appears to have principally devoted himself to literature, and to have practised the law but little. His most important works are—the "History of Philosophy" and "Lives of Philosophers;" an edition of Ælian's "Various History," and an edition of Æschylus, with a Latin version. B. at Cumberlow, Herts, 1625; D. in London, 1678.

STANLEY, John, an eminent English musician, who became blind at the age of 2 years, and at 7 began to learn music, in which he made such progress that he was placed under Dr. Green, and at the early age of 11 he obtained the place of organist of Allhallows, Bread Street. In 1723 he was chosen organist of St. Andrew's, Holborn, and in 1734 was elected by the benchers of the Temple their organist. In 1779 he was appointed master of the king's band of musicians. His compositions evince taste and judgment. B. in London, 1713; D. 1786.

STANLEY, Rev. Edward, an eminent English prelate and ornithologist, who, after studying at the university of Cambridge, was, in 1805, presented by his father, Sir John Stanley, to the living of Alderley, in Cheshire, the duties of which he fulfilled during thirty-two years. In 1837 he was promoted to the see of Norwich. A most tolerant and kindly churchman, he took little interest in matters purely controversial, but chose rather to devote his leisure to the pursuits of natural science. He was an accomplished geologist, entomologist, and botanist; but his published works show that ornithology was his favourite study. His "Familiar History of British Birds, their Nature, Habits, and Instincts," is an excellent work, and has passed through many editions. He also contributed articles upon natural history to "Blackwood's Magazine." He was a fellow of the Royal and president of the Linnæan Society. B. in London, 1779; D. 1849.

STANLEY, Rev. Arthur Penrhyn, a modern English divine and writer, the son of the preceding. He was sent at an early age to Rugby, where he earned the esteem and friendship of Dr. Arnold. In 1834 he proceeded to Oxford, and subsequently became fellow and tutor of University College there. In 1851 he was nominated a canon of Canterbury, and subsequently became chaplain to Prince Albert, as well as to the bishop of London. In 1856 he was chosen to fill the chair of Ecclesiastical History in the university of Oxford. In theology, as well as in church politics, he was a zealous follower of the late Dr. Arnold. Of that great ornament to the established church he had always been a disciple; he preached his funeral sermon in 1842, at Rugby, and in 1844 produced a lasting memorial of his worth, in the "Life and Correspondence of Thomas Arnold, D.D." Canon Stanley also produced—a Memoir of his father, the bishop of Norwich; "Historical Memorials of Canterbury;" and an important work, entitled "Sinai and Palestine in connection with their History." Several collections of sermons and essays also emanated from him. B. at Alderley, Cheshire, 1813.

STANLEY, Edward Henry Smith, Lord, a modern English statesman, and the son of the earl of Derby. After leaving the university of Cambridge, he went upon a course of travel through the United States, Canada, and the West Indies. At a later period he visited India, whence he was recalled to undertake, in 1852, the duties of under-secretary of state for Foreign Affairs, in the administration of his father. When Lord Derby again formed a cabinet, in 1858, Lord Stanley became president of the Board of Control, or, more properly, secretary of state for India, the former title being abolished. In this office, which he held whilst his father retained power, he is acknowledged to have directed the affairs of India in an enlightened and statesmanlike manner. B. at Knowsley, 1826.

STANSTEAD, stan'-sted, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 2,000.

STANTON, stăn'-ton, the name of numerous parishes of England, with populations varying between 100 and 2,000.

STANYHURST, Richard, stan'-ne-hurst, an Irish Roman Catholic divine, who was educated at University College, Oxford; after which he went abroad, and became chaplain to the archduke Albert, governor of the Netherlands. He wrote, among other works, in Latin, "The Life of St. Patrick;" and made an English translation of the four first books of the "Æneid." He was uncle to Archbishop Usher. B. at Dublin, 1545; D. at Brussels, 1618.

STANZ, stantz, a well-built town of Switzerland, 42 miles from Bern. It has a town-hall, with a series of portraits of historical personages, and in the market-place there is a statue of Arnold Von Winkelreid, who was born here. There is also a monument to commemorate the persons massacred by the French in 1798. Pop. 2,000.

STAPEL, John Bodæus, sta'-pel, an eminent Dutch physician and botanist, who devoted his life to the researches necessary for producing a complete edition of the botanical writings of Theophrastus. His death took place before he could complete his task; but some of his materials were used by his father, in the edition of Theophrastus published at Amsterdam in 1644. D. 1636.

STAPLEDON, Walter, stai'-pel-don, an English prelate, who was educated at Oxford. His merits recommended him to the court, and he was made bishop of Exeter and treasurer of England. He founded Exeter College, Oxford, and was beheaded by the insurgents of London, at the cross in Cheapside, in 1326.

STAPLEFORD, stai'-pel-ford, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 2,000.

STAPLETON, stai'-pel-ton, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 2,000.

STAPLETON, Thomas, an English Roman Catholic divine, who obtained, in the reign of Mary, a canonry in Chichester cathedral; but in that of Elizabeth he went abroad, and settled at Louvain, where he was appointed professor in divinity. His works, chiefly upon theology, were published at Paris in 1620. D. 1598.

STAPYLTON, Sir Robert, an English poet, who became gentleman usher to the prince of Wales, afterwards Charles II. He received the honour of knighthood from Charles I., and was with him at the battle of Edgehill. After the Restoration his services were rewarded. He published a translation of Juvenal, and some plays. D. 1699.

STARALA RUSSA, sta-ra'-la, a town of European Russia, 137 miles from St. Petersburg. It has an imperial palace and salt-works. Pop. 9,000.

STARGARD, NEW, star'-gart, a town of Prussian Pomerania, on the Ihna, 21 miles from Stettin. Manf. Woollens, soap, and tobacco. There are also breweries and distilleries. Pop. 12,300. This place has railway communication with Stettin. Also the names of several other towns, none of them with a population above 3,000.

STARK, stark, a county in the E. of Ohio, U.S. Area, 587 square miles. Pop. 40,000.

STARKENBACH, star'-ken-bak, a town of Bohemia, 25 miles from New Bidschow. Pop. 2,500.

STARKENBURG, star'-ken-boorg, a province of Hesse-Darmstadt, between the Rhine and the Maine. Pop. 320,000.

STARODUB, sta'-ro-doob, a town of European Russia, government of Tchernigov, on the Babintza. It has a cathedral. Pop. 9,000.

START POINT, a cape on the S.E. coast of the county of Devon, about 10 miles from Dartmouth. It has a revolving light 204 feet above the sea.

STATEN ISLAND, stät'-en, an island of the United States, which forms Richmond county, in the state of New York, from the capital of which it is 8 miles. Area, 63 square miles. Desc. Hilly and fertile, with iron-mines and fishing villages. Pop. 16,000.—There is daily communication by steamboats from this place to New York.

STATES OF THE CHURCH, PAPAL OR PONTIFICAL STATES, a country of Italy, bounded on the N. by the territory of Venice and Lombardy, E. by the Adriatic, S.E. by the (recent) kingdom of Naples, S.W. by the Mediterranean, and W. by Tuscany and Modena. It occupies the central part of the peninsula. Area, 17,495 square miles. Political Divisions. In 1832 the state was divided into twenty provinces, of which the legations are six and the delegations thirteen. The capital and its district is called the Camarca. The names of the legations are Bologna, Ferrara, Forli, Ravenna, Urbino, with Pesaro and Velletri. The delegations are Ancona, Macerata, Camerino, Fermo, Ascoli, Perugia, Spoleto, Rieti, Viterbo, Civita Vecchia, Orvieta, Frosinone, Benevento. The former are each governed by a cardinal, and each of the latter by a prelate. Desc. Diversified, fertile, and well watered. In the N. it includes part of the great plain of the Po, and in the S.W. the undulating plain called the Campagna di Roma, terminating in the Pontine marshes. Rivers. The Tiber and its affluents in the S.; N. of the Apennines it is watered by numerous small torrents and the principal branch of the Po. Lakes. Albano and Bracciano; the Pontine marshes and the marshes of Comacchio. Climate. Greatly varied by situation: cold in the mountains, and mild in the plains. In the Campagna of Rome the fatal miasma drives the cultivators of the soil at night into the neighbouring towns and villages. Pro. Wheat, maize, hemp, wine, oil, pulse, and tobacco. Sugar, cotton, and indigo are cultivated to a small extent, and chestnuts form a considerable article of food. Flocks of sheep and horses are reared, and numbers of swine feed in the forests of the Apennines. Minerals. Iron, lead, sulphur, alum, vitriol, and other volcanic products; salt is made in the lagoons. Manf. These are mostly confined to the large cities, and comprise silks, gloves, leather, paper, iron and glass wares, musical strings, soap, cordage, cream of tartar, glue, crape, and sausages at Bologna. The commerce is limited, and chiefly confined to the Mediterranean states. The fisheries are mostly conducted by the Neapolitans. The Pope. This sovereign, according to the ancient canon law, is the supreme, universal, and independent head of the Roman Catholic Church, and is invested with sovereignty over all Christian sovereigns, communities, and individuals. He has the title of Holy Father and Holiness, and is elected at every vacancy, from among the cardinals, each of whom is styled His Eminence. Every nation of the Roman Catholic religion has a cardinal for its protector. Previous to the 7th century, the popes were only bishops of Rome, and the basis of their temporal power was laid by the successive grants of Pepin, Charlemagne, and the emperor Henry III. It was not consolidated, however, until the 16th century. Education. This is conducted in universities, colleges, seminaries, and schools. The instruction is of inferior kind, and no general provision is made for that of the lower orders. The universities are seven; at Bologna, which is the most celebrated, Rome, Perugia, Ferrara, Camarino, Urbino, and Macerata. Inhab. Trade and manufactures being little encouraged, were it not for dates, figs, almonds, olives, and other fruits, which grow spontaneously, the indolence of the inhabitants is such that they would be absolutely starved. The numerous holidays are great impediments to the exertions of industry, and the number of young sturdy beggars who stroll about as pilgrims, instead of increasing the common stock by their industry, lie as a dead weight on their fellow-subjects. In no part of Europe are to be found people more wretched than the Pope's temporal subjects. Army. Small. Navy. Small. Gov. An absolute elective monarchy. The Pope is chosen by the college of cardinals out of their own body, and is also a temporal sovereign. Pop. 3,000,000. Lat. between 41° 12′ and 44° 59′ N. Lon. between 10° 50′ and 13° 55′ E.—In 1790 Avignon and Venaissin were taken possession of by the French, and in 1798 they overturned the ancient government, and erected it into a republic, styled the Roman Republic, under the direction of five consuls. They obliged Pope Pius VI. to remove from Rome, first into the dominions of the grand-duke of Tuscany, and afterwards to Grenoble, in France, from which, whilst being again removed, he died, at Valence, 1799. In 1808 Napoleon I. divided the other states between the kingdom of Italy and the French empire, but in 1814, with the exception of Avignon, all these territories were restored. In 1847, Pope Pius IX. established a constitutional parliament, but the revolution of the following year overturned it. While we write (1861) the Pope holds his power by an extremely uncertain tenure.

STATIRA, sta-tī'-ra, wife of Darius Codomanus, was taken by Alexander the Great after the battle of Issus, and became the wife of that conqueror; on whose decease she was put to death by Roxana, 323 B.C.

STATIUS, Publius Papinius, stai'-shi-us, a Roman poet, who became the favourite of Domitian. There remain of Statius two heroic poems,—"Thebais," in 12 books, and the "Achilleis,"—and "Sylvæ," a collection of short poems on passing events. B. at Naples, 61; D. at the same city, 96.

STAUNTON, Sir George Leonard, stawn'-ton, an eminent Irish physician and diplomatist. He studied medicine at Montpellier, where he took his doctor's degree; after which he settled in London, where he became the friend of Dr. Johnson. About 1762 he went to Granada, where he practised as a physician, and acquired a fortune. He also became secretary to Lord Macartney, governor of the island; and, having studied the law, he discharged the office of attorney-general. On the capture of Granada by the French, he was made prisoner, and, with Lord Macartney, sent to France; but after some time returned to England. When Lord Macartney was appointed governor of Madras, he accompanied him as confidential secretary, in which capacity he displayed great abilities in the treaty with Tippoo Sultan in 1784. On his return to England he received a pension from the East-India Company, besides which he was created a baronet. In 1792 Lord Macartney went out as ambassador to China, and was accompanied by Sir George as secretary of legation. Of this voyage he published an elaborate and highly interesting account. He was interred in Westminster Abbey, where there is a fine monument to his memory by Chantrey. B. at Cargin, Galway, Ireland, 1737; D. in London, 1801.

STAUNTON, Sir George Thomas, a modern English writer, who was son of the preceding, whom he accompanied to China in 1792. On his return to England, he was entered of the university of Cambridge, where he pursued his studies in a distinguished manner. On leaving the university, he went out to China as secretary of the English factory at Canton, of which trading community he subsequently became president. In 1816 he was attached to the embassy of Lord Amherst, in which capacity his knowledge of the Chinese character and language enabled him to render great services to the English government. In 1817 he quitted the East, and thenceforth devoted himself to politics, employing his leisure in the composition of a number of valuable works. The most important of these were,—"The Penal Code of the Chinese Empire;" "Narrative of the Chinese Embassy to the Tartars in 1712-15;" "Journal of the Embassy of Lord Amherst;" "Memoirs of the Life and Family of the late Sir George Leonard Staunton;" and a translation from the Spanish of Mendoza, of a work entitled "History of the Great and Mighty Kingdom of China." This last work was undertaken for the Hakluyt Society. With a few short interruptions, Sir George sat in the House of Commons from 1818 until 1852. At the latter date he retired into private life. He was among the most distinguished of Chinese scholars; and so great were his acquirements in that exceedingly difficult language, that he was enabled to compose in it a treatise upon vaccination, which led to that medical preservative being employed in many parts of China. B. at Salisbury, 1781.

STAUNTON, a town of the United States, in Virginia, 100 miles from Richmond. Pop. 4,000.

STAUNTON, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 600.

STAUPITZ, John, stow'-pitz, dean of the faculty of Theology at Wittemberg, and vicar-general of the Augustines in Germany. It was he who charged Luther to defend his order against the Dominicans. D. 1527.

STAVANGER, sta-vang'-ger, an old seaport-town of Norway, on the coast, 85 miles from Christiansand. Pop. 9,000.

STAVELEY, Thomas, staiv'-le, a learned English lawyer and antiquary. He was the author of a work entitled "The Romish Horse-Leech, or a Discovery of the Enormous Exactions of the Court of Rome," and of the "History of Churches." D. in London, 1683.

STAVELY, two parishes of England. 1. In Derbyshire, 4 miles from Chesterfield. Pop. 5,000. This has a station on the Midland Counties Railway.—2. In the West Riding of Yorkshire, 3 miles from Boroughbridge. Pop. 500.

STAVERTON, stai'-ver-ton, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 1,200.

STAVROPOL, stav'-ro-pol, a town of European Russia, on the Wolga, government of Simbirsk. Pop. 3,600.—Another in Caucasia, on the Tachla, 60 miles from Alexandrov. Pop. 7,000.

STAVROS, stav'-ros, a village of European Turkey, 38 miles from Salonica, the birthplace of Aristotle.

STAY, Benedict, stai, a modern Latin poet, who produced a fine poem in that language, upon the philosophy of Descartes. He became secretary to Pope Clement XII. His finest production was a Latin poem upon the Newtonian philosophy. B. 1714; D. at Rome, 1801.

STAYNER, Sir Richard, stai'-ner, an English naval commander, who, in 1656, attacked a Spanish flotilla of eight sail, although his own force consisted of only three frigates. Two of the Spanish ships were captured, the remainder being either sunk or driven on shore. He returned with treasure to the amount of £600,000. Under Blake, he, in 1657, led the attack upon the Spanish fleet in the Bay of Santa Cruz, and for his distinguished gallantry upon that memorable occasion, he was created a knight by Cromwell. (See BLAKE.) After the Restoration, his knighthood was confirmed, and he was created rear-admiral of the fleet. He remained at sea during the rest of his life, although no occasion offered for the exercise of his skill and bravery as a seaman. After his death, at sea, his body was brought home and interred in London. Pepys, in his "Diary," records this last event as follows:—"By ten o'clock to Ironmongers' Hall, to the funeral of Sir Richard Stayner." D. 1662.

STEBBING, Henry, steb'-bing, a learned English divine, who distinguished himself in the Bangorian controversy against Hoadley, and afterwards attacked Warburton's "Divine Legation." He became chancellor of the diocese of Salisbury. His other works are,—"Sermons on Practical Christianity," and "Sermons on Boyle's Lectures." D. 1763.

STEELE, Sir Richard, steel, a celebrated essayist. His father, who was a barrister, acted in the capacity of private secretary to the duke of Ormond. He received his education at the Charter-house, in London, and at Merton College, Oxford, after which he obtained an ensigncy in the Guards. In 1702 he commenced his career as a dramatic writer, with the production of his comedy of "The Funeral, or Grief à la Mode," which had great success. This play was followed by the "Tender Husband" and the "Lying Lovers;" but his best work was the "Conscious Lovers," acted in 1722. In 1709 he began "The Tatler," a periodical paper, in which he had the assistance of Addison, as he also had in the "Spectator" and "Guardian;" the first commenced in 1711 and the last in 1713. His reputation as a writer procured him the place of commissioner of the stamp-office, which he resigned on being chosen member for Stockbridge. For writing two pamphlets, called the "Englishman" and the "Crisis," he was soon afterwards expelled the House of Commons, "which," says Lord Mahon, "was a fierce and most unwarrantable stretch of party violence." After the accession of George I., in 1715, he received the honour of knighthood, was appointed surveyor of the stables at Hampton Court, and governor of the royal company of comedians. He was also returned to parliament for Boroughbridge, in Yorkshire, and made one of the commissioners of the forfeited estates in Scotland. A distinguished critic observes of Sir Richard Steele, that he was a "man of undissembled and extensive benevolence. . . His works are chaste and manly. He was a stranger to the most distant appearance of envy or malevolence; never jealous of any man's growing reputation, and so far from arrogating any praise to himself from his conjunction with Mr. Addison, that he was the first who desired him to distinguish his papers. His great fault was want of economy; and it has been said of him, he was certainly the most agreeable and the most innocent rake that entered the rounds of dissipation." B. at Dublin, 1671; D. at Llangunnor, near Caermarthen, 1729.

STEEN, John, stain, a celebrated Dutch painter. "In spirit, humour, and invention," says Dr. Waagen, "Steen excels all other Dutch painters in the same line." B. at Leyden, 1636; D. 1689.

STEENKERKE, stain'-kerk, a town of Belgium, in the province of Hainault, 13 miles from Mons. Pop. 700. It is noted for the defeat of the allies by the French, 1692.

STEENWYK, Henry, stain'-vike, a Flemish painter, who excelled in depicting architectural subjects, or the insides of churches and Gothic buildings. B. 1585; D. in London, 1625.

STEEP-HOLMES ISLAND, steep homes, a rocky island in the Bristol Channel, at the mouth of the Severn, 10 miles from Cardiff. It has a circumference of about 2 miles, and was formerly the site of a priory.

STEEVENS, George, stē'-vens, an English writer, and one of the editors of Shakspere. In 1766 he published twenty of the plays of Shakspere, with notes. This work produced an intimacy between Steevens and Dr. Johnson, the result of which was a union of their labours as editors and commentators of Shakspere. Their edition appeared in 1773. Twenty years afterwards, Steevens published a still more accurate edition of the great English dramatist, in 15 vols. He also revised the proofs of Boydell's edition of Shakspere. B. at Stepney, 1736; D. at Hampstead, 1800.

STEFFANI, Agostino, stef-fa'-ne, a celebrated Italian composer, who was at first a chorister at St. Mark's, Venice, where he attracted the notice of a German nobleman, by the beauty of his voice. This patron provided him with the means of obtaining a learned and musical education. He entered into holy orders, but chiefly devoted himself to musical composition. The duke of Brunswick, father of George I., offered him the posts of director of his chamber music, and of the opera, which Steffani accepted. He composed several operas, and a large number of madrigals, motets, duets, &c. Caroline, consort of George II., edited a hundred of his duets. He subsequently became bishop of Spiga, having, in 1708, resigned his posts under the elector of Hanover to Handel. B. about 1650; D. at Frankfort, 1729.

STEFFENS, Henry, stef'-fens, an eminent philosopher, who studied at the university of Copenhagen, where he so highly distinguished himself as to gain, in 1794, a travelling prize. In 1796 he was engaged as a lecturer upon natural history, and also as private tutor at Hamburg; in 1800 he was appointed to make a revision of Schelling's works upon natural philosophy: at a later period he was appointed assistant to the professor of philosophy in the university of Jena. After spending a short time in Denmark, he, in 1804, became professor in the university at Halle. In 1809 he joined the Prussian volunteers, with whom he fought till they entered Paris in 1813. Afterwards he held the professorship of physics and natural history at Breslau, and from the year 1831 until his death, at the university of Berlin. The most important works of this learned writer were,—his Autobiography; "On the False Theology and the True Faith;" "Polemical Leaves for the Advancement of Speculative Physics;" some novels; and the "Fundamental Features of Philosophical Natural Science." B. at Stavanger, Norway, 1773; D. at Berlin, 1845.

STEIBELT, Daniel, sti'-belt, an eminent German composer, who having been fortunate enough to attract the notice of William III. of Prussia, was educated at the charge of that king. He resided for a long time in London, where he produced a large number of compositions for the pianoforte, upon which instrument he was a most brilliant performer. In Paris he was the first to introduce Haydn's "Creation." He subsequently became chapel-master to the emperor of Russia; and while a resident at St. Petersburg, he produced there several operas. B. at Berlin, 1775; D. at St. Petersburg, 1823.

STEIN, stine, a town of Switzerland, 13 miles from Constance. Pop. 1,800.

STEIN, Henry Frederick Charles, Baron von, a celebrated Prussian statesman, who commenced his public life in 1779 as director of mines. After fulfilling the duties of various official appointments during the lifetime of Frederick the Great, he, in 1786, paid a visit to England, where he made a profound study of the constitution of Great Britain. Under Frederick-William III. he was the prime mover of those measures by which Prussia, although shorn of more than half her territory, was enabled to re-establish herself as a great kingdom, and afterwards to contribute to the downfall of Napoleon I. He introduced into Prussia a municipal system, trained the youth of the kingdom in the use of arms, reorganized the army—in short, he introduced a complete change of system throughout the whole Prussian government, whether of politics or of administration. Napoleon having learned what "one Stein" was doing, obliged him, in 1808, to relinquish his post, and to take refuge first in Austria, and afterwards in Russia, where he became counsellor to Alexander I. After the fall of Napoleon, Stein, finding his views too liberal for Prussia, retired into private life. B. at Nassau, 1757; D. 1831.

STEINACH, sti'-nak, the name of two small rivers of the west of Germany.

STEINACH, the name of two towns in Germany, neither with a population above 2,400.

STEIN-AM-ANGER, a town of Lower Austria, 38 miles from Vienna. Manf. Vinegar and mustard. Pop. 2,000.

STEINAU, sti'-now, a town of Prussian Silesia, near the Oder, 34 miles from Breslau. Pop. 3,000.—Another in Hesse-Cassel, 28 miles from Hanau. Pop. 3,000.

STEINBACH, stine'-bak, the name of several towns in Germany, none of them with a population above 3,000.

STEINHEIM, stine'-hime, the name of several towns in Germany, none of them with a population above 2,200.

STEKENE, stek'-en, a market-town of Belgium, 18 miles from Ghent. Pop. 5,000.

STELVIO PASS, stel'-ve-o, leads from Glurns to Bormio, in the Tyrol. Height, 9,100 feet above the level of the sea. It is the loftiest carriage-route in Europe, and was opened in 1824.

STENDAL, sten'-dal, a town of Prussia, on the Uchte, 62 miles from Berlin. Manf. Woollen and leather. Pop. 8,300.

STENO, Nicholas, stai'-no, an eminent Danish anatomist, who became principal physician to Ferdinand II., grand-duke of Tuscany. He was also appointed tutor to the young Prince Cosmo, and, embracing the ecclesiastical state, was made a bishop by the pope, who sent him, with the title of vicar-apostolic, to Germany. His most important works were—"Discourse on the Anatomy of the Brain," and a treatise on the "Muscles and Glands." B. at Copenhagen, 1638; D. at Schwerin, Mecklenburg, 1686.

STENTOR, sten'-tor, one of the Grecian warriors who went to the siege of Troy. He was celebrated for the power of his voice, which was said to be as loud as that of fifty men combined.

STEPHEN, St., ste'-fen, the first martyr of Christianity, was one of the seventy deacons, and had been the disciple of Gamaliel. He was stoned to death by the Jews, on a pretended charge of blasphemy, in 33.

STEPHEN OF BYZANTIUM, a Greek grammarian and lexicographer, who wrote a geographical dictionary, probably the first ever produced, of which there remains an abridgment, made by Hermolaus, in the reign of Justinian. Flourished, probably, in the 6th century.

STEPHEN, King of England. He was the third son of Stephen, earl of Blois, by Adela, daughter of William the Conqueror, and was crowned at Westminster in 1135. Matilda, daughter of Henry I., and wife of Henry IV., emperor of Germany, was the legitimate heir to the throne; but Stephen, taking advantage of her absence, obtained possession of it. In 1139 Matilda landed in England, and in 1141 took Stephen prisoner at the battle of Lincoln; but he was exchanged the same year for Robert, earl of Gloucester, illegitimate brother to the empress. Matilda, after many unsuccessful engagements, quitted the kingdom in 1147, and, two years subsequently, her son Henry, by Geoffrey Plantagenet, earl of Anjou, claimed the crown; but, in 1153, a peace was concluded between the rivals, by which it was settled that Stephen should enjoy the crown for life, and that Henry should be his successor. B. 1105; D. 1154.

STEPHEN I., St., king of Hungary, succeeded his father Geisa in 947. He reformed the manners of his subjects, enacted excellent laws, and introduced Christianity into his kingdom. D. 1038.

STEPHEN II., king of Hungary, succeeded his father Koloman in 1114. He invaded Poland and Austria, and marched into Russia, but was unsuccessful everywhere. He abdicated in 1131, and retired to a monastery, where he died in the same year.

STEPHEN III. was crowned king of Hungary in 1161, but was almost immediately deposed by the nobles. He regained the crown, however, in 1165, and reigned till 1173.

STEPHEN IV. ascended the throne in 1161, but was defeated by the preceding in 1163, soon after which he died at Semlin.

STEPHEN V. reigned two years, 1270-72.

STEPHEN I., Pope, ascended the pontifical chair after Lucius, in 253. He had a difference with St. Cyprian and Fermilian about rebaptizing repentant heretics, which practice this pope condemned. D. 257.

STEPHEN II. was a native of Rome, and elected pope in 752. Astolphus, king of the Lombards, having menaced the city of Rome, Stephen implored the aid of Constantine Copronymus, emperor of the East; but he, being engaged in a war, recommended his cause to Pepin, king of the Franks, who marched into Italy, and deprived Astolphus of the exarchate of Ravenna and several cities, which he gave to the pope; thus laying the foundation of the temporal sovereignty of the church of Rome. D. 757.

STEPHEN III. succeeded Paul I. in 768. Throughout his career he was at variance with the Lombards, and threatened to excommunicate Charles (afterwards Charlemagne) and Carloman, sons of Pepin, if they entered into an alliance with them, or intermarried with the daughters of the Lombard king. Charles, however, married Hermengarda, daughter of Desiderius, king of the Lombards, but put her away a year afterwards. He was succeeded by Adrian I. D. 772.

STEPHEN IV. succeeded Leo III. in 816, but died in the same year.

STEPHEN V. was elected in succession to Adrian III.

in 885. He was a learned pontiff, and greatly contributed to relieve the people of Rome from the effects of a terrible famine which had desolated the country shortly before his accession. D. 891.

STEPHEN VI. became pope in succession to Benedict VI. in 896. He caused the body of Pope Formosus to be disinterred and cast into an ordinary grave, on the plea that that pope had been excommunicated by John VII. anterior to his elevation to the tiara. In 897 the partisans of Formosus burst into an insurrection, and, having seized Stephen, strangled him.

STEPHEN VII. was the successor of Leo V., and was elevated to the papacy in 928. There are no reliable records of his pontificate. D. 930.

STEPHEN VIII. was the successor of Leo VIII. At the time of his election, 939, Rome was governed by Alberic, son of Marozia (see MAROZIA), who styled himself "prince and senator of all the Romans." The records of the papacy are extremely untrustworthy; but it is stated by one authority that Stephen VIII. was, during a revolt of the Roman populace, rendered a cripple for life. His successor was Martin III. Stephen D. 942.

STEPHEN IX. was elected to the papacy in succession to Victor II. in 1057. He had previously fulfilled the office of papal legate at the court of Constantinople. After his elevation, he dispatched legates to Milan, to enforce celibacy among the clergy of that church; the disputes upon which decree lasted during a quarter of a century. He summoned the learned Petrus Damianus from his monastery, and created him cardinal and bishop of Ostia. It is surmised from several passages in his letters, that he intended to crown his brother Godfrey, duke of Tuscany, king of Italy. According to one of the bulls issued by him, the clergy were exempted from the jurisdiction of lay courts, as also from the payment of tribute to laymen. He was a learned and energetic pontiff, but too ambitious of worldly influence. D. 1058.

STEPHEN, Right Hon. Sir James, a modern English lawyer, government official, and historian. He was educated for the legal profession, and soon after entering upon practice, was chosen as counsel of the Colonial department. Having retired from the bar, he became assistant under-secretary for the colonies. At a later period he was promoted to the permanent under-secretaryship of the same department; but after spending thirty-five years in the civil service, he, in 1847, retired from it. His distinguished services were rewarded with a knighthood. In 1849 he was chosen regius professor of modern history in the university of Cambridge. His contributions to English literature are highly esteemed; the most important of them being, "Essays in Ecclesiastical Biography," and "Lectures on the History of England." B. about 1790.

STEPHEN, Sir George, a modern English writer, and brother of the preceding. He is principally known by his work entitled "Adventures of a Gentleman in search of a Horse;" a novel called "The Jesuit at Cambridge;" and a pamphlet on "The Niger Trade, and the African Blockade." B. about 1800.

STEPHEN BATHORI, king of Poland, and the greatest monarch of that country. He was descended of a noble Hungarian family, and having, through the exercise of great talent and bravery, won the throne of Transylvania in 1571, he was, five years subsequently, elected king of Poland. He married the sister of Sigismund Augustus, and occupied the first years of his reign in improving the internal condition of the country. Having secured the alliance of the Turks, he resolved to turn his arms against the powerful Ivan Vasilovitch, of Muscovy, who had invaded Livonia. He next organized the Cossacks of the Ukraine, repaired and garrisoned the Polish frontier fortresses, called into his service some German and Hungarian troops, with whom, and a large force of Poles, he took the field. He defeated the Muscovites in several desperate engagements, and took the important town of Polotzk, which had been wrested from the Poles some time previously. Bathori's victorious career was arrested by the intrigues of the Jesuit Possevinus with Ivan, who, promising to acknowledge the supremacy of Pope Sixtus V., induced the Polish king to suspend hostilities; but, when Bathori discovered that Ivan did not intend to make this alteration with regard to the church of his country, hostilities were recommenced. This second campaign was, however, brought to a sudden termination by the death of Bathori. He was not only a successful soldier, but a wise and provident administrator, as was evinced by the great number of improvements which he introduced into the civil government of Poland. A liberal patron of learning, he founded the university of Wilna and the college of Polotzk. B. in Hungary, 1533; D. at Grodno, 1586.

STEPHENS, in French ETIENNE or ESTIENNE, in Latin STEPHANUS, the name of an illustrious family of learned printers. The most distinguished members of this family were,—

STEPHENS, Henry. He chiefly printed works on mathematical, medical, and philosophical subjects, but also produced a few editions of classical writers. His widow married Simon de Colines, the celebrated printer, who carried on the business till his death in 1547. Henry Stephens was B. at Paris, about 1470; D. about 1522.

STEPHENS, Robert, son of the preceding. He received a learned education, which included the Greek, Latin, and Hebrew languages, and conducted the business with Colines. In 1539 he was appointed printer to Francis I.; subsequently to whose death, in 1547, he retired to Geneva. He had given offence to the Sorbonne, by printing a Latin Bible with the notes of Calvin, and therefore did not deem himself safe in France. He was so exact in printing the works which issued from his press, as to expose the sheets for public examination, offering rewards for the detection of errors. His Hebrew Bible and Greek Testament are very scarce and valuable. Stephens compiled a great work, entitled "Thesaurus Linguæ Latinæ," and wrote an apology, in Latin, for his Bible, which had been censured by the Sorbonne. B. at Paris, 1503; D. at Geneva, 1559.

STEPHENS, Charles, brother of the preceding. He studied medicine, and took his doctor's degree in that faculty. He accompanied Lazarus Baiflus on his embassy from the court of France to Germany; but upon his return to Paris, and after his brother's removal to Geneva, he continued the family profession, and became printer to the king. During ten years he produced ninety-seven works, all of them beautiful specimens of typography. B. about 1504; D. 1564.

STEPHENS, Henry, the most distinguished of this learned family, was the son of Robert. He was accounted the best Grecian of his time, and he published beautiful and correct editions of the best Greek writers. He also compiled a Thesaurus of the Greek language, the printing of which almost ruined him, for its sale was very small, owing to Scapula, his assistant, having surreptitiously made an abridgement of it, which he published (see SCAPULA). Besides these works, he was the author of a version of Anacreon, in Latin verse; "Corrections of Cicero;" "Apology for Herodotus," &c. B. at Paris, 1528; D. at Lyons, 1598.

STEPHENS, Paul, son of the preceding, carried on the printing business at Geneva, and reprinted Virgil, Horace, and several other classical works. He disposed of his business in 1627. B. at Geneva, 1566.

STEPHENS, Anthony, son of the preceding, and the last printer of his family. He turned Roman Catholic, and went to Paris, where he became printer to the king; but managing his affairs ill, he was reduced to poverty, and died in an hospital at Paris, 1674.

STEPHENS, John, an English writer, who was a Roman Catholic, and a zealous adherent of the house of Stuart. James II. gave him a captain's commission. He published some works, the principal of which are, —"A Continuation of Dugdale's Monasticon," and "A Dictionary, English and Spanish." D. 1726.

STEPHENS, Robert, a learned English antiquary, who was a lawyer by profession. He published Lord Bacon's Letters, with curious notes, and other works. D. 1732.

STEPHENS, James Francis, an eminent English entomologist, who was at first a clerk in the Admiralty-office; but, having exhibited considerable knowledge of natural history, he was appointed to assist Dr. Leach at the British Museum. He produced,—"Illustrations of British Entomology;" "A Manual of the British Coleoptera;" and "Systematic Catalogue of British Insects." He was president of the Entomological, and Fellow of the Linnæan societies. B. at Shoreham, Sussex, 1792; D. in London, 1852.

STEPHEN'S, ST., the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 3,000.

STEPHENSON, a county in the United States, New York, 28 miles from Albany. Area, 536 square miles. Pop. 12,000.

STEPHENSON, George, ste'-fen-son, a distinguished English mechanician and the inventor of the locomotive. He was the son of a fireman at a colliery, and while still a child was employed to herd cows. Even at that early age his genius for mechanical invention was foreshadowed in the amusements which he sought; it being his habit to sit in a bog modelling clay engines and constructing miniature windmills. In his 14th year he was appointed assistant fireman to his father. In another year he rose to be fireman. Constantly taking advantage of every spare moment to increase his knowledge of the machinery used in a colliery, he made so much progress, that by the time he had attained his 17th year, he had risen to the post of plugman. He had now the engine under his charge; it being his duty to keep it in proper working condition. Resolved to master every detail of its construction, he would frequently take the engine to pieces, in order to become acquainted with the working of all its parts. He was in receipt of the, to him, large sum of twelve shillings per week, and he formed the resolution to acquire some education. At a night-school at Walbottle, he learnt to read and write, and in 1799 he paid fourpence per week to a Scotchman, at Newburn, to teach him arithmetic. In his 20th year he married, and was appointed brakesman to an engine used in lifting the ballast brought by the collier ships on their return voyage to Newcastle. At this time he added to his income by devoting his leisure to boot-mending, cutting out the pitmen's clothes, and clock-cleaning; but, with all this, he found time for his experiments in mechanics. In 1803 his son Robert was born; soon after which, his wife died. In 1804 he proceeded to Montrose, having been appointed to superintend one of Messrs. Boulton and Watt's engines there. He remained in Scotland about a year; upon which he returned to his former employment at Killingworth. In 1812 he was appointed engineer of the colliery, at a salary of £100 per annum. This, the first great step in his career, was the result of the assiduous application he had bestowed upon a mastery of the principles of mechanism, by which he had been enabled to suggest many improvements in machinery to his employers. The turning-point of his career was now at hand. The construction of a locomotive engine had long been a favourite problem with engineers connected with colliery labour. Several travelling engines had, indeed, been constructed, but they were, at best, only clumsy and inefficient pieces of machinery. To this great task Stephenson now bent his mind, and brought to bear upon his self-imposed undertaking all those stores of mechanical knowledge which, under the most disadvantageous circumstances, he had collected. He inspected all the locomotives within his reach, and, at length, informed one of his employers, Lord Ravensworth, that he could make a better engine for the colliery tramways than any yet seen. He was provided with the means of executing his design, and in less than a year he completed a travelling engine which drew along the colliery tramroad eight loaded carriages, weighing thirty tons, at a rate of four miles an hour. This successful trial took place in 1814. The engine was, nevertheless, but an imperfect and cumbrous affair, although no one saw its defects save George Stephenson himself. In the following year he constructed another engine, which was a vast improvement upon its predecessor. He next invented a safety-lamp, which, upon completion, proved to be in principle similar with that produced at the same period by Sir Humphrey Davy. A controversy was raised as to who was, in reality, the inventor; but, after a full review of all the facts, it would appear that both Sir Humphrey Davy and Stephenson had produced a lamp identical in principle, but totally independent of each other. Stephenson went on adding improvement after improvement to his travelling engine, and also bestowed great attention upon the tramroad, which he made of a more level and substantial character. His object had hitherto been merely to provide a good tramroad, with an efficient and economical substitute for horse-power, in the shape of a travelling engine to work upon it, for the conveyance of the coal from the pit's mouth to the Tyne-side. But the time was fast approaching when his improved tramroads and his travelling engine (soon to be named the Locomotive) were to play a still more important part. In 1820, Mr. Pease, of Darlington, obtained an act of parliament for the construction of a railway to be worked "with men and horses or otherwise." Meanwhile, Stephenson had converted the tramroad of the Hetton Colliery into a railway eight miles in extent. This fact recommended him to the notice of Mr. Pease, who caused him to be engaged as the engineer of the new undertaking, which, under the name of the Stockton and Darlington Railway, was finished in 1825. About the same time, Stephenson was engaged to make a survey for a proposed railway or tramroad between Manchester and Liverpool. In parliament the most absurd objections to the scheme were raised; and even when the act was passed, the persons employed in making the survey had literally to fight for permission to do so. Nothing less than genius of the highest order, combined with indomitable perseverance, could have triumphed over the difficulties which presented themselves to George Stephenson in the construction of the railway between Liverpool and Manchester. He had to make a firm bed for his locomotives and passenger-carriages through Chat-Moss, a spongy bog; he had to overcome the supineness of directors—to prevail upon them to at least make a trial of the locomotive before they decided upon employing horse-traction, as most of them were inclined to do. He had to invent the whole system of railway labour,—its signals, "navvies," rails, stations, and locomotives. The entire scheme was at first regarded as a subject only fit to be ridiculed, by some of the most eminent scientific men in England. Very few of the regularly-educated civil engineers had any faith in the project. In point of fact, this, the first railway of any importance ever constructed, was a gigantic innovation, and none but a powerful and original-minded genius, such as the self-educated colliery fireman was, could have carried it to completion. In the progress of this work, George Stephenson availed himself of the valuable services of his son Robert, whom he had caused to be carefully and thoroughly educated as a civil engineer. Some years antecedent to the completion of the Manchester and Liverpool line of railway, he had, with great foresight, set up a factory for the construction of locomotives; and when the demand for those engines was created, it was found that from his establishment alone could anything like a perfect machine be obtained. The company had offered a prize of £500 for a locomotive engine to be used on the new line. By the specified time, several engines were put forward; but all broke down upon their first trial, except the "Rocket," which had been turned out from Stephenson's factory. It must, however, be admitted that the success of this locomotive was mainly owing to its "multitubular boiler," which had been suggested by Mr. Henry Booth, and manufactured under the personal superintendence of the younger Stephenson. On September 15th, 1830, the Liverpool and Manchester line was opened; and from that moment George Stephenson was acknowledged as one of the most distinguished men of his time. Lines of railway were projected throughout the kingdom, and Stephenson was appointed chief engineer of some of the most important. For a long time he enjoyed the monopoly of locomotive-making; and it was not until skilled workmen, trained in his factory, had been called away to form or superintend other establishments, that a good engine could be obtained in any other quarter. He was also engaged upon some foreign lines, principally in Belgium. He went to Spain to make the survey of a proposed line between Madrid and the Pyrenees; but the scheme was subsequently abandoned. In 1845 he relinquished nearly all his engagements with railway companies, and devoted his attention to the collieries and lime-works of which he had become the proprietor, his leisure being amused with his farm and gardens. It was in these occupations that the great English engineer spent the few years which were left to him after quitting that career of high-minded industry in which he won fame and fortune for himself, and conferred a lasting boon on mankind. B. at Wylam, Northumberland, 1781; D. 1848.

STEPHENSON, Robert, a distinguished English civil engineer, who was the son and only child of the preceding. From the outset his father was resolved to give him the best education it was in his power to pay for. Robert, in his 11th year, was sent to school at Newcastle; and, having very early evinced a predilection for mechanics and science generally, he joined the Newcastle Literary and Philosophical Institution; and when he came home for his Saturday half-holiday, he was always provided with a book from the library. Long afterwards, when the father had become an eminent engineer, he would proudly allude to the studies pursued by himself and his son, assisted by a volume upon a scientific subject, brought home by the latter. In 1818 his father was in a position to apprentice him to Mr. Nicholas Wood, as a coal-viewer. Under that gentleman, Robert obtained a complete knowledge of the machinery used in a colliery; in 1820 he repaired for a session to the university of Edinburgh, where he attended the lectures of Sir John Leslie and Professor Jamieson upon natural philosophy, geology, and mineralogy. During his stay there he gained a mathematical prize; and, after returning home, was apprenticed to his father, who had just commenced his locomotive factory at Newcastle. In consequence of his health having become frail, he, in 1824, went out to South America upon a commission to examine the gold and silver mines of that country. George Stephenson, on being appointed engineer to the Liverpool and Manchester Railway, recalled his son, who reached England at the close of 1827. He then became one of the chief assistants to his father, and, after rendering him material services, he, upon the completion of the Liverpool line, was engaged to form a branch of the same, near Warrington. He next made the survey for the Leicester and Swannington Railway, and afterwards of the London and Birmingham line, of which he was subsequently appointed engineer. Employment of the highest kind was now profusely offered to him, and he soon displayed a vastness and grandeur of conception in his designs which made him remarkable among his contemporaries. The High Level Bridge over the Tyne, at Newcastle; the Viaduct over the valley of the Tweed, at Berwick; the Britannia Bridge, over the Menai Strait; and the Victoria Bridge, over the St. Lawrence, at Montreal, are magnificent proofs of the boldness and originality of his genius for triumphing over material obstacles. He assisted his father in the laying-out of the lines in Belgium; constructed a railway between Alexandria and Cairo, and designed an immense bridge to cross the Nile. In 1847 he was elected member of parliament for Whitby, in Yorkshire, which place he represented during many years. The liberality of his disposition was evinced in several of his public acts. In 1855 he liquidated the liabilities, amounting to upwards of £3,000, of the Newcastle Literary and Philosophical Institution, in grateful remembrance of those early days when he was allowed to take home from its library a volume for himself and his father to peruse. He placed his magnificent yacht and its crew at the disposal of Mr. Piazzi Smyth, to enable that gentleman to carry out his proposed astronomical observations at the Peak of Teneriffe. He was a fellow of the Royal Society, president of the Institution of Civil Engineers, and a member of many learned and scientific bodies both English and continental. He was the author of two valuable works, entitled, respectively, "The Locomotive Steam-engine," and "The Atmospheric Railway System." As his father may be called the founder of the great school of English railway engineering, so may the son be termed its brightest ornament. B. at Willington, 1803; D. in London, 1859.

STEPNEY, step'-ne, a large and populous parish and suburb of London, included in the borough of the Tower Hamlets, 2¾ miles from St. Paul's Cathedral. It contains several churches, and is the head of a poor-law union. Pop. about 100,000.—It has a station on the London and Blackwall Railway.

STEPNEY, George, an English poet, who came of an ancient Pembrokeshire family, and was educated at Trinity College, Cambridge. On leaving the university, he found a patron in the earl of Dorset, who obtained for him several public employments. He was successively engaged as envoy to the elector of Brandenburg, the emperor of Germany, the elector of Saxony, and to the States-general. In 1697 he was appointed one of the commissioners of trade. He assisted Dryden in making the translation of Juvenal. Dr. Johnson declares that he "was a very licentious translator, and did not recompense the neglect of his author by treasures of his own." B. in London, 1663; D. at Chelsea, 1707.

STERLING, ster'-ling, the name of several townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 3,000.

STERLING, John, a modern English essayist, who was the son of Edward Sterling, a famous editor of the Times newspaper. After spending some time at the university of Glasgow, he was, in 1824, sent to Trinity College, Cambridge, where he had Dr., afterwards Archdeacon Hare, for his tutor, and became acquainted with a knot of brilliant young men, numbering, amongst others, Frederick Maurice, Richard Trench, Monckton Milnes, and Charles Buller. After leaving Cambridge, he purchased the Athenæum newspaper of its projector, Mr. Silk Buckingham; but, the speculation not proving successful, the print was disposed of to Mr. Dilke. In 1834 he entered upon holy orders, and became curate of Hurstmonceaux, in Sussex, under his friend Archdeacon Hare. The delicate state of his health compelled him to vacate this office in less than a year afterwards; and henceforth his life was spent in migrations between England and other countries enjoying a warmer climate. The peculiarly intellectual qualities of his character endeared him to a circle including the most distinguished literary men of his day; and, after his death, a very affectionate biography, of which he was the subject, was written by Mr. Carlyle. His most important contributions to literature were published in a collected form in 1848, under the title of "Essays and Tales." B. 1806; D. 1844.

STERLITAMAK, ster-li-ta-mak', a town of Russia, 72 miles from Ufa. Pop. 4,000.—In 1824 a shower of meteoric stones fell here.

STERNBERG, stern'-bairg, a town of Moravia, 10 miles from Olmutz. Manf. Woollen, linen, and canvas. Pop. 11,000.—The name of several other German towns, none of them with a population above 3,000.

STERNE, Laurence, stern, a distinguished English novelist, who received his education at Halifax, Yorkshire; whence he was sent to Jesus College, Cambridge, and, having taken his degrees, entered into orders. His uncle, Dr. Jacques Sterne, prebendary of Durham, procured him the living of Sutton, and, about 1741, a prebend in York Cathedral. He afterwards obtained the rectory of Stillington, in the same county. He published the two first volumes of "Tristram Shandy" at York in 1759. On the republication of these in London, the year following, Sterne, from obscurity, rose to the height of literary fame. During the subsequent twenty-eight years, he produced the conclusion of his first novel, a "Sentimental Journey in France," some sermons under the name of "Yorick," and "Letters." Twenty years after his death, Dr. Ferrier published a work, professing to point out the sources of Sterne's wit and humour; but, although he succeeds in proving that Sterne has borrowed greatly from Burton's "Anatomy of Melancholy," &c., it cannot be allowed that Sterne's beauties are drawn from unknown sources. As Sterne himself observed, "Every man's wit must come from every man's own soul, and no other body's." B. at Clonmel, Ireland, 1713; D. in London, 1768.

STERNHOLD, Thomas, stern'-hold, an English poet, who became successively groom of the robes to Henry VIII. and Edward VI. He produced a metrical version of fifty-one of David's Psalms: the remainder were done by Hopkins, Norton, and others. He also wrote "Certain Chapters of the Proverbs of Solomon drawn into Metre." The first complete version of the Psalms of Sternhold and Hopkins was published in 1562. B. in Hampshire, date unknown; D. 1549.

STESICHORUS, ste-sik'-o-rus, an ancient Greek poet. His name, according to Suidas, was originally Tysias, which he changed to Stesichorus, on account of his being the first who taught the chorus to dance to the lyre. He was a man of the first rank among his fellow-citizens, and was distinguished as a statesman. Fragments of his works were published by Kleine, at Berlin, 1828. He died at an advanced age, at Catania, in Sicily, probably in 560 B.C.

STETTIN, stet-tin', a fortified town of Prussia, the capital of Pomerania, on the Oder, about 60 miles from the Baltic, and 80 from Berlin. It has several gates and small squares, a castle, the government-house, arsenal, barracks, hospitals, exchange, theatre, and a public library. The government offices are in the castle. It has an academy, with which the town-school has been united since 1805. There are also several other seminaries. Manf. Woollens, linens, cotton, leather, soap, and tobacco; but, above all, ships' anchors, of which, as of ships and boats built here, there is an extensive export. It has a large annual fair, and, after Dantzic, is the principal port of the Prussian dominions. Pop. 50,000.—Stettin fell, in 1806, without resistance, into the hands of the French, but was retaken in 1813.—It is connected with Berlin by railway.

STETTIN-HAFF is an enlargement of the Oder, immediately N. of Stettin. Area, 200 square miles. It receives several rivers, and has communication with the Baltic by three outlets.

STEUART, Sir James, stu'-art, a Scotch writer upon political economy. He published, among other works, one in French, called "Vindication of Sir Isaac Newton's Chronology," and another on Political Economy. This last contains much valuable information, but is written in a perplexed and tedious style. It preceded the great work of Adam Smith by about nine years. B. at Edinburgh, 1712; D. 1780.

STEUBEN, stu'-ben, the name of two counties in the United States.—1. In New York. Area, 1,400 square miles. Pop. 65,000.—2. In Indiana. Area, 324 square miles. Pop. 6,300.

STEUBENVILLE, stu'-ben-vil, a regularly-built town of the United States, and capital of Jefferson county, Ohio, on the Ohio, 32 miles from Pittsburg. Manf. Woollen goods, cottons, and engines. It has, also, iron-foundries and steam-mills. Pop. 7,500.

STEVENS, George Alexander, ste'-vens, an English dramatic writer and performer. He composed a strange medley of humour and ribaldry, called a "Lecture on Heads," by which he realized above £10,000. After travelling over the three kingdoms and America, he disposed of his lectures to Lee Lewis. He wrote some farces, songs, and a novel called "Tom Fool." B. in London, about 1720; D. at Biggleswade, Bedfordshire, 1784.

STEVENSON, Robert, ste'-ven-son, an eminent Scottish engineer, who was placed as assistant with Mr. Thomas Smith, of Edinburgh, engineer to the Northern Light-house commissioners; in which appointment he succeeded his tutor in 1797. In 1807 he commenced the construction of the celebrated Bell-Rock lighthouse, off Arbroath, in Forfarshire. While upon a tour of inspection in 1814, he was accompanied by Sir Walter Scott, who obtained during the voyage materials for his poem, the "Lord of the Isles," and novel of the "Pirate." Besides erecting twenty-three lighthouses, he was engaged in designing many improvements in harbours, and in the construction of several bridges, chiefly in Scotland. B. at Glasgow, 1772; D. 1850.

STEVIN, Simon, stev'-in, an eminent Flemish mathematician, who became mathematician to Prince Maurice of Nassau, and civil engineer to the States. No particulars of his life are known. His most important works were—a "New System of Fortification," and a treatise upon fortifying places by means of sluices. Flourished in the 16th century.

STEWART, stu'-art, two counties of the United States. —1. In Georgia. Area, 633 square miles. Pop. 17,000. —2. In Tennessee. Area, 1,100 square miles. Pop. 10,000.

STEWART, Matthew, an eminent Scotch mathematician. He studied divinity at Glasgow, and afterwards mathematics at Edinburgh under Maclaurin, whom, in 1747, he succeeded in his professorship; on which occasion he published his "General Theorems." In 1761 appeared his tracts, physical and mathematical, in which he proposed to deduce a theory of the moon, and to determine the sun's distance from the earth. He was also the author of a treatise on the sun's distance, and other works chiefly mathematical. B. at Rothsay, Isle of Bute, 1717; D. 1785.

STEWART, Dugald, a distinguished Scotch metaphysician, and son of the preceding, who received his education at the High School of Edinburgh and the university of Glasgow. His great attainments as a speculator in metaphysical inquiry were evinced as early as his 19th year, when he produced an essay on "Dreaming." His mathematical attainments also were so great, that, on reaching his 21st year, he was selected to fulfil the functions of assistant mathematical professor to his father in the university of Edinburgh. After officiating for some time as the deputy of Dr. Ferguson, he was, in 1785, appointed to succeed that learned professor in the chair of moral philosophy. In this position his name became famous throughout Great Britain, and his classes were attended by the most brilliant and promising young men of the time. "Without derogation from his writings," says Sir James Mackintosh, "it may be said that his disciples were among his best works." In 1792 he produced the first volume of his "Elements of the Philosophy of the Human Mind;" and, in the succeeding year, his "Outlines of Moral Philosophy." During the nine or ten subsequent years, he put forth a "Life of Dr. Robertson;" a "Life of Dr. Reid;" lectures on Political Economy; and the "Life of Adam Smith." The first volume of his celebrated "Philosophical Essays" appeared in 1810. In this work, according to Sir James Mackintosh, he appeared to the greatest advantage as a metaphysician. The volume contained essays upon Locke, Berkeley, Influence of Locke on the Philosophy of France; Metaphysical theories of Hartley, Priestley, and Darwin; on Philosophical Speculations; on the Beautiful, Sublime, Taste, and Culture of Intellectual Habits. His last works were,—"View of the Active and Moral Powers," and the celebrated "General View of the Progress of Metaphysical, Ethical, and Political Science since the Revival of Letters," which appeared in 1815, as the "Preliminary Dissertation to the Supplement of the Encyclopædia Britannica." "This," says Sir J. Mackintosh, is "the most splendid of Mr. Stewart's works." "Few writers," he continues, "rise with more grace from a plain groundwork to the passages which require greater animation or embellishment. He gives to narrative, according to the precept of Bacon, the colour of the time, by a selection of happy expressions from original writers. Among the secret arts by which he diffuses elegance over his diction, may be remarked the skill which, by deepening or brightening a shade in a secondary term, by opening partial or preparatory glimpses of a thought to be afterwards unfolded, unobservedly heightens the import of a word, and gives it a new meaning, without offence against old use." It is true he was but the follower of Reid, the great Scotch metaphysician; but he cleared away the confusion and objectionable parts of that philosopher's doctrines. B. at Edinburgh, 1753; D. near the same city, 1828.

STEWART ISLANDS, a group in the Pacific Ocean.—Also an island of New Zealand, forming the county of New Leinster.

STEWARTOWN, stu'-art-town, a town of Scotland, in Ayrshire, 4 miles from Kilmarnock. Manf. Bonnets, tartans, carpets, worsted, and regimental caps. Pop. 3,300.

STEYER, stire, a neat town of Upper Austria, at the confluence of the rivers Steyer and Enns, 19 miles from Linz. Manf. Cottons and woollens, but chiefly iron goods, which are said to give employment to above 12,000 men in the town and neighbourhood. Pop. 10,500.

STIEGLITZ, Christian Louis, stē'-glitz, an eminent German writer upon architectural art. He was educated for and practised the profession of law, throughout his life, but devoted his leisure to the composition of learned treatises upon art, chiefly respecting architecture. His most important works were—"Encyclopædia of Civil Architecture;" "Ancient or Mediæval German Art;" a "Compendium of the History of Architecture from the Earliest Periods;" and an essay on medals and collections of coins. B. at Leipzig, 1756; D. 1836.

STIERNOE, steer'-ne(r), two islands of Norway, one at the entrance of the Skager-Rack, and the other in Finmark, between Altengaard and Hammerfest.

STIGAND, stig'-and, a Saxon prelate. He was a favourite with Edward the Confessor, who created him bishop of the East Angles. In 1052 he became archbishop of Canterbury. Subsequently, William the Conqueror refused to be crowned by him, and, finally, degraded him from his high offices and threw him into prison, where he is said to have been starved to death. His successor was Lanfranc.

STIGLIANO, steel-ye-a'-no, a town of Naples, in the province of Basilicata, 28 miles from Matera. Pop. 4,500.

STIGLMAYER, John Baptist, stigl'-mi-er, an eminent Bavarian sculptor, and director of the bronze-foundry of Munich. He was the son of a blacksmith, but in early life evinced so great an aptitude for design, that he found patrons, who had him regularly educated for the sculptor's art. At a subsequent period he directed his attention to metal-founding, and, after increasing his knowledge by sojourning at Naples and Berlin, he returned to Munich, and there undertook the casting of those celebrated bronze statues, after the models of Thorwaldsen, Schwanthaler, Rauch, and himself, which adorn the city of Munich and its environs. He was succeeded in the directorship of the royal foundry by Ferdinand Miller, his nephew. B. at Munich, 1791; D. 1844.

STILICHO, Flavius, stil'-i-ko, general and favourite of the emperor Theodosius, whose niece and adopted daughter he espoused. After discharging, among other high offices, that of ambassador, and master-general of all the forces of the Western empire, he, upon the death of Theodosius, in 395, became guardian of his son Honorius, who had been left the empire of the West, as his elder brother Arcadius had received that of the East. Stilicho appears to have aspired to the command of both the Eastern and Western armies; but in this design he was thwarted by Rufinus, tutor to Arcadius, who reigned at Constantinople. Stilicho, however, caused Rufinus to be slain, and afterwards married his daughter to Honorius. A general of the highest ability and bravery, he on several occasions prevented the empire from being devastated by Alaric and his barbarians. In 408 Honorius was induced to believe that Stilicho intended to depose him, and place his own son, Eucherius, upon the throne. Honorius accordingly ordered him to be put to death, which was done by Count Heraclian, at Ravenna, in the same year.

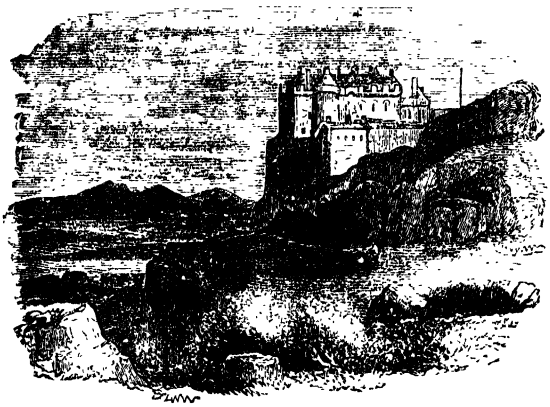
STILL, John, stil, an English prelate, who, in 1592, was elevated to the bishopric of Bath and Wells. "He was," says Fuller, "no less famous for a preacher than a disputant." He is stated to have written, while a young man, a play called "Gammer Gurton's Needle," one of the earliest comedies extant in the English language. The play is included in Dodsley's collection. B. 1543; D. 1607.

STILLING, Jung Johann Heinrich, stil'-ling, one of the most distinguished members of the sect of Pietists in Germany. He was brought up to the business of a tailor, but exchanged it for the duties of tutor in a gentleman's family. Having saved some money, he proceeded to the university of Strasburg, and there studied medicine. Becoming acquainted with Göthe, who conceived a warm feeling of friendship towards him, he, at that poet's suggestion, composed his interesting autobiography. After practising as a physician at Eberfeld during several years, he was nominated to a professorship at Lautern, and, in 1803, at Heidelberg. As a physician, he effected a large number of cures of diseases of the eye. "The great element of his character was an invincible and intense faith in God, and an immediate providence ever at hand in the time of trouble, and which momently preserves man from evil." He produced some remarkable works; the most important of which were,—"Scenes from the Kingdom of Spirits," "Theory of the Knowledge of Spirits," and "Method of Operating for Cataract." A complete edition of his writings was published at Leipzig in 1835. His autobiography has been translated into English. B. at Gründ, Westphalia, 1740; D. at Carlsruhe, 1817.

STILLINGFLEET, Edward, stil'-ling-fleet, a learned English prelate, who was educated at St. John's College, Cambridge, of which he was chosen fellow in 1653. In 1657 he was presented to the rectory of Sutton, by his friend Sir Roger Burgoyne, to whom he dedicated, in 1662, his great work, entitled "Origines Sacræ, or a Rational Account of the Grounds of Natural and Revealed Religion." In 1670 he was made canon-residentiary, and, in 1678, dean of St. Paul's. He wrote and preached with great ability against popery and the Nonconformists, during the reign of James II., and, in 1689, was made bishop of Worcester. He was a man of profound learning, a close and energetic writer, and an excellent divine. All his works were collected in 6 vols. in 1710. B. at Cranbourn, Dorset, 1635; D. in London, 1699.

STILLINGFLEET, Benjamin, an English naturalist and poet, and grandson of the preceding. After studying at Cambridge, he travelled upon the continent, and on his return to England, devoted himself to literature. He wrote, "The Calendar of Flora;" "Miscellaneous Travels;" "The Principles and Powers of Harmony;" poems in Dodsley's collection, &c. B. 1702; D. in London, 1771.

STILLWATER, stil'-waw-ter, a township of the United States, 20 miles from Albany. Pop. 3,000.—Here General Burgoyne was captured by the Americans in 1777.



STILLWATER, a river of the United States, in Ohio, which joins the Great Miami.

STILPO, stil'-po, a distinguished philosopher of the Megarian school. Ptolemy Soter invited him to his court, but Stilpo refused. When Megara, the native place of the philosopher, was taken by Demetrius Poliorcetes, the conqueror ordered the house of Stilpo, "the wisest of all living Greeks," to be spared. He taught that perfect wisdom consisted in the complete mastery of the passions. None of his writings have survived. Flourished about B.C. 300.

STILTON, stil'-ton, a parish of Huntingdonshire, 12 miles from the town of Huntingdon. It gives its name to a well-known cheese, now made principally in Leicestershire. Pop. 900.

STIRLING, stir'-ling, an ancient town, capital of Stirlingshire, and irregularly built on the sloping ridge of a rock, the precipitous end of which, towards the west, is occupied by the castle, 31 miles from Edinburgh. The street on the summit of the hill is broad and spacious, but the other streets are narrow and irregular. There are two churches, called, from their situations, the East and West kirks. The former is a very fine building, erected partly by Cardinal Beaton, and the one in which James VI. was crowned; the latter is a structure of much older date, and in a ruder style than the Gothic. There are several hospitals, the town-house, a gaol, a hall for the circuit and sheriff courts, and the Athenæum, with a spire 120 feet high, for a reading-room and a public library. There are also a grammar-school and other endowed schools, public libraries, reading-rooms, a mechanics' institute, corn exchange, and several ancient ecclesiastical buildings. Manf. Cotton and woollen goods are the principal; ropes, malt, leather, and soap. Dyeing is extensively carried on, and bricks, tiles, lime, timber, and coal are imported. Pop. of town, 9,400; of parliamentary borough, 13,000. Stirling is a place of great antiquity. The most ancient of the town's charters was granted by King Alexander I., and is dated at Kincardine, the 18th of August, in the 12th year of his reign (i.e. A.D. 1120). The castle is of great antiquity; but previous to the 9th century, there are no accounts of it. During the Danish invasion, in 1009, it was the place of rendezvous for the Scottish army. It was several times taken and retaken by the English and Scots; in the former of whose hands it was kept for ten years, until retaken by Robert Bruce after the battle of Bannockburn. It was for a short time in the possession of the English in 1333, and lastly taken by Monk in 1651. Prince Charles's army besieged it in 1746. Adjoining to the parliament-house is the chapel royal, erected by James VI. in 1594, for the baptism of his son, Prince Henry. Here is also the royal chapel, in which James himself was baptized with so much pomp by the unfortunate Mary. The castle is commanded by a governor, deputy-governor, fort-major, and three subalterns. It is one of the Scottish forts which, by the Articles of Union, are always to be kept in repair. The town communicates by railway with Edinburgh, Glasgow, and Perth, and with canal passage-boats to Glasgow.

STIRLING, Earl of. (See ALEXANDER, William.)

STIRLING, William, a modern Scotch author and politician, who produced a number of valuable works upon the art, history, and literature of Spain. He resided during some time in the Peninsula, in order to make researches upon these subjects. He published "Annals of the Artists of Spain;" "The Cloister Life of the Emperor Charles V.;" "Velasquez and his Works." In politics he was a moderate Conservative, and represented the county of Perth during many years. B. at Kenmure, near Glasgow, 1818.

STIRLING, James, an eminent English mathematician, who was educated at the university of Oxford, and became a fellow of the Royal Society. He produced some able expositions of the Newtonian philosophy. His most important works were,—"On the Figure of the Earth, and upon the Variations of the Force of Gravity at its Surface;" "Methodus Differentialis;" and a number of papers upon the higher mathematics, which were inserted in the Philosophical Transactions for 1735 and subsequently. Although highly esteemed by his contemporaries, scarcely anything is known respecting his life. D. towards the close of the 17th century; D. subsequently to 1764.

STIRLINGSHIRE, a county of Scotland, bounded N. by Perth and Clackmannan shires, E. by the Firth of Forth and Linlithgowshire, and S. and W. by the shires of Lanark and Dumbarton. Area. Estimated at about 500 square miles. Desc. Diversified with mountains, hills, and plains, and shaded with natural woods and plantations. An extensive plain stretches from the Water of Avon towards the north-west, and is terminated by the mountain of Ben-Lomond. It is intersected by the Forth, and includes the carses or valleys of Stirling and Falkirk, and produces the most luxuriant crops. The central and southern districts are partly mountainous and partly level and fertile. Rivers. The principal are, the Forth, the Carron, the Bannockburn, which falls into the Forth, the Enrick, the Blane, and the Kelvin. A navigable canal connecting the Firth of Forth with the Clyde, is partly in this county. Pro. Wheat, barley, beans, potatoes, oats, turnips, and clover. Large numbers of cattle are fed for the Falkirk cattle-fairs. Minerals. There are few districts in Scotland that abound more in minerals of various kinds than this county; and the abundance of coal in particular has given rise to many important branches of manufacture. There is also abundance of ironstone, freestone, and limestone; and more valuable minerals have been discovered, and in part wrought; as silver, copper, cobalt, and lead. Manf. Carpets, tartans, shalloons, blankets, serges, chemicals, and paper. There are also cotton-mills, foundries, dye-works, and distilleries. Pop. about 100,000. Stirlingshire is a noted scene of the most important historical events. In the early ages it was a subject of bloody contention between the Scots and Picts. Near Bannockburn was fought, in 1314, the famous battle between Robert Bruce and Edward II., a monument to commemorate which is about to be erected on a hill which overlooks the field. The castle of Stirling has frequently sustained the longest sieges recorded in the Scotch annals. Railways to Perth, Glasgow, and Edinburgh, intersect the E. portion of the county.

STOBÆUS, Joannes, sto-be'-us, a Greek author, who made a collection of extracts from ancient poets and philosophers, the best modern edition of which is that of Heeren, 1801. Flourished in the 5th century.

STOBBS, stobs, a village of Scotland, 10 miles from Edinburgh. It has the most extensive powder-mills in Scotland.

STOCKACH, stok'-ak, a walled town of Germany, 15 miles from Constance. Manf. Woollen goods. Pop. 2,000.—In 1799 the Austrians here defeated the French.

STOCKBRIDGE, stok'-bridj, the name of several townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 2,000.

STOCKHOLM, stok'-holme, the capital city of Sweden, at the junction of the Lake Maelar with an inlet of the Baltic, 320 miles from Copenhagen. Its form is an irregular oblong, extending from north to south, while the waters cross it in two channels from east to west. The situation is extremely picturesque. Nothing can surpass the view from the buildings on the higher grounds;—churches, spires, public edifices, are all in prospect, and intermingled with the vessels at anchor, or sailing along the capacious channels; while the view is terminated by mountains. The lake is finely diversified with islands, some bare and craggy, others adorned with trees, gardens, and villas. Stockholm is generally described as standing on seven islands, united by many bridges. The central island constituted the original city, and is still the most busy part of the town. It contains the palace and other public buildings; but, its houses being high and its streets narrow, its appearance is somewhat gloomy, and a stranger experiences a pleasant change on crossing the great bridge to the northward, taking in his view the shipping to the right and left, and entering soon after on the long streets of the Norrmalm. The southern division of the city contains few public buildings. Of the public edifices the principal is the royal palace, a large quadrangular structure, with a square or court in the middle, and containing a museum, a picture-gallery, and the royal library, in which a copy of every book printed in Sweden must be deposited. At a short distance from the palace stands a fine bronze statue of Gustavus III., raised on a pedestal of polished porphyry. The other public buildings are the house of assembling for the nobility during the sitting of the diet; the arsenal, containing a number of trophies of the brilliant days of the Swedish monarchy; the bank, the mint, the exchange, the town-hall, the royal stables, the great warehouse for iron, the hospitals, and philanthropic institutions. The churches are substantial, and, in some cases, elegant buildings; and in the one called the Riddarholm are the tombs of the kings of Sweden. Their spires are in general lofty. There are various literary societies; as the Academy of Sciences;

the Swedish Academy, for the improvement of the Swedish language; the Academy of Fine Arts, History, and Antiquities; a military academy, a patriotic and an agricultural society, an academy for painting and sculpture, and an academy of music. Here is also a medical college. Stockholm is the chief emporium of Sweden, and few harbours have greater depth or capacity. A thousand sail of shipping may lie in it in safety, and the largest of them may come close to the quays. Exp. The chief are the ponderous and bulky commodities of the North; viz., iron, steel, copper, pitch, tar, and timber. Imp. Colonial produce, wine, fruit, salt, and, in a limited degree, British manufactures. Manf. These comprise iron goods, glass, sugar, leather, cotton, hats, stockings, silk, watches, clocks, mathematical instruments, and articles of gold and silver. It has also a cannon-foundry and steam-engine factories. Pop. 95,000. Lat. 59° 20′ 6″ N. Lon. 18° 3′ 7″ E.—Stockholm appears to have been founded in the 13th century, and to have owed its gradual increase to the commercial advantages of its situation. In the 17th century it superseded Upsal as the Swedish capital.

STOCKHOLM, a township of the United States, New York, on the river St. Regis. Pop. 4,000.

STOCKHORN, stok'-horn, a mountain of Switzerland, 18 miles from Bern. It has two conical peaks, one of which attains an elevation of 7,211 feet above the level of the sea.

STOCKPORT, stok'-port, a market-town and borough of Cheshire, on the Mersey, on the border of Lancashire, 7 miles from Manchester. The ground on which the town is built is very uneven. The central part stands on the top of a hill, which has a very steep descent towards the river, and towards the north the hill becomes perpendicular for a height equal to that of the houses, a row of which encircles the base. An upper row of houses on the top of the rock completely encircles the market-place; and from this central part the town branches off in different directions. The principal public buildings are the places of religious worship, of which the parish church of St. Mary is the most ancient, and is a spacious structure, consisting of a nave, chancel, and side-aisles. The others are a town-hall, infirmary, theatre, news-room, grammar-school, and a railway viaduct. Manf. Principally cotton-weaving, silk and woollen-weaving, and machinery, brass and iron goods, brushes, and shuttles. The trade of the town is in general greatly promoted by a canal, which, by joining with the Duke of Bridgewater's Canal at Manchester, communicates with, and forms a branch of the extensive system of canal navigation in this part of the kingdom. Pop. about 35,000. It communicates with Manchester by railway.

STOCKTON, stok'-ton, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 600.

STOCKTON, two townships in the United States, neither with a population above 3,000.

STOCKTON-ON-TEES, a market-town and borough of Durham, on the Tees, 11 miles from Darlington. The principal street is remarkable for its width, and has, in the centre, the market-place. The public buildings are, a town-hall, a handsome column of the Doric order, where the market is held, the church, various chapels, a custom-house, theatre, mechanics' institute, several schools, and almshouses. Below the town, the river flows in a very circuitous course, and as it approaches the German Ocean, expands into a large bay, upwards of three miles wide. On the opposite side of the Tees is a race-course. Manf. Sail-cloth, damask, diaper, and huckaback linens; besides, there are breweries, rope-walks, a large dry dock, and ship-yards. Pop. 11,000. It communicates with Darlington by railway.

STODART, James, stod'-art, an eminent English cutler, who, by his experiments, contributed to the improvements in the manufacture of surgical instruments. He was the friend of Sir Humphrey Davy and other distinguished men of his time, and was one of the earliest patrons of Faraday, whom he employed in making analyses of a peculiar description of Indian steel, called by the natives of Bombay, "Wootz." His great skill in forging and manufacturing delicate pieces of philosophical apparatus in which steel was employed, enabled him to render material assistance to experimental philosophers. For the pendulum researches of Captain Kater, he forged some beautiful pieces of cutlery. He was elected a fellow of the Royal Society. In conjunction with Mr. Faraday, he produced a paper entitled, "Experiments on the Alloys of Steel, made with a view to its Improvement," which was inserted in the "Quarterly Journal of Science," in 1820. B. in London, 1760; D. at Edinburgh, 1823.

STODDART, a county of the United States, in Missouri. Area, 937 square miles. Pop. 4,400.

STODDART, Sir John, an English lawyer and political writer, who received his early education at the Salisbury grammar-school; whence he proceeded to Christ Church College, Oxford. In 1801 he became a member of the College of Advocates, and soon afterwards published a work, entitled, "Remarks on Local Scenery and Manners in Scotland during the years 1799—1800." Three years later, he received the appointment of king's advocate and admiralty advocate at Malta. After fulfilling the duties of this post during four years, he returned to England, and commenced practice in the courts of Doctors' Commons. In 1810 he became connected with the Times newspaper, of which he was appointed political editor two years afterwards. Taking Burke as his model, his contributions to that journal were remarkable for their denunciation of French revolutionary politics and of the emperor Napoleon. His violent and persistent attacks upon Napoleon, even after the latter had been sent to Saint Helena, led to his dismissal from the staff of the Times; upon which he set up an opposition journal, entitled "The New Times." This was a failure; and Stoddart shortly afterwards resumed his practice as an advocate. He was knighted and nominated chief-justice and judge of the Vice-admiralty court of Malta, in 1826, retaining the appointment until 1839. In that year he returned to England, and during the remainder of his life devoted himself to literary occupations. He, however, took a warm interest in the question of law reform, and was one of the first and most energetic members of the Law Amendment Society. He was the author of "An Introduction to General History;" "Universal Grammar, or Science of Language;" written for the "Encyclopædia Metropolitana," but afterwards reprinted as a separate work. He likewise compiled a "Statistical, Administrative, and Commercial Chart of the United Kingdom;" and in early life he produced translations of Schiller's dramas, "Fiesco" and "Don Carlos." B. in London, 1773; D. in the same city, 1856.

STODHART BAY is near the N. W. point of the island of Jamaica, to the east of Sandy Bay, and between it and Lucia harbour.

STORCKHARDT, Julius Adolf, ste(r)k'-hart, a modern German chemist, who commenced his studies under his father, a Protestant minister, but was subsequently placed at the university of Berlin. After travelling in England and France, he worked in the laboratory of Struve, at Dresden, and at the school of arts and sciences at Chemnitz, which latter place he quitted in 1847, on being appointed professor of chemistry in the Academy of Rural Economy at Tharand. His works upon agricultural chemistry place him beside Liebig. He has been very successful in placing the discoveries made in his favourite science in a popular manner before general readers. He was the author of "The School of Chemistry," "A Discourse upon Chemistry as it relates to the German Mode of Agriculture," and a treatise upon "Organic Chemistry." B. near Meissen, Saxony, 1809.

STOFFLER, John, stof'-fler, a German mathematician, who fulfilled the duties of professor at Tubingen, where he was greatly respected, for some years. He wrote several works on mathematics and astrology. B. at Justingen, in Suabia, 1452; D. 1531.

STOICI, STOICS, sto'-i-si, a celebrated sect of philosophers, founded about B.C. 300, by Zeno of Citium. They received their name from the portico (stoa) where the philosopher delivered his lectures. They preferred virtue to everything else, and whatever was opposed to it, they looked upon as the greatest of evils; maintained that man alone, in the present state of his existence, could attain perfection and felicity; encouraged suicide, and believed that the doctrine of future punishments and rewards was unnecessary to excite or intimidate their followers. (See ZENO.)

STOKE, stoke, the name of numerous parishes, townships, and hamlets of England, most of them with small populations.

STOKE-UPON-TRENT, a town, borough and parish of Staffordshire, 2 miles from Newcastle-under-Lyne. This place is the centre of the "Potteries;" has a church, town-hall, and extensive china and earthenware factories. Pop. of borough, comprising a portion of the parish, with Bursen, &c., 95,000.

STOKES, stokes, a county in the N.W. part of North Carolina, U.S. Area, 728 square miles. Pop. 19,000.

STOKES, George Gabriel, an eminent modern mathematician, who was educated at Pembroke College, Cambridge, in which university he succeeded to the Lucasian professorship of mathematics in 1849. In 1854 he was elected secretary of the Royal Society. He produced a number of valuable papers upon mathematical physics, chiefly contributed to the "Transactions of the Cambridge Philosophical Society." He also lectured upon physics, elementary and practical, at the School of Mining and Arts, in the Museum of Practical Geology. He made some highly important discoveries relative to the refrangibility of light. B. about 1818.

STOLATZ, sto'-latz, a town of European Turkey, 16 miles from Mostar. Pop. 1,300.

STOLBERG, stol'-bairg, a town of Prussia, in the province of the Lower Rhine, 7 miles from Aix-la-Chapelle. Pop. 3,000.—Also a town of Saxony, 11 miles from Chemnitz. Manf. Woollen fabrics. Pop. 3,000.—Another 50 miles from Merseburg, in the Harz Mountains. Manf. Paper, oil, and gunpowder. Pop. 3,000.

STOLBERG, Leopold Frederick, Count von, a Danish poet, who travelled in Italy and Switzerland with Göthe and Lavater, and, later in life, represented his native country as minister, at the courts of Russia and Prussia. His principal works were—translations of the "Iliad," of Ossian, and of Æschylus; an account of his travels in Italy, Switzerland, and Germany; and some religious treatises. B. at Bramstedt, Holstein, 1750; D. near Osnabrück, 1819.

STOLPE, stol'-pe, a walled town of Prussian Pomerania, on the Stolpe, 64 miles from Dantzic. Lat. 54° 27′ 59″ N. Lon. 16° 55′ 15″ E.—It has a castle. Manf. Woollen and linen fabrics. Pop. 11,000.

STONE, stone, a market-town and parish of Staffordshire, on the Trent, 7 miles from Stafford. It consists mostly of one long street, has a free school and a church, and is noted for its ancient religious foundations. Manf. Chiefly shoes. Pop. of parish, 9,000.—Also several parishes of England, none of them with a population above 1,000.

STONE, Nicholas, an eminent English sculptor, who was appointed master-mason to Charles I. He executed a number of monuments, the most considerable of which is one to Lucy, countess of Bedford, for which he received £1,020. He was employed as master-mason in building the Banqueting-house, Whitehall. The great gate and front of St. Mary's, Oxford, were also built by him. D. 1647.—His sons Nicholas and Henry were excellent statuaries. The latter was also a good painter, and copied some fine pictures after Vandyck. D. 1653.

STONE, Edmund, an eminent Scotch mathematician, who was the son of a gardener upon the estate of the duke of Argyle, and his education was of course confined within very narrow limits. His own application, however, supplied the deficiency; and at the age of 18, with no other assistance than a little received from the duke's butler, he made himself master of arithmetic, algebra, and geometry. He afterwards acquired the French and Latin languages. He published a "Mathematical Dictionary," a "Treatise on Fluxions," and some other works. B. towards the close of the 17th century; D. 1768.

STONE, Frank, an eminent modern English painter, who was the son of a Manchester cotton-spinner, and was designed for the same pursuit; but, after having followed a business career until his 24th year, he entered upon the artistic profession, in which he subsequently achieved a great success. In his 31st year he went to London, where, for about nine years, he practised water-colour painting. In 1840, however, he exhibited a fine oil-painting, entitled "The Legend of Montrose," which attracted a considerable amount of attention; but the greatest of his earliest successes was won in 1841, by a subject entitled "The Heart's Misgivings," since so well known as an engraving. His popularity increased yearly till, in 1851, he became an A.R.A. From that period he continued to exhibit regularly, and was accounted as one of the best draughtsmen, colorists, and characteristic artists of the English school. Some of his pictures, but not the best, have attained an extraordinary amount of popularity on being reproduced as engravings. Of these may be mentioned, "The First Appeal," "The Last Appeal," "Impending Mate," "Mated." His fame as an artist will, however, rest upon such productions as "The Master is Come," a Scriptural subject; "Bon Jour, Messieurs;" "The Gardener's Daughter," from Tennyson's poem, &c. B. at Manchester, 1800.

STONEHAVEN, or STONEHIVE, stone'-hai'-ven, a seaport-town of Scotland, in Kincardineshire, at the confluence of the Cowie and Carron, 14 miles from Aberdeen. It is composed of an old and new town, connected by a bridge across the Carron. The old town consists of two considerable streets of houses. The harbour is a natural basin, neither very capacious nor safe, but has been improved by the erection of piers. Manf. Cotton and linen goods; and there are both a brewery and a distillery. Pop. 3,300. About 2 miles from this place are the remains of Dunottar Castle.

STONEHENGE, stone'-henj', the name of the very remarkable ancient monument, supposed to have been a Druidical temple, in the county of Wilts, in the middle of Salisbury Plain, 3 miles from Amesbury. It consists of two circles of massive stones partly upright and partly prostrate. Near it are a raised terrace and an artificial flat surface termed a cursus.

STONEHOUSE, stone'-house, a market-town of Devonshire, between Devonport and Plymouth. Here are excellent barracks for the royal marine corps, the Royal William victualling-yard, several churches and chapels, naval hospital, union workhouse, and schools. Pop. 12,000.

STONHAM, ston'-ham, the name of several parishes o England, none of them with a population above 1,000.

STONHOUSE, Sir James, ston'-house, an English physician and divine. After practising medicine for about twenty years, he entered into orders, and obtained the lectureship of All Saints, Bristol, and two livings in Wiltshire. He had been for several years an infidel, and had even written a pamphlet against revealed religion, which reached three editions; but by reading Dr. Doddridge's "Rise and Progress of Religion," he was converted. He was a most exemplary divine and an eloquent preacher. He succeeded to the title of baronet in 1791. He wrote "Friendly Advice to a Patient," and several religious pamphlets. B. at Tubney, near Abingdon, Berks, 1716; D. at Bristol, 1795.

STONINGTON, ston'-ing-tun, a township of the United States, in New London county, Connecticut, 12 miles from New London. It has a good harbour and a maritime trade. Pop. 5,500.

STOR, stor, the name of several rivers in Scandinavia, none exceeding 550 miles in length.

STORACE, Stephen, stor'-ace, an eminent English musician and composer for the English theatre. He was the son of a Neapolitan musician long settled in England. During his short but brilliant career he produced—the music for the "Haunted Tower," "Siege of Belgrade," "No Song no Supper," as well as several pieces composed for the Italian opera, all of which exhibit an undoubted genius for music. His sister Anna was a celebrated vocalist. B. in London, 1763; D. in the same city, 1796.

STORCK, Abraham, stork, an eminent Dutch painter, who painted marine pieces and views of shipping in harbours, with great numbers of figures, in an excellent style. D. at Amsterdam, 1708.

STORNOWAY, storn'-o-wai, a town and parish of the Hebrides, Scotland, Ross-shire, at the head of Loch Stornoway, upon a point jutting into it. The harbour is excellent. The town is the largest in the Western Islands, and has a church, town-house, news-room, public library, and custom-house. Manf. Ropes, and it has a wool-carding factory, corn and malt mills, and a distillery. Pop. of parish, 8,300; of town, 2,500. Lat. 58° 11′ 28″ N. Lon. 6° 22′ 10″ W.

STORÖ, stor'-e(r), an island of Norway, 30 miles from Bergen. Ext. 15 miles long, with a breadth of 7. Pop. Unascertained.

STORY, Joseph, stor'-e, an eminent American judge and writer upon jurisprudence. He commenced practice in 1801, and soon became one of the most distinguished lawyers of the United States. In 1811 he was nominated associate judge of the Supreme Court, and at a subsequent period he accepted the Dana professorship of law at Harvard University. His legal works enjoy a European reputation, and are highly esteemed even in England, where the legal literature of other countries is less regarded than elsewhere. His principal works were—"Commentaries on the Conflicts of Laws;" "Commentaries on the Constitution of the United States;" treatises upon Equity Jurisprudence, the law of Bailments, of Bills of Exchange, of Promissory Notes, and of Partnership. D. at Marblehead, Massachusetts, U.S., 1779; D. at Cambridge, near Boston, 1845.

STOTHARD, Thomas, stot'-hard, an eminent English painter, who was apprenticed to the business of a pattern-designer for brocaded silks, which pursuit he relinquished on obtaining some success as a draughtsman for the "Town and Country Magazine." He was next employed to make designs for Bell's "British Poets" and the "Novelist's Magazine." In consequence of the reputation he acquired while engaged upon these works, his services were sought by almost every publisher of his time requiring for his productions the aid of an artist's pencil. Meanwhile he diligently pursued a course of study at the Royal Academy; and, after exhibiting some pictures, was, in 1785, elected an associate of that body. He became a full academician in 1794. He is stated to have made more than five thousand designs. His best book-illustrations were those in "Rogers's Poems;" "The Complete Angler;" and "Boydell's Shakspere." A very interesting biography of him was produced by Mrs. Bray in 1851. B. in London, 1755; D. in the same city, 1834.

STOTHARD, Charles Alfred, an eminent English antiquarian draughtsman, and son of the preceding. After studying during several years at the Royal Academy, he, in 1810, exhibited his first historical painting, entitled "The Death of Richard II. in Pomfret Castle." He subsequently turned his attention towards antiquities, and produced a most valuable work upon the monumental effigies of Great Britain. In this very successful undertaking, it was the draughtsman's object to provide historical painters with drawings of the costumes adopted in England from an early period down to the close of the reign of Henry VIII., the drawings being all made from the monuments contained in the English churches. In 1815 he was engaged to make drawings for Lyson's "Magna Britannia." In the following year he was sent to France by the Society of Antiquaries to copy the figures upon the Bayeux tapestry. While in France, he discovered the monuments of Henry II., Richard I., Berengaria his queen, an enamelled tablet of Geoffrey Plantagenet, and other relics connected with English history. In 1819, when laying before the Society of Antiquaries his drawings from the Bayeux tapestry, he read to that body a paper, in which he proved that the tapestry was in reality executed about the time of the Norman invasion, instead of in the time of Henry I., as was attempted to be shown by the Abbé de la Rue. In 1821, while making a tracing in a church in Devonshire, he unfortunately fell from a ladder and was killed on the spot. D. in London, 1786.

STOUR, stoor, the name of several rivers in England.—1. In Somerset, falling into the English Channel at Christ-Church, in Hampshire.—2. In Shropshire, and falling into the Severn at Stourport.—3. In Dorsetshire, running into the Avon.—4. In Oxfordshire, also running into the Avon.

STOUR, a river of England, rising on the borders of Cambridgeshire, and joining the Orwell from Ipswich. Their united streams form the noble harbour of Harwich, whence they discharge themselves into the German Ocean.

STOURBRIDGE, stoor'-bridj, a market-town of Worcestershire, on the Stour, and deriving its name from the bridge here over that river, 20 miles from Worcester. Its general appearance is handsome, though the streets are irregular. It has a theatre and a free school. Manf. Glass, earthenware, iron, cloth, and bricks. Pop. 8,500.

STOURPORT, stoor'-port, a market-town of Worcestershire, on the Stour, near its junction with the Severn, 4 miles from Kidderminster. It owes its existence to the formation of the Trent and Severn Canal, which terminates in a basin at Stourport. A very extensive trade is here carried on in coals from the Staffordshire and Worcestershire collieries. It has also a good market for hops, and apples in their season. Pop. 3,000.

STOURTON, or STOUR HEAD, stoor'-ton, a village of Wiltshire, near the source of the Stour. Pop. 658. Here, in 658, the Britons were defeated by the Anglo-Saxons, and in 1010 and 1025 the Danes also encountered the Saxons here.

STOW, sto, a parish of Scotland, in Mid-Lothian, on the Gala Water, 6 miles from Galashiels. Pop. 2,000.

STOW, the name of many parishes in England, none of them with a population above 1,300.

STOW, the name of several townships of the United States, none of them with a population above 2,000.

STOW, John, an eminent English antiquary and historian, who is supposed to have been brought up to the trade of a tailor, and to have followed it as a business, as his father and grandfather had done before him. It is conjectured that from an early age he devoted his leisure to the study of the national antiquities; but his own and other accounts vary much in this respect. In the dedication of his "Annals," dated 1600, he says, however, "It is now nigh forty years since I first addressed all my cares and cogitations to the study of histories and search of antiquities." According to Strype, Stow's historical works were—his "Chronicle," his "Summary of Chronicles," and his "Annals; or, a General Chronicle of England." His celebrated "Survey of London" was first published in 1598. Stow himself also states that he continued Holinshed's "Chronicles," from 1576 to 1586, and likewise corrected divers written copies from which the text of Chaucer was printed in 1569. In his old age he was reduced to beg his bread; James I. having granted him letters patent to collect "voluntary contributions and kind gratuities" for his subsistence. B. in London, 1525; D. in the same city, 1605.

STOWE, Mrs. Harriet Elizabeth Beecher, a modern American authoress, who was one of the twelve children of the Rev. Lyman Beecher, an eminent Presbyterian preacher of the United States. At an early age she assisted her sister Catherine Esther Beecher in teaching a school which had been opened by the latter at Hartford; but, upon the removal of her family to Cincinnati, in 1832, she became acquainted with, and married to, her father's colleague, the Rev. Professor Calvin E. Stowe, well known as a writer upon theological subjects, both in England and America. Her first efforts in literature took the shape of tales and essays, written for a charitable purpose, and inserted in the magazines and newspapers of her native country. Both her husband and father had long taken a warm interest in the "peculiar institution" which forms the great question of the American republic, and both had enrolled themselves among the most energetic members of the Abolition Convention. Their hearty denunciations of slavery proved so distasteful to the people of Cincinnati, that both the reverend gentlemen were at length compelled to resign their appointments there. In 1850 Professor Stowe accepted the chair of Biblical Literature in the Theological College of Andover, Massachusetts; and it was while a resident there that Mrs. Stowe wrote her famous tale of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," which at first appeared in the "Washington National Era." Upon its republication it attained a circulation of 200,000 copies in the United States; and this great success was but the forerunner of a still more extraordinary one, obtained in England and elsewhere. The work was translated into every language, and literally went the round of the globe. Its statements naturally evoked much hostile criticism in the United States, and in answer to her opponents Mrs. Stowe published, in 1853, a "Key to Uncle Tom's Cabin," in which she gave many facts and documents as the basis of her representations. Accompanied by her husband and brother, she visited England in 1853, and, after a sojourn in several places in Great Britain, as well as upon the continent, she, after her return to her native country, produced her travelling impressions, in a work entitled "Sunny Memories of Foreign Lands." In 1856 she published "Dred, a Tale of the Great Dismal Swamp;" in 1859 a work upon the social condition of the United States, entitled "The Minister's Wooing;" and at the time this article was written she was contributing a tale to the pages of the "Cornhill Magazine," under the title of "Agnes of Sorrento." In addition to the works already quoted, she wrote—the "Mayflower; or, Sketches of Scenes and Characters among the Descendants of the Pilgrims;" "Temperance Tales;" the "Coral Ring;" and a number of smaller effusions. B. at Lichfield, Connecticut, 1814.

STOWELL, William Scott, Lord, sto'-el, an eminent English lawyer, who was the elder brother of Lord-chancellor Eldon. He pursued a distinguished career at the university of Oxford, after which he entered himself of the Middle Temple as a student of the law. In 1780 he was called to the bar, and was admitted of the Faculty of Advocates at Doctors' Commons. A couple of years previously, he had made the acquaintance of Dr. Johnson, who caused him to be admitted as a member of the celebrated Literary Club. His great learning and eminently social qualities soon enabled him to distinguish himself in that branch of the legal profession which he had chosen. He became, in rapid succession, registrar of the Court of Faculties, judge of the Consistory Court, vicar-general to the archbishop of Canterbury, and, in 1798, he was appointed judge of the High Court of Admiralty. In 1801 he was chosen as the parliamentary representative of the university of Oxford, and held his seat in the House of Commons until 1821, at which period he was created Baron Stowell, of Stowell Park. In ecclesiastical law and the law of nations, he is the greatest English authority. His invaluable decisions as an ecclesiastical judge have been reported by Drs. Phillimore, Edwards, Haggard, &c. B. at Heworth, near Newcastle, 1745; D. in Berkshire, 1836.

STOWMARKET, sto-mar'-ket, a market-town of Suffolk, on the Orwell, 13 miles from Bury. It has a church with a square tower, surmounted by a steeple 120 feet high. Manf. Sacking, ropes, twine, and leather. It has a good market. Pop. 3,400. One great source of the prosperity of Stow-Market is the navigable canal from this place to Ipswich, which was opened in 1793. It has a station on the Eastern Union Railway.

STOW-ON-THE-WOLD, a market-town of Gloucestershire, 9 miles from Northleach. It has a church, an almshouse, and a free school. Manf. The principal is shoes. Pop. 2,300.

STRABANE, stra-bān', a town of Ireland, in Tyrone, 40 miles from Armagh. It is a place of considerable trade, and has a salmon fishery. Pop. 5,000. A station on the Derry and Enniskillen Railway.

STRABO, strai'-bo, a celebrated Greek geographer. He was educated under Xenarchus, the Peripatetic, and afterwards under Athenodorus, a Stoic. Of all his works, only his Geography is extant; and from passages in the work it is shown that he travelled in Egypt, Syria, Palestine, Greece, &c. In his Geography he stated that the habitable world was surrounded by water, and that in length it was about double its breadth. There is a cheap edition of the text of Strabo in Teubner's Leipzig Classics. Flourished about the close of the 1st century B.C.

STRADA, or STRADANUS, John, stra'-da, an eminent Flemish painter, who went, at an early age, to Italy, where he was employed by Cosmo I., duke of Florence. He afterwards visited Naples and other Italian cities; but he chiefly resided at Florence, where many of his fine works are still preserved. He excelled, not only in sacred subjects, but painted animals, battles, and hunting-parties admirably. B. 1536; D. about 1604.

STRADA, Famianus, an eminent Italian historian, who was a member of the society of Jesuits, in whose college at Rome he was, during fifteen years, professor of the belles-lettres. He wrote the "History of the Wars in the Low Countries," in Latin, which is remarkable for its purity. B. at Rome, 1572; D. 1649.

STRADBALLY, străd-băl'-le, the name of several parishes and market-towns in Ireland, none of them with a population above 3,500.

STRADELLA, Alexander, stra-dail'-la, an eminent Italian composer, who was remarkable for his finely-proportioned frame, polished manners, and exquisite voice. Whilst at Venice he was engaged by a nobleman to teach music to his mistress, a highly-born lady. The lady conceived a fresh passion for the musician, with whom she fled to Rome, where the pair were married. The Venetian noble hired two bravos to assassinate Stradella and his newly-wedded bride; but, as the assassins were about to strike the blow, they heard the musician sing, and were so overcome by the beauty of his voice, that they not only refrained from executing their murderous commission, but confessed to Stradella the plot in which they had been engaged. The implacable Venetian, however, found a pair of less susceptible murderers at a later period; and both Stradella and his wife were stabbed to death at Genoa by the agents of their enemy in 1670. His compositions are said to have formed the model of Purcell, Steffani, Pergolisi, and other celebrated musicians.

STRADIVARIUS, Antony, străd-i-vair'-i-us, a celebrated stringed-instrument maker, who was the pupil of Amati. He himself taught the eminent Joseph Guarcerius. The violins made by him are highly esteemed, and have obtained as high a price as £400 each. B. at Cremona, about 1670; D. at the same city, about 1728.

STRAFFORD, străf'-ford, a county in the E. part of New Hampshire, U.S. Area, 408 square miles. Pop. 30,000.—Also the name of several townships, none of them with a population above 2,000.

STRAFFORD, Thomas Wentworth, Earl of, an English statesman, who was at first one of the principal leaders of the popular party in the House of Commons against the unconstitutional measures of Charles I.; but was gained over to the court, made a peer, and appointed president of the North and lord-lieutenant of Ireland. Strafford displayed some talents for government in Ireland, where he encouraged agriculture, and laboured with zeal to promote the Protestant interest. Whilst Charles governed without a parliament, Strafford was his willing instrument in illegally imposing taxes upon the kingdom. In 1640 he was appointed to the command of the army against the Scotch; and he endeavoured to persuade the king to act with vigour; but his advice was overruled. At the opening of the Long Parliament, his enemies in the Commons, with Pym at their head, impeached him at the bar of the Lords, and he was ordered into custody. His trial lasted eighteen days, and was carried on with unusual virulence. His defence made a deep impression upon the hearers, though it did not abate the energy of his persecutors, who introduced a bill of attainder against him. The bill was passed in both houses of parliament, and Charles I. was weak enough to give his assent to it. The king afterwards made some slight and fruitless attempts to save the life of the minister who had been his too zealous tool in the despotic measures which he attempted against the liberties of his subjects. On the day of execution, Strafford went forth to the block with the manner of "a general marching at the head of an army to breathe victory, rather than those of a condemned man, to undergo the sentence of death." The attainder was reversed in the reign of Charles II., and the earldom restored to his son. B. in London, 1593; executed on Tower Hill, 1641.

STRAHAN, William, strawn, an eminent Scotch printer, who, in 1770, purchased a share of the patent office of king's printer, and subsequently sat in parliament. At his death he bequeathed £1,000 to the company of Stationers; the interest to be divided, in annuities of £5 each, amongst old and infirm printers. B. at Edinburgh, 1715; D. 1785.

STRAKONITZ, or STRECKONITZ, stra'-ko-nitz, a town of Austria, Bohemia, on the Wottawa, 28 miles from Klattau. Manf. Woollens. Pop. 3,300.

STRALSUND, stral'-soond, a strongly-fortified town of Prussia, Pomerania, long subject to Sweden, situate on the strait which separates the island of Rugen from the mainland, 85 miles from Stettin. Its harbour is capacious and safe. The aspect of the town is gloomy, the streets being narrow and indifferently paved. It has several churches, the government-house, the townhouse, mint, arsenal, and the governor's residence. Of public institutions, the chief are the academy, orphan-house, poorhouse, lunatic hospital, and public library. Manf. Woollens, linen, tobacco, soap, glass; there are also breweries and distilleries. Pop. 20,000. Stralsund was built about the year 1209, and became a member of the Hanseatic league. In 1628 it was besieged without success by Wallenstein, but taken in 1678, 1713, and 1807. Since 1815 it has been made one of the strongest towns belonging to Prussia.

STRANGE, Sir Robert, strainj, an eminent engraver, who was apprenticed to Mr. Cooper, of Edinburgh. He fought under the Pretender, and, after experiencing many privations subsequently to the battle of Culloden, he went to Edinburgh, and, at a later period, improved himself in France. In 1751 he went to London, where he applied himself to historical engraving, in which he arrived at great excellence. In 1760 he went to Italy, where he was chosen a member of the academies of Rome, Florence, and Bologna, and appointed professor of the Royal Academy at Parma; and at Paris he was made a member of the Royal Academy of Painting. In 1787 he received the honour of knighthood. B. at Pomona, one of the Orkney Isles, 1721; D. 1792.

STRANGFORD, străng'-ford, a decayed town of Ireland, in the county of Down, 6 miles from Downpatrick. Pop. 700.—The LOUGH of the same name is a large inlet of the sea, between Belfast Lough and Dundrum Bay. It is studded with numerous islets, and is shallow.

STRANRAER, străn'-rar, a royal burgh of Scotland, in Wigtonshire, at the head of the bay of Loch Ryan, 6 miles from Port Patrick. The greater part of the houses are old, and the streets are very irregularly laid out. The principal public edifices are several churches and chapels, a town-hall, and gaol. It has a mechanics' institute, a public reading-room, and subscription libraries. Manf. Weaving, and there are tanneries and nail-factories. The harbour is excellent. Pop. 6,000.—Steamers regularly ply to Glasgow from this place.

STRANTON, străn'-ton, a parish of the county of Durham, 9 miles from Stockton-on-Tees. Pop. 5,000.

STRASBURG, stras'-boorg, a strongly-fortified city of France, at the influx of the Brusche into the Ill, and only half a mile from the Rhine, over which is a wooden bridge, 72 miles from Basle. Its form approaches to the semicircular, and, being built in a plain, it is divided into several parts by canals, over which there are a number of bridges. The houses are lofty, but often heavy and inelegant. Of the streets, some are wide and straight, but the greater part are narrow. The fortifications are extensive. The citadel is a regular pentagon, composed of five bastions and as many half-moons, and with outworks extending almost to the Rhine. Of its public buildings, the principal is the cathedral or minster, founded in 504; and the choir, built by Charlemagne, is justly classed among the most distinguished specimens of Gothic architecture that exist. Its tower, of 466 feet in height, is a masterpiece of architecture, being built of hewn stone, cut with such nicety as to give it at a distance some resemblance to lace, and combining the most elegant symmetry of parts with the most perfect solidity. The clock is no less a masterpiece of mechanism, being of an astronomical character. Besides the cathedral, there are a town-hall, an episcopal mansion, a theatre, several hospitals, tribunal of commerce, public library, prefecture, academy, custom-house, an artillery school, a cannon-foundry, an arsenal, a telegraph-station, and a monument to General Desaix. It is a bishop's see, and the seat of a chamber of commerce. Manf. Flax, hemp, wine, spirituous liquors, linen, sailcloth, blankets, carpets, hardware, leather, cotton, lace, snuff, jewellery, buttons, cutlery, clocks, chemicals, mathematical, musical, and other instruments. It has also copper and iron-forges, soap-factories, and there is a large bookselling trade. Pop. 76,000.—Strasburg is a place of great antiquity, having existed prior to the Christian era. Its vicinity has been more than once the scene of military operations in the present age. It is the birthplace of General Kleber, Marshal Kellermann, and of Pierre Schoeffer, who is said to have been one of the inventors of printing. By means of railways and canals, it is connected with the great rivers of France and the Danube, and has thereby its commerce greatly extended.

STRASBURG, the name of several towns of Germany, none of them with a population above 5,000.

STRASBURG, a post township in Pennsylvania, U.S., 58 miles from Philadelphia. Pop. 5,000.

STRASZNITZ, stras'-nitz, a town of Austria, Moravia, 12 miles from Hradisch. It has a castle. Pop. 5,000.

STRATFORD, străt'-ford, the name of several townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 2,300.

STRATFORD-LE-BOW, le-bo, a town of Middlesex, on the Lea, 3 miles from London. Pop. 5,000.

STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE, Stratford Canning, Viscount, de red'-klif, a modern English diplomatist, who, after leaving the university of Cambridge, was, in 1807, appointed to a subordinate post in the Foreign Office. In 1808 he was named secretary to Sir Robert Adair, who had been sent upon a special mission to Constantinople. He was appointed secretary of legation in 1809, and, upon the recall of his chief, he became minister plenipotentiary to the Porte. In 1814 he returned to England, and was dispatched to Switzerland upon a diplomatic mission. After being sworn a member of the privy council, he was, in 1820, appointed envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the United States. Three years subsequently, he recrossed the Atlantic, and was sent upon a diplomatic mission to St. Petersburg, and next to the court of the emperor of Austria. He resumed his post at Constantinople in 1825, and nobly exerted himself in behalf of the Greeks. For his services he was, in 1829, created a civil knight grand cross of the Bath. About the same time he took his seat in the House of Commons as the representative of the borough of Old Sarum, and afterwards sat for the now extinct borough of Stockbridge, Hants. Returning to the Ottoman Porte in 1831, he was enabled to settle the future boundaries of the Greek kingdom. Upon this settlement, Prince Otho of Bavaria ascended the throne of Greece. He was next dispatched upon a mission to the court of Madrid, and, in 1834, he again took his seat in parliament as member for King's Lynn, in Norfolk. After twice refusing the governor-generalship of Canada, he, at the close of the year 1841, returned to his old post at Constantinople, retaining it until 1858. In the year 1852 he was raised to the peerage with the title of Viscount Stratford de Redcliffe, a title chosen by himself, on account of his descent from William Canynge, the pious founder of the church of St. Mary Redcliffe, at Bristol. "The policy of Lord Stratford in Turkey," says an eminent authority, "has been manly and consistent. Considering the integrity of the Ottoman power to be essential to the permanent relations of Europe, having learned also to respect that power, in regard of the strenuous efforts towards reform and regeneration which it has been recently making, with more or less success, he has given a firm support to the independent policy of the Porte, against the attacks and machinations of its avowed enemy, Russia. Shrewd to detect the crooked schemes of that government, he has met them, when discovered, with a bold and resolute front. . . . . Owing to his successful representations, the infliction of torture was prohibited in the Turkish dominions;—to him is due the abolition of the penalty of death, formerly inflicted on renegades, that is, Christians who, having embraced the Mahomedan belief, reverted to Christianity; he likewise procured, in 1845, a firman for the establishment of the first Protestant chapel in the British consulate at Jerusalem; and, in 1855, another firman establishing the religious and political freedom of all descriptions of Protestants throughout the Turkish empire. . . . . In 1845, when Mr. Layard could not find a government or scientific body, or public, to second his aspirations for the discovery of ancient Nineveh, Lord Stratford authorized and enabled him, at his own risk and expense, to proceed upon his researches." Subsequently to his return from Constantinople, he frequently spoke in the House of Lords upon questions of Eastern policy. B. in London, 1788.

STRATFORD, FENNY, fen'-ne, a market-town of Buckinghamshire, 1 mile from Bletchley. Manf. Lace. Pop. 1,200.—It has a station on the Bedford branch of the London and North-Western Railway.

STRATFORD LANGTHORNE, lang'-thorn, a town of Essex, on the Lea, 4 miles from London. Manf. Chemicals; and there are distilleries and printing-works. Pop. 11,000.—It is intersected by the Eastern Counties Railway and its branches.—Also the name of several other towns, with small populations.

STRATFORD, STONEY, a market-town of Buckinghamshire, on the Ouse, over which is a stone bridge, 6 miles from Newport Pagnell. It is the ancient Lactodurum, and in 1742 suffered greatly by fire. Pop. 2,000, chiefly agricultural.

STRATFORD-UPON-AVON, a market-town of England, in Warwickshire, chiefly celebrated as the birthplace of Shakspere, 8 miles from Warwick. It is seated on the Avon, over which is a bridge of fourteen arches. The town consists of twelve principal streets. The public buildings are the church, the chapel of the Holy Cross, and the town-hall. The church is a spacious and venerable structure, containing numerous monuments and inscriptions. The most remarkable is the monument and bust of Shakspere. The chapel of the Holy Cross is a handsome structure. Attached to it is a hall for the brethren of the guild, an almshouse, and a free grammar-school. The town-hall, rebuilt in 1767, has portraits of Shakspere and Garrick. Stratford contains the house in which it is said Shakspere was born; but that in which he died was razed to the ground by the proprietor. It has an inconsiderable trade in corn and malt. Pop. 3,400.

STRATHAVEN, sträth'-hai-ven, a town of Scotland, in Lanarkshire, 16 miles from Glasgow. Manf. Cotton-weaving. Pop. 4,300.

STRATHBLANE, sträth'-blain, a village and parish of Scotland, Stirlingshire, 4 miles from Killearn. Pop. 1,200.

STRATHBOGIE, sträth'-bo-ge, a district of Scotland, in Aberdeenshire, comprising six parishes bordering on Banff. Area, 120 square miles. Pop. 11,000.

STRATHEARN, sträth'-hern, a district of Scotland, in Perthshire, of a rich and fertile soil, extending 35 miles from Loch Earn to the mouth of the Earn, in the Tay. It has a breadth of 6 or 8 miles.

STRATHFIELDSAYE, sträth'-feeld-sai, a parish of England, 7 miles from Basingstoke. Pop. 900.—In this parish is the estate presented by parliament to the late duke of Wellington and his family, for services in the peninsular war. It formerly belonged to the great earl of Chatham and William Pitt.

STRATHMIGLO, sträth'-mi-glo, a town and parish of Scotland, in Fifeshire, 12 miles from Perth. Pop. of parish, 2,600, mostly employed in weaving.

STRATHMORE, sträth'-mor, 'the great valley,' an extensive tract in Scotland, extending from Dumbartonshire to the county of Kincardine. It is bounded on the N. by the Grampians, and on the S. by the Lennox, Ochil, and Sidlaw hills.

STRATH-SWORDLE, sträth' sord'-del, an insular parish of Scotland, in Inverness-shire. It comprises a part of the island of Skye, with the islets of Scalpa, Pabba, and Longa. Pop. 3,500.—There is a cave in this parish, which, in 1746, afforded shelter to Prince Charles Stuart during his wanderings after his defeat at Culloden.

STRATICO, Simon, Count, strat'-te-ko, a learned Italian writer, who, as early as his 21st year, became professor of medicine in the university of Padua. He was one of the ambassadors sent, in 1761, by the senate of Venice to congratulate George III. upon his accession to the throne of England. Under the Italian republic, he was appointed professor of navigation at Pavia; and, when Napoleon created the kingdom of Italy, Stratico was appointed inspector-general of roads, rivers, and canals, and also nominated a knight of the Iron Crown. He was taken into favour on the return of the Austrians, and received the cross of the order of St. Leopold from the emperor. His most important works were,—"A Vocabulary of Maritime Terms," in which he gave the expressions in use among the Venetians and Genoese at the time of their naval power, and added thereto the terms in use in the English and French sea services; "Bibliographia Marina;" an excellent edition of the works of Vitruvius, the celebrated architect; and a treatise upon Hydraulics and Hydrostatics. He made a very valuable collection of models for shipbuilding, and works upon the maritime art, which, after his death, were placed in the Institute of Milan. B. 1730; D. at Milan, 1824.

STRATON OF LAMPSACUS, strai'-ton, a Greek Peripatetic philosopher, and the successor of Theophrastus. He passed a portion of his life in Egypt, and taught Ptolemy Philadelphus, for which he was liberally recompensed. He maintained that everything existed through the innate force of nature, which was constantly creating and dissolving. From making physical things his principal study, he received the surname of Physicus. Diogenes Laertius gives a list of his works, all of which are lost. Flourished about 280 B.C.

STRATONICE, strät'-o-ni'-se, a Grecian princess of great beauty, who was the daughter of Demetrius Poliorcetes, and married Seleucus Nicator, king of Syria. Antiochus Soter, her husband's son, became enamoured of her, and fell dangerously ill, so intense was his apparently hopeless passion. Erasistratus, the royal physician, having discovered the cause of his illness, informed his father that, unless he were united to the Grecian princess, he would lose his life. Upon this, Seleucus gave up Stratonice to his son.

STRATTON, strät'-ton, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 1,800.

STRAUBING, strow'-bing, a walled town of Lower Bavaria, on the Danube, 25 miles from Regensburg. It has several churches and charitable institutions, and a lively trade in corn and cattle. Pop. 10,000.

STRAUSBERG, strauss'-bairg, a town of Prussia, in the province of Brandenburg, 20 miles from Berlin. Manf. Cotton and woollen fabrics. Pop. 4,000.

STRAUSS, David Frederick, strauss, a modern German writer, who, in 1832, became assistant-teacher in the Theological Institute at Tubingen, and lecturer on philosophy in the university there. In 1835 he produced an extraordinary work, entitled "The Life of Jesus critically treated." "This work," says an eminent authority, "startled the world, as it contained an attempt to prove, with much misdirected acuteness and subtlety, that the whole of the evangelical history was a series of myths, founded, to a considerable extent, on the Old Testament prophecies of the Messiah, concocted in the first and second centuries of the Christian era, and, by degrees, adopted by the Christian community." He was dismissed from his appointments at Tubingen, and, in the following year, became a private tutor at Stuttgard. He replied to his critics, in 1837, in two "Friendly Addresses;" nevertheless, the feeling against him was so strong, that when, in 1839, he was appointed professor of divinity and church history at the university of Zurich, he was not only compelled instantly to resign, but the administration under which he had received the post was overthrown. He subsequently produced a biography of Schubart, the German poet, and "The Doctrine of the Christian Faith." B. at Ludwigsburg, Wurtemberg, 1808.

STREATHAM, stret'-ham, a village and parish of the county of Surrey, 7 miles from St. Paul's, London. It contains a church and a charity-school; and, in the neighbourhood, are numerous handsome villas and country seats. Near it is the seat of Mr. Thrale, the friend of Dr. Johnson. Pop. 7,000.

STRELEN, strai'-len, a town of Prussia, in Silesia, on the Ohlau, 22 miles from Breslau. It is inclosed by double walls. Manf. Cottons, woollens, and leather. Pop. 5,000.

STRELITZ, strel'-itz, a city of Germany, divided into Old and New Strelitz. (See NEW STRELITZ.)

STRETTON, stret'-ton, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 1,200.

STRICKLAND, Miss Agnes, strick'-land, a modern English historical writer, who commenced her literary labours at an early age. One of her first productions was a small volume of patriotic lyrics, a few of which were contributed by her sister, Susanna Strickland. Several collections of poems, most of them composed in imitation of Lord Byron and Sir Walter Scott, followed. "Tales and Stories from History," the "Pilgrims of Walsingham; or, Tales of the Middle Ages," and a number of similar productions, all of which were in prose, were her next ventures. In 1842 she took a higher flight, and gave to the public the "Letters of Mary Queen of Scots," published from the originals, with historical introductions and notes. In one of her first poetical pieces she had treated of the escape of Mary Beatrice, wife of James II., which "touching incident," she observed, "first suggested the idea that the lives of the queens of England would be found replete with scenes of more powerful interest than any work of fiction that could be offered to the world." Accordingly, in 1840, appeared the first volume of her "Lives of the Queens of England, from the Norman Conquest, now first published, from Official Records and other Authentic Documents, private as well as public." The work at once became popular, and the twelve volumes in which it is comprised have been several times reprinted. The "Lives of the Queens of Scotland, and English Princesses connected with the Regal Succession of Great Britain," in 6 volumes, were first put forth in 1850. In these works, historical knowledge is laid before the general reader in a very attractive guise; many fresh sources of information have been laid open; and, although the volumes do not of themselves convey all that is required by the student of history, they, nevertheless, form an agreeable and interesting assistant to his progress. B. at Reydon Hall, near Southwold, Suffolk, early in the present century.

STRICKLAND, Miss Catherine Parr, an English authoress, and sister of the preceding. She became the wife of Lieutenant Trail, of the 21st regiment, with whom she emigrated to Canada. She was the authoress of—"The Backwoods of America;" "The Canadian Crusoes, a tale of the Rice-Lake Plains;" and "Domestic Economy of British America."

STRICKLAND, Miss Susanna, a modern English authoress, and sister of the preceding. Having married Mr. Moodie, an officer of the British army, she accompanied him to Canada. She produced,—"Roughing it in the Bush, or, Life in Canada;" "Life in the Clearings, versus the Bush;" and two novels, entitled respectively, "Mark Hurdlestone" and "Flora Lindsay," first published in America, but afterwards reprinted in England.

STRICKLAND, Major, a modern English author, and brother of the preceding. He wrote—"Twenty-seven Years in Canada West, or, the Experiences of an Early Settler."

STRICKLAND, Hugh Edwin, an eminent English naturalist, who was at first a pupil of the celebrated Dr. Arnold, while the latter was residing at Laleham. He subsequently studied at the university of Oxford; after which he devoted himself to the science of geology, and wrote several valuable papers thereon, which were inserted in the Proceedings of the Geological Society. In 1835 he, accompanied by Mr. Hamilton, made a tour in Asia Minor, and, after his return, produced several papers upon the geology of the districts through which he had passed. These sketches are to be found in the Transactions of the Geological Society. Upon the resignation of the readership in geology at Oxford by Dr. Buckland, Mr. Strickland succeeded to the post, and retained it until his death. In 1848 he produced a work upon the Dodo, a bird which has become extinct within a comparatively recent period. Of the Royal Society he was one of the founders, and to his representations is due the publication, at the charge of that body, of Professor Agassiz's valuable "Bibliography of Zoology and Geology," three volumes of which Mr. Strickland himself completed; but before he had finished the fourth, his death took place. This unfortunate event occurred in consequence of his being run over by a train, while engaged in making notes upon the geology of a cutting on the Gainsborough and Retford Railway. He was the author of eighty-six publications upon natural science. B. at Righton, Yorkshire, 1811; killed 1853.

STRIEGAU, stre'-gou, a town of Prussian Silesia, 32 miles from Breslau. Manf. Woollen and linen goods. Pop. 5,400. In its neighbourhood the Austrians were defeated by the Prussians in 1745.

STROGONOFF, strog'-o-noff, an ancient Russian family, which has produced several distinguished men. Count Alexander Strogonoff was a liberal patron of the arts and sciences, and became president of the Academy of Fine Arts at St. Petersburg. He D. in 1811. His nephew, Count Paul Strogonoff, fought with great bravery against the Turks in Moldavia, in 1809, and subsequently, in 1813-14, against France. He was killed under the walls of Laon in the latter year. To this family belonged Count Gregory Strogonoff, who was successively Russian ambassador at the courts of Madrid, Stockholm, and Constantinople.

STROMBOLI, strom'-bo-le, the most northerly of the Lipari Islands, in the Mediterranean, off the N. coast of Sicily. Circumference. About 12 miles. It produces very good wine, and is noted for its volcanic eruptions. Its mountain has two summits, one of great height; but the crater is on its side. Pop. 1,200.

STROMNESS, strom-ness', a town of Scotland, at the S.W. end of the island of Pomona, on a bay of the same name, with a safe and commodious harbour, 12 miles from Kirkwall. Many vessels bound for the Greenland and Davis' Straits whale-fisheries put in here. Boat- and ship-building are carried on, and straw-plaiting. Pop. 2,100. Lat. 58° 51′ N. Lon. 3° 9′ W.

STRONTIAN, stron'-shan, a place of Scotland, in Argyleshire, in the parish of Ardnamurchan, 30 miles from Fort William. It is noted for its lead-mines. Pop. 1,000.—Here, in 1790, strontites, a newly-known earthy body, was discovered.

STROOD, or STROUD, strood, a parish of Kent, on the Medway, in which is the terminus of the Gravesend and Rochester Railway. Pop. 3,100.

STROPHIUS, stro'-fi-us, a king of Crisus, king of Phocis. He married a sister of Agamemnon, called Anaxibia, by whom he had Pylades, celebrated for his friendship with Orestes. After the murder of Agamemnon by Clytemnestra and Ægysthus, the king of Phocis educated, with the greatest care, his nephew, whom Electra had secretly removed from the dagger of his mother and Ægysthus. Orestes was enabled, by means of Strophius, to avenge the death of his father.

STROUD, stroud, a market-town of Gloucestershire, near the confluence of the river Frome and the Stroudwater, 9 miles from Gloucester. It is the seat of an extensive clothing trade, the waters of the Stroud and Slade being celebrated for their properties in the dyeing of cloth. Pop. 9,000.—It has a station on a branch of the Great Western Railway.

STROZZI, strot'-se, an ancient and distinguished Florentine family, mention of which in history is first made in the 14th century. The most celebrated members of the Strozzi family were,—Palla Strozzi, who was at first the colleague of Cosmo de' Medici, at the congress of Ferrara, in 1432, when a treaty of peace was signed between Florence and Venice on the one side, and the duke of Milan on the other. He subsequently joined the Albizzi against the Medici family. This league was successful at the outset; but, when the Medici regained their former influence at Florence, Palla retired to Padua, where he spent the remainder of his life in studious retirement. He translated the works of John Chrysostomus from the Greek into the Latin. D. at Padua, 1462.—Filippo Strozzi was a prominent actor in the events which took place at the fall of the Florentine republic. Possessed of great wealth, he was allied to the great Medici family, having espoused Clarice, daughter of Piero, and niece of Leo X. Two illegitimate members of the Medici family, Alessandro and Cardinal Ippolite, were at the time ruling in Florence; and against these unworthy scions of a great house, Filippo, instigated by his wife, excited a revolt in 1527. The movement was successful, and the two Medici were reduced to the condition of private citizens. In 1529, however, the emperor Charles V. gave his natural daughter Margaret in marriage to Alessandro, and resolved to create him duke of Florence. The citizens resisted this arrangement, and opposed an obstinate defence to the attacks made upon Florence by the papal and imperial troops. In this defence several of the Strozzi displayed great bravery; but, after the defeat of the citizens, Filippo became the partisan of Duke Alessandro, and helped him with his wealth, until, his daughter having been insulted by one of Alessandro's courtiers, he was drawn into a quarrel with the dissolute ruler of his country. He retired first to Rome and afterwards to Venice. Duke Alessandro was murdered in 1537; but Charles V. caused Cosmo, another member of the Medici, to be elected duke of Florence. The Florentine emigrant nobles now resolved to make a desperate attempt to sweep away this new ruler. At the head of 4,000 French and Italian mercenaries, Filippo and other leaders invaded Florentine territory, and made themselves masters of the castle of Montemurlo. They were, however, soon afterwards defeated by the troops of Cosmo and the Spanish soldiers of the emperor. Filippo was taken prisoner, and, after being kept in confinement during a year, and subjected to the torture, he was about to be delivered by his Spanish captors to the tender mercies of Cosmo, when, in 1538, he found means to cut his own throat with a sword. He was a learned and accomplished nobleman. He translated some apophthegms of Plutarch, and the treatise of Polybius, entitled "On the Mode of Forming Encampments." After his death, the emperor Charles V. confiscated all the funds which he had lodged in banking-houses in Italy, Germany, and Spain; nevertheless, he left to his children, principally in the banks of France, an income of 50,000 crowns.

STROZZI, Piero, was the son of the preceding, and was with him in the attempt made against Cosmo in 1537; but succeeded in effecting his escape to France, where he became the favourite of Henry II. and Catherine de' Medici, and was sent in command of an auxiliary French force to Sienna, then at war with Cosmo, duke of Florence. Being defeated, however, he retired to Rome, which he bravely held against the duke of Alva, who had been sent to attack it by Philip II. in 1556, until the arrival of the duke of Guise, with a French force, compelled the Spanish commander to withdraw to Naples. In 1558 he was with the duke of Guise when the English lost Calais. He was killed at Thionville in the same year. His son Filippo distinguished himself in the service of France, and was, in 1587, sent in command of the expedition to the Azores, to support Don Antonio, who claimed the crown of Portugal, against Philip II. of Spain. He was defeated by the Spanish admiral Santa-Cruz, and thrown into the sea.

STROZZI, Titus and Hercules, two Latin poets of Ferrara, were father and son, and belonged to a branch of the great Strozzi family. Their poems consist of elegies and other pieces. Titus died about 1502, at the age of 80. Hercules was killed by a rival in 1506.

STROZZI, Ciriaco, an Italian philosopher. He was successively professor of Greek and philosophy at Florence, Bologna, and Pisa. He added two books in Greek and Latin to Aristotle's treatise "De Republica." B. at Florence, 1504; D. 1563.

STRUENSEE, John Frederick, Count, stroo'-en-se, a German physician, who by his abilities and address gained the favour of the king of Denmark, and was ennobled and made minister of state. The young queen, Caroline Matilda, sister of George III., is believed to have fallen a victim to the insinuating arts of Struensee, who, acquiring at the same time an overpowering hold upon the weak and debased king, became the virtual ruler of Denmark, which, under his despotic and blundering system of government, sank into a state of the greatest destitution. At length the queen-mother formed a party against him. He was arrested with his friend Brandt, and beheaded at Copenhagen. The queen was confined in a prison till demanded by the English court; on which she was delivered up and removed to Zell, in Hanover, where she died in 1776. Struensee was B. at Halle, in Saxony, 1737; executed 1772.

STRUENSEE, Charles August Von, an eminent German writer, and brother of the preceding. He early distinguished himself by his acquirements in mathematics and philosophy; in 1756 he became lecturer at the university of Halle, and in the following year professor at the military academy of Leignitz At the instance of his brother, who had risen to great favour at the court of Denmark, he repaired to Copenhagen in 1769, and was created counsellor of justice, the duties of which office he fulfilled in an exemplary manner. After the execution of Count Struensee, he was allowed to retire from the kingdom. He was subsequently ennobled by Frederick II. of Prussia, and appointed a minister of state at Berlin. He was the author of, among other works, "Short Description of the Commerce of the Principal European States;" "Rudiments of Military Architecture;" and "Rudiments of Artillery." He also made a German translation of Pinto's "Essays upon Political Economy." B. at Halle, Saxony, 1735; D. at Berlin, 1804.

STRUTT, Joseph, strut, an eminent English antiquary, who was an apprentice of the unfortunate engraver Ryland (see RYLAND), and afterwards studied drawing in the Royal Academy. In 1771, however, he commenced his researches in English antiquities, and continued to labour in that path, with great distinction to himself, until his death. He compiled a "Dictionary of Engravers," and produced an "Historical Treatise on the Manners, Customs, Arms, Habits, &c. of the Inhabitants of England," and others upon the "Sports and Pastimes of the People of England," and the "Dress and Habits of the English People." As an engraver, he produced a set of illustrations to the "Pilgrim's Progress." B. at Springfield, Essex, 1742; D. in London, 1802.

STRUVE, George Adam, stroov, a learned German jurisconsult. He became professor of jurisprudence, president of the senate at Jena, and counsellor to the duke of Weimar. He produced a large number of profoundly learned works upon jurisprudence. B. at Magdeburg, 1619; D. 1692.

STRUVE, Burchard Gotthelf, son of the preceding. He settled at Jena, where he followed the profession of his father. His most important works comprise learned treatises upon the theory and antiquities of public and feudal law, and a History of Germany, in Latin. B. at Weimar, 1671; D. 1738.

STRYPE, Rev. John, stripe, an eminent English historian, who, upon the completion of his education at the university of Cambridge, entered into holy orders, and was appointed to a perpetual curacy in Essex, the duties of which office he fulfilled until within a few years of his death. His principal works are—"Ecclesiastical Memorials of England under Henry VIII., Edward VI., and Queen Mary;" "Memorials of Thomas Cranmer;" "Lives of Archbishops Parker and Whitgift;" an edition, with large additions, of Stow's "Survey of London;" and "Annals of the Reformation." B. in London, 1613; D. in the same city, 1734.

STUART, stu'-art, a royal house which gave sovereigns to Scotland and England. Its founder was Robert II. of Scotland, who was declared king in 1371. His descendants reigned in Scotland until 1603, when James VI. succeeding to the English throne, upon the death of Elizabeth, the crowns of the two kingdoms were united, and he ruled over both countries, as James I. of Great Britain. The last king of this line was James II., who, at the revolution of 1688, fled from England, and died in France. (See ROBERT II. III. of Scotland, JAMES I. II. III. IV. V. of Scotland, JAMES I., CHARLES I. II., JAMES II. of England, and CHARLES EDWARD, the Pretender.)

STUART, Arabella, or Arbella, usually styled the Lady Arabella, was the daughter of Charles Stuart, duke of Lennox, younger brother of Henry, Lord Darnley, husband of Mary, queen of Scots, and father of James I. Her mother was the daughter of Sir William Cavendish, of Chatsworth, Derbyshire, father of the first earl of Devonshire. As great-grandchild of Henry VIII.'s sister Margaret, she stood in the same relationship to Queen Elizabeth as did James Stuart of Scotland, afterwards James I. This affinity to the English throne was the cause of all her misfortunes. In 1603 it was alleged that a plot had been formed to place the crown upon her head, under the protection of Spain, for which Sir Walter Raleigh was tried. There is no proof that such a design was ever entertained, and certainly none that the Lady Arabella knew of it. James I. was strongly opposed to her marriage with any personage, royal, noble, or otherwise. In 1610, however, it was discovered that she was married to William Seymour, grandson of the earl of Hertford. Seymour was at once committed to the Tower, whence, after a confinement of a year, he effected his escape. The Lady Arabella also eluded the vigilance of her keepers, and fled towards France; but was taken in Calais roads, and imprisoned in the Tower, where, in 1615, she died, her sufferings having previously deprived her of reason.

STUART, Gilbert Charles, sometimes styled American Stuart, the best portrait-painter that America has produced. Born of Scotch parents, he crossed the Atlantic, and for some time resided at Edinburgh. In 1777 he became the pupil, in London, of his countryman Benjamin West, and, having made great progress, he set up in practice as a portrait-painter, with considerable success. He subsequently went to Paris, where he had many distinguished sitters. He retired to his native country in 1793, and while a resident at Philadelphia, painted a portrait of Washington, which is the best likeness extant of the patriot. B. at Narraganset, Rhode Island, 1755; D. at Boston, 1828.

STUART, James, a celebrated English architect, commonly called Athenian Stuart. His mother was left a widow in poor circumstances, with four children, of whom James was the eldest, who, when very young, maintained the rest of the family by painting fans. He subsequently proceeded to Italy, and, forming an intimacy with Mr. Revett, the architect, they went to Athens, where they made a number of drawings of the remains of ancient architecture. In 1762 the first volume appeared of "The Antiquities of Athens," to which two volumes more were added after the death of Stuart. He built the chapel at Greenwich Hospital, and some mansions in London. B. in London, 1713; D. 1804.

STUART, Gilbert, a Scotch historical writer, who received his education at the university of Edinburgh, where his father was professor. His first work of any importance was "A Dissertation concerning the Antiquity of the British Constitution," published in 1767, for which he was created LL.D. of the university of Edinburgh. He next published "A View of Society in Europe." Disappointed of the professorship of law at Edinburgh, he removed to London, and became a writer in the "Monthly Review." In 1774 he returned to Edinburgh, and began a magazine and review, which failed; after which he again repaired to London, where he engaged in literary avocations until a short period before his death. He produced, in addition to the works already quoted, "Observations concerning the Public Law and Constitutional History of Scotland;" "The History of the Reformation in Scotland;" "The History of Scotland from the Reformation to the Death of Queen Mary," whom he defends with ability against Dr. Robertson and others. B. at Edinburgh, either 1742 or 1746; D. 1786.

STUDLY, John, stud'-le, an English poet in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, who received his education first at Westminster school, and afterwards at Trinity College, Cambridge. He held a command under Prince Maurice. He translated into English several of the tragedies of Seneca. Killed at the siege of Breda, 1587.

STUHL-WEISSENBURG, stool-vise'-en-boorg, a town of Hungary, 16 miles from Lake Balaton. It has the Marienkirche, in which fourteen of the kings of Hungary were buried, a gymnasium, and a military academy. Manf. Flannel and leather. Pop. 15,000.

STUHM, stoom, a town of Prussia, 12 miles from Marienwerder, where Gustavus Adolphus defeated the Poles in 1630.

STUKELY, William, stuke'-le, a learned English antiquary. After taking his doctor's degree, he settled at Boston, in Lincolnshire, whence he removed to London, and was chosen member of the Royal Society, and also of the Society of Antiquaries on its revival. In 1730 he entered into orders, and in 1747 was presented to the rectory of St. George, Queen Square, London. His principal works are, "Itinerarium Curiosum; or, an Account of the Antiquities and Curiosities in Great Britain;" "An Account of Stonehenge and Abury;" "Palæographia Sacra; or, Discourses on the Monuments of Antiquity that relate to Sacred History;" "History of Carausius;" "Dissertation on the Spleen." He was called, on account of his knowledge of British antiquities, the "Arch Druid." B. at Holbeach, Lincolnshire, 1687; D. in London, 1765.

STURM, John, stoorm, a learned German writer, who studied at Liege, after which he set up a printing-press, and printed several Greek authors. In 1529 he visited Paris, where he read lectures upon Greek and Latin authors, and also on logic; but being a Protestant, he was obliged to remove to Strasburg, where, through his efforts, the gymnasium of that city was elevated into a university. His works, all of which were written in such elegant Latin that he obtained the title of the German Cicero, chiefly consist of notes on Aristotle, Cicero, and other authors. B. at Schleidan, near Cologne, 1507; D. 1589.

STURM, John Christopher, a German mathematician, who became professor of philosophy and mathematics at Altdorf, which office he retained during thirty-four years. He published a translation of Archimedes into German; "A Course of Mathematics," which has been translated into English; a Latin translation of the "Hydraulic Architecture" of Bockler, and some treatises upon pneumatics, &c. B. at Hippelstein, Bavaria, 1635; D. at Altdorf, 1703.

STURM, Leonard Christopher, a German architect, and son of the preceding. He published "A Complete Course of Architecture." B. at Altdorf, 1669; D. 1719.

STURM, James Charles Francis, an eminent Swiss mathematician, who repaired to Paris in his 20th year, and so highly distinguished himself by his attainments as to gain the appointment of professor of mathematics in the Polytechnic school. He was the discoverer of the celebrated theorem which is named after him. In 1840 he was elected a fellow of the Royal Society, and was awarded the gold Copley medal of that body for "his valuable mathematical labours in the solution of a problem which has baffled some of the greatest mathematicians that the world has produced." He also wrote several valuable treatises upon optics, mechanics, geometry, and pure analysis, for the Memoirs of the French Academy of Sciences, and the journals of other eminent bodies. B. at Geneva, 1803; D. at Paris, 1855.

STURMIUS, James, stoor'-me-oos, a German statesman, who was sent as ambassador to several foreign countries, and was deputy to the diets of the empire. He contributed to the reformation of religion at Strasburg, to the erecting of a college, and assisted Sleidan in his "History of the Reformation." B. at Strasburg, 1489; D. at the same city, 1553.

STURT, sturt, a county, a mountain, and a river of S. Australia.

STUTTGARD, stoot'-gart, a city of Germany, capital of Wurtemberg, on the Nesenbach, 2 miles from the Neckar, over which is an elegant bridge, 38 miles from Carlsruhe. It may be considered as divided into three parts,—the town proper, which is badly built, and two suburbs, which are less antique and somewhat better. It has a royal palace, which contains a good collection of paintings and statues, some of them by Danneker and Canova; it has, besides, a public library, an old palace, a mint, a town-house, post-office, gymnasium, city-hall, hospital, workhouse, museum, various schools, a great church, and the royal stables. Though surrounded by a wall and ditch, it is a place of no strength. Manf. Leather, hats, cotton, silk, plated goods, and snuff. Pop. 42,000.—It has railway communication with Heilbroun and Gieslingen.

STYRIA, stir'-i-a (Germ. STEYERMARK, sti'-er-mark), a province of the Austrian empire, situate between Austria proper and Illyria. Area, 8,660 square miles. It is divided into the circles of Gratz, Marburg, Cilly, Judenburg, and Bruck. Desc. Mountainous, except in the S.E.; comprising mostly branches of the Noric, Styrian, and Carnic Alps. Rivers. The principal are the Enns, the Mur, the Drave, and the Save. Pro. Wheat, barley, oats, rye, and, in the warmer situations, maize and tobacco. Fruit, hemp, and flax, are also raised. Much of the country, however, is devoted to pastoral purposes. Minerals. Lead, silver, gold, iron, coal, zinc, vitriol, marble, and building-stone. Salt is abundant, and cobalt and arsenic are also found. Manf. Unimportant. This province is now traversed by the railway from Vienna to Trieste. Pop. 1,010,000. Lat. between 45° 54′ and 47° 50′ N. Lon. between 13° 30′ and 16° 25′ E.—Styria has belonged to Austria since about the close of the 12th century.

STYX, stix, a small river of Nonacris, in Arcadia, the water of which was so cold and poisonous that it proved fatal to those who drank of it. It was even said to dissolve iron. The wonderful properties of this water suggested the idea that it was a river of Hades, especially as it disappeared in the earth a little below its source. The gods always swore by the Styx, and if any of them violated this oath, Jupiter obliged them to drink its waters, which lulled them for one whole year in senseless stupidity; for the nine following years they were deprived of the ambrosia and the nectar of the gods; but, at the expiration of this period, they were restored to the assembly of the deities, and all their original privileges.

SUABIA, or SWABIA, swai'-be-a, the former name of one of the ten circles or great divisions of Germany, bounded W. by France and S. by Switzerland. It is now subdivided amongst Baden, Bavaria, Hohenzollern, and Wurtemberg. Area, 3,858 square miles. Pop. 560,000.

SUAKIN, soo-a'-kin, a seaport-town of Nubia, on the western coast of the Red Sea, once a place of wealth and importance, now almost in ruins. It is still the channel of communication between Arabia and the interior of Africa, and the resort of pilgrims and slave-dealers. Pop. 8,000. Lat. 19° 48′ N. Lon. 37° 33′ E.

SUAREZ, Francis, swa'-raith, a learned Spanish Jesuit, who was professor of divinity at Alcala, Salamanca, and Rome, and lastly at Coimbra, in Portugal. His treatise on laws has been highly esteemed. All his works exhibit a great deal of learning, mixed up with much trifling sophistry. B. at Granada, 1548; D. at Lisbon, 1615.

SUBACHI, soo'-ba-kee, a small maritime town of Circassia, on the Black Sea, 20 miles from Mamai.

SUBATHOO, soo'-ba-too, a cantonment and fort of India, situate in a district studded with villages, the inhabitants of which are engaged in agricultural pursuits. Lat. 30° 58′ N. Lon. 77° 3′ E.

SUBIACO, soo-be-a'-ko, a town of Central Italy, in the Pontifical States, 20 miles from Rome. It was long a summer residence of the popes. Pop. 6,000.

SUCHET, Louis Gabriel, soo'-shai, a celebrated French general and marshal of France. At the outburst of the Revolution he joined the army as a volunteer of the cavalry of Lyons. Distinguishing himself at the siege of Toulon in 1793, and again in 1795, at Loano, Italy, where he captured three Austrian standards, and, under Massena, he was created a chef de brigade. Having exhibited great ability as a tactician while acting as chief of General Joubert's staff in Italy, he attracted the favourable notice of General Bonaparte, who promoted him to be Massena's second in command. He gave eminent proofs of his ability soon afterwards, when, in 1800, he first kept in check, and next cut off the retreat of the Austrian general Melas, who had 40,000 men under his command, Suchet's troops numbering only 8,000. By the brilliant manœuvres he executed upon this occasion, he rendered the greatest assistance to Bonaparte, who, with the main body of the French army, was crossing the Great St. Bernard. After the battle of Marengo, at which he was present, he was intrusted with the government of Genoa. He next commanded the centre of the Army of Italy. In 1805 he was placed in command of a division under Marshal Lannes, and it was to his skilful dispositions that the memorable victory at Austerlitz was due. In the following year he defeated Prince Frederick of Prussia, and captured from him thirty pieces of cannon. To that important advantage, in contesting which the gallant Prussian prince lost his life, Napoleon owed the impunity by which he was enabled to fall upon the rear of the Prussians. In 1807 he repelled the attack made upon his division by the Russian general Essen. His reputation was now so high, that Napoleon gave him the command of the fifth division of the Army of Spain, advanced him to the highest grade of the Legion of Honour, granted him a pension of 20,000 francs, and created him a count of the empire. His Spanish campaign forms the most brilliant era in his career. Napier, in his "History of the Peninsular War," declares, "Suchet was no ordinary man; and with equal vigour and prudence he commenced a system of discipline in his corps, and of order in his government, that afterwards carried him, with scarcely a check, from one success to another, until he obtained the rank of marshal for himself and the honour for his corps of being the only one in Spain that never suffered any signal reverse." In rapid succession he defeated each Spanish general that opposed him, and made himself master of the fortresses of Lerida, Mequinanza, Tortosa, and the city of Tarragona, which was defended by 18,000 Spaniards, 6,000 of whom are stated to have fallen. Mont-Serrat, hitherto considered impregnable, was next taken. For these great achievements Suchet was created a marshal of the empire, in 1811. In the same year he defeated the Spanish general Blake, and 30,000 men, under the walls of Murviedro; Valencia capitulated to him in 1812, and he soon became master of the whole province of that name. Napoleon marked his sense of the brilliant services performed by his lieutenant by creating him duke of Albufera. Unlike some of the other French generals, he ruled both in Valencia and Aragon with humanity and justice. Lord Wellington's successes compelled Suchet, after the battle of Vittoria, to retreat upon Catalonia, and afterwards to entirely evacuate Spanish territory. He conducted his retreat in an orderly manner; and, on reaching Narbonne, in 1814, he gave his adhesion to the new order of things. While Louis XVIII. remained upon the throne, he held the command of the tenth corps; but, after the return of Napoleon from Elba, he again took service under his old chief. He commanded the Army of the Alps, numbering 10,000 men; and, on being compelled to retreat at the approach of 100,000 Austrians, he occupied Lyons; on the subsequent surrender of which city he obtained honourable terms. At the restoration of Louis XVIII. he was for a time in disgrace; but in 1819 he was reinstated in all his honours, civil and military. The remaining years of his life were spent in composing his memoirs, which were published in 1826. Suchet deservedly takes rank among the best of Napoleon's generals. Napoleon, on being asked whom he considered the first of his officers, replied,—"I think Suchet is probably the first; Massena was, but you may say that he is dead." The latter was at the time (1817) fast sinking. Suchet was B. at Lyons, either 1770 or 1772; D. at Marseilles, 1826.

SUCHEW, su-chu', a city of China, 55 miles from Shanghae. It is said to be 10 miles in circumference, and inclosed with fortifications. Pop. Unascertained.

SUCKLING, Sir John, suk'-ling, an English poet. After receiving a liberal education, he went abroad, and made a campaign under Gustavus Adolphus. On his return to England, he became famous at court for his ready, sparkling wit. He raised a troop of horse for the king's service; but his men behaved so ill in the engagement with the Scotch, in 1639, on the English borders, as to bring upon him much ridicule. His works consist of poems and letters, "An Account of Religion by Reason," and four plays. Several of his songs are very fine. B. at Whitton, Middlesex, 1609; D. in France, about 1642.

SUDBURY, sud'-ber-re, a market-town and borough of Suffolk, on the Stour, over which is a well-built wooden bridge, 19 miles from Ipswich. This was one of the first places at which King Edward III. settled the Flemings, for the woollen manufacture, which has long since declined. The town has still, however, a manufacture of silk and buntings. Pop. 6,200.

SUDERMANIA, or SODERMANLAND, su-der-mal'-ni-a, an old province of Middle Sweden, situate to the west of Stockholm, now forming the district Nykoping with a part of Stockholm.

SUDJA, sood'-ja, a town of European Russia, in the government of Koursk, and 50 miles from the town of that name. Manf. Salt. Pop. 3,000.

SUE, Eugène, soo, an eminent French romancist, who was educated for the profession of medicine, and was attached, as surgeon, to the army sent to Spain under the duke of Angoulême. In 1825 he entered the navy in the same capacity, and was present at the battle of Navarino. At the death of his father, who had been one of the household physicians to Napoleon I., he inherited an estate of £1,600 per annum; whereupon he quitted his profession, and soon afterwards turned his attention to literature. He became a popular writer in a very few years; but when he put forth his "Mysteries of Paris" and "Wandering Jew," he rose to an almost unexampled height of success. These works were read by every one who read fiction in France: they were translated into nearly all the living languages. His subsequent works of any importance were, "Martin the Foundling" and "The Seven Capital Sins." B. at Paris, 1804; D. 1857.

SUECA, soo-ai'-ka, a town of Spain, in Valencia, on the Jucar, near its mouth in the Mediterranean Sea. Pop. 9,000.

SUETONIUS, Caius Suetonius Tranquillus, swe-to'-ni-us, a Roman historian, who is supposed to have been educated for the bar. He was the intimate friend of Pliny the younger, by whose means he was made tribune. Suetonius was afterwards secretary to the emperor Adrian. Of his works, his "Lives of the First Twelve Emperors," two treatises concerning illustrious grammarians and rhetoricians, and several lives of poets, have been preserved. B. about 70; D. about 123.

SUEUR, LE. (See LESUEUR.)

SUÈVRES, swaivr, a town and parish of France, in the department of the Loir-and-Cher, 8 miles from Blois. Pop. 2,000.—It has a station on the railway to Orleans and Tours.

SUEZ, soo'-ez, a city of Egypt, on the borders of Arabia, at the head of the Red Sea, 78 miles from Cairo. It was, about the beginning of the 16th century, a flourishing mart, being at once the emporium of the trade with India and the rendezvous of the numberless pilgrims who, from every part of the Turkish empire, repaired to the holy shrine of Mecca. Since that time it has greatly declined, in consequence of the diminution both of the general trade of the Red Sea and of the concourse to Mecca. It sustained, also, irreparable injury from the devastations committed by the French. Its houses are of sundried bricks; its streets are unpaved, and it has about a dozen mosques, a Greek church, and a custom-house. Its port is 2 miles from the town, and the surrounding country is a complete desert, entirely deficient in water, unless of the most offensive and noxious description. Frequent caravans come from Gaza, Jaffa, and Jerusalem, bringing soap, oil, tobacco, and other goods. The staple import consists of coffee. Vessels bring also tea, pickled ginger, and a great quantity of tamarinds. Pop. about 2,000. Lat. 30° 1′ N. Lon. 32° 28′ E.—The ISTHMUS OF SUEZ is the neck of land which connects Asia and Africa, having on its N. the Mediterranean Sea, and on its S. the Gulf of Suez. Its breadth is 73 miles, which distance has frequently been proposed to be opened by a canal, connecting the Red Sea and the Mediterranean. A railway connects it with Cairo and Alexandria.

SUFEID KOH, soo-fide ko, the 'White Mountain,' in Afghanistan, 100 miles from Hindoo-Koosh. It has three parallel ranges, the highest of these culminating in a peak 14,000 feet above the level of the sea.

SUFFIELD, suf'-field, a post township in Hartford county, Connecticut, U.S., 11 miles from Springfield. Pop. 3,000.

SUFFOLK, suf'-fok, a maritime county of England, bounded on the N. by the county of Norfolk, W. by Cambridge, S. by Essex, and E. by the German Ocean. The river Stour divides it from Essex, the Little Ouse and Waveney from Norfolk, and the Great Ouse and one of its branches from Cambridge. Area, 11,115 square miles. Desc. Generally level, without any considerable eminences; and its soil is various, but very distinctly marked. 1st. A strong loam or a clay marl bottom predominates through the centre and greatest part of the county, extending from Haverhill to Beccles on the one hand, and from near Ipswich to beyond Ixworth on the other. 2nd. To the east of this, and between it and the coast, extends, northwards of the river Orwell, a district of sandy soil, and southwards a much smaller one of rich loam. 3rd. To the west again occurs another considerable district of sand, which extends to the north-west corner of the county, where a fourth tract of fen land is included between the Great and Little Ouse. Rivers. The Stour, the Waveney, the Ouse, the Orwell, the Deben, the Ald, and the Blyth, along the coast, and the Lark on the west. Pro. The raising of crops is the principal object of the Suffolk husbandry, although the management of the dairy is also much attended to, as well as the rearing of sheep. The crops commonly cultivated are wheat, barley, oats, rye, beans, pease, buckwheat, coleseed, turnips, clover, trefoil, white clover, and sainfoin. Hops and hemp are also raised. Butter is made in great quantities; also cheese, though of inferior quality. The Suffolk cows have long been celebrated for their abundance of milk; and the county is no less noted for its breed of horses and hogs. Poultry is kept in abundance, especially turkeys. Large numbers of pigeons are reared in the open field; and there are many rabbit-warrens. Manf. Unimportant. At Ipswich quantities of stays are made. Pop. 340,000.

SUFFOLK, two counties of the United States. 1. In Massachusetts. Area, 110 square miles. Pop. 145,000.—2. In New York, on the east part of Long Island, comprising about two-thirds of the island. Area, 973 square miles. Pop. 40,000. This county is much indented by numerous creeks and bays.

SUFFOLK, Earl of. This title was successively borne by the families of Pole, Brandon, and Howard. The first earl of the latter family was Thomas Howard, son of Thomas, third duke of Norfolk. He was created earl of Suffolk in 1603, and became grand-treasurer of England.

SUFFOLK, William Pole, Earl, and afterwards Marquis of, an English general, and grandson of Michael de Pole, first earl of Suffolk. He served under Henry V. in the wars with France, distinguished himself at Rouen in 1419, and was, in 1429, nominated by the duke of Bedford, commander-in-chief of the troops before Orleans, but was forced to raise the siege by Joan of Arc. After enjoying great favour, he was, in 1451, charged with treason and beheaded.

SUFFOLK, Charles Brandon, Duke of, was the friend of Henry VIII. from the youth of the latter. He was created by Henry, duke of Suffolk, in 1513. Charged to conduct to England, Mary, sister of the English king, and widow of Louis XII. of France, he gained the affections of that princess, whom he married in 1515.

SUGAR CREEK, a tributary of the Susquehannah, in Pennsylvania, United States. Also the name of several other rivers and townships. Also of an island in the strait between lakes Superior and Huron.

SUHARUNPORE, soo-ha-run-por', a district of British India, in the S.W. provinces. Area, 2,160 square miles. Pro. Wheat, oats, barley, rice, maize, tobacco, indigo, and vegetables. Pop. 550,000. Lat. between 29° 28′ and 30° 26′ N. Lon. between 77° 13′ and 78° 15′ E. —The CITY of the same name has a population of 35,000.

SUHLA, soo'-la, a town of Prussian Saxony, 28 miles from Erfurt. It has several churches and hospitals. Manf. Fire-arms and cotton goods. Pop. 9,000.

SUICER, or SCHWEITZER, John Gaspar, shwite'-zer, a learned Swiss divine, who became professor of Greek and Hebrew at the university of Zurich. He compiled a great work, on which he was engaged during twenty years, entitled, "Thesaurus Ecclesiasticus." B. at Zurich, 1620; D. at the same place, 1684.

SUICER, John Henry, son of the preceding, became professor at Heidelberg. He wrote several learned works, particularly a Chronology of Switzerland, in Latin. D. at Heidelberg, 1705.

SUIDAS, su-i'-das, or swi'-das, a Greek lexicographer, whose Greek lexicon, historical and geographical, which contains much valuable information, is extant. The latest edition is that of Bekker, Berlin, 1854. Supposed to have flourished in the 10th or 11th century.

SUJUK-KALE, soo'-jook ka'-le, is a Russian port on the coast of the Black Sea, 18 miles from Anapa. It was formerly an important Russian post, taken by the Russians in 1791.

SULIMAN MOUNTAINS, soo-li-man', a range in Afghanistan, extending from lat. 29° to 33° 40′ N.; lon. 70° E. Its culminating point is called the "Throne of Solmair," and has a height of 11,000 feet.

SULIMARVA, soo-le-mar'-va, a state of W. Africa, between lat. 9° and 10° N., and lon. 9° 30′ and 11° W.

SULLA. (See SYLLA.)

SULLIVAN, sul'-li-van, a county in New York, U.S. Pop. 6,108.—Also the name of several townships. Area, 738 square miles. Pop. 30,000.—Another in Tennessee. Area, 524 square miles. Pop. 12,000.

SULLIVAN ISLAND, an island at the mouth of Ashley and Cooper rivers, 6 miles below Charleston, U.S.

SULLY, sool'-le, two parishes and small towns of France, neither with a population above 1,600.

SULLY, Maximilian de Bethune, Duke of, a celebrated French statesman, who, at an early age, became the companion of Henry of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV. of France, whom he accompanied to Paris, where he fortunately escaped death during the massacre of St. Bartholomew, by the kindness of the principal of the College of Burgundy, who concealed him for three days. He subsequently escaped with Henry of Navarre from Paris; and in the civil war which broke out, he held a command under Henry and the Prince de Condé. He displayed great valour on many occasions, particularly at the siege of Marmande, and the battles of Coutras, Arques, and Ivry. After the accession of Henry to the French throne, Sully was appointed minister of finance; in which capacity he displayed the most brilliant ability. He obtained the highest offices in the state, and, upon the accession of James I., was sent to England as the ambassador of France. After the murder of the king, Sully retired from court. He left Memoirs written by himself. B. at Rosny, 1560; D. at Villebon, 1641.

SULMONA, sool-mo'-na, a fortified town of Naples, 34 miles from Aguila. Manf. Paper, shell goods, leather, and confectionery. Pop. 10,000.

SULPICE, ST., sool'-peece, the name of numerous parishes and villages in France, none of them with a population above 2,000.

SULPICIA, sul-pish'-i-a, a Roman lady, who lived in the reign of Domitian, and was called the Roman Sappho. She wrote a satirical poem against Domitian, printed in the "Corpus Poetarum" of Maittaire.

SULPICIUS RUFUS, sul-pish'-i-us, an eminent Roman orator. "He was," says Cicero, "of all the orators that I ever heard, the most dignified, and, if one may use the expression, the most tragic. His voice was powerful, sweet, and clear; his gesture and every movement graceful; and yet he seemed as if he were trained for the forum, and not for the stage. His language was rapid and flowing, and yet not redundant or diffuse." He was a tribune of the people. B. 124 B.C.; slain at the command of Sylla.

SULPICIUS SEVERUS, an ecclesiastical historian, who was likewise distinguished for his eloquence and piety. He wrote the "Life of St. Martin of Tours," and an "Abridgment of Ecclesiastical History." Flourished at the commencement of the 5th century.

SULZ, soolts, a town of Germany, in Wurtemberg, on the Neckar, 6 miles from Oberndorf. Pop. 2,500.

SULZA, sool'-tza, a town of Saxe-Weimar, on the Ilm, 15 miles from Weimar. Pop. 1,500.

SULZBACH, soolts'-bak, a town of Germany, in Bavaria, 36 miles from Ratisbon. It has a castle and a Latin school. Pop. 3,100.

SULZE, sool'-tze(r), a walled town of Mecklenburg-Schwerin, 20 miles from Rostock. Pop. 4,000.

SULZER, John George, sool'-tzer, a learned Swiss writer, who became professor of mathematics at Berlin, and member of the Royal Academy in that city. His principal works are "Moral Contemplations on the Works of Nature," "Treatise on Education," "Universal Theory of the Fine Arts." B. at Winterthur, canton of Zurich, 1720; D. at Berlin, 1779.

SUMAROKOF, Alexander, soo-ma'-ro-kof, a Russian dramatic author, and surnamed the father of the Russian stage. His tragedies laid the foundation of the Russian theatre, and being performed with applause before the empress, animated him to proceed in the dramatic career, which he did with great success, and was appointed to the rank of brigadier, and director of the theatre. He also received a pension, was nominated counsellor of state, and knighted. He wrote several poems and some historical works. B. at St. Petersburg, 1718; D. at Moscow, 1777.

SUMATRA, soo-ma'-tra, a large island of the Asiatic archipelago, the most W. of the Sunda islands, and that immense collection of islands which are so thickly scattered over the ocean, from the coasts of N. Australia and New Guinea to the coast of China on the east, and westward to the Malayan peninsula. Area, 130,000 square miles. Desc. A chain of mountains runs through its whole extent, and the ranges are, in many parts, double and treble, attaining near the equator an elevation of nearly 15,000 feet. Among these are extensive plains of great elevation, and of a temperate climate. The mountains being much nearer the western than the opposite coast, all the greatest rivers are found on the eastern side of the island. The E. part is mostly level and undulating, and along the coast there are numerous marshy and sandy plains. A great portion of the island is covered with dense forests. Rivers. Those on the western coast, having a shorter course, are not so large; though the Kataun, Indrapura, Tabuyong, and Sinkel, are considerable streams. The others are the Siak, Jadrageri, Jambi, and Palembang. Climate. This varies with the height of the ground. On the plains, the thermometer, about two in the afternoon, generally fluctuates between 82° and 85° in the shade. In other places it is not unfrequently at 87° and 88°; at sunrise it is usually as low as 70°; among the mountains it falls as low as 40°. In this island, as well as all other countries between the tropics, the wind uniformly blows from the sea to the land for a certain number of hours in the four-and-twenty, and then changes and blows for about as many from the land to the sea, excepting only when the monsoon rages with remarkable violence. Zoology. The wild animals are numerous; the tiger grows to a prodigious size and strength. Elephants are common, and the hippopotamus haunts most of the rivers. The rhinoceros is a native of the woods, also the bear. There are many species of deer, and the varieties of the monkey tribes are innumerable. Here are also sloths, squirrels, ichneumons or stinkards, civet-cats, tiger-cats, porcupines, hedgehogs, pangolins, bats or all kinds, alligators, guanos, chameleons, flying lizards, tortoises, and turtle. Among the domestic animals is the buffalo, which supplies milk, butter, and beef. The breed of horses is small. The sheep are also a small breed. The other animals are the goat and hog, both domestic and wild; the otter, the cat, the rat, and the dog. Frogs are abundant, and their noise upon the approach of rain is tremendous. They furnish prey to the snakes, which are found here of all sizes, and in great variety of species. On the coasts are a great variety of shell-fish. Birds abound, and the whole island swarms with insects; among which are cockroaches, crickets, bees, flies of all sorts, mosquitoes, scorpions, centipedes, and water and land leeches.

Pro. Rice is the most important article of cultivation. There are, besides, millet, coffee, the cocoa-nut tree, betel-nut, bamboo, sago, and sugar-cane. Maize, chilly pepper, turmeric, nutmeg, mace, cloves, ginger, coriander and cumin seed, are raised in the gardens of the natives. Small plantations of tobacco are met with in every part of the country. There are other creeping plants, which are manufactured into twine, sewing-thread, &c. All sorts of tropical fruits are abundant. Of shrubs and flowers, there are innumerable varieties, and a perpetual succession throughout the year. Scented wood, teak, and other timber are produced in quantities. Of the productions which are regarded as articles of commerce, the most abundant is pepper; also camphor, benzoin or benjamin, cassia, &c. Rattans also furnish annually many large cargoes; and walking-canes are found near the rivers which open to the Straits of Malacca. The annual and the shrub cotton are cultivated by the natives; also the silk cotton. A drug named dragon's-blood is procured from a large species of rattan, and is exported to China, where it is highly esteemed. Gambir-juice is extracted from the leaves of a plant of that name. The agila-wood, or lignum aloe, is highly prized in all parts, for the fragrant scent it emits when burning. The forests contain an inexhaustible store and endless variety of timber-trees, many sorts of which are capable of being applied to shipbuilding; also the spreading banyan-tree of Hindostan. Minerals. The earth is rich in minerals and other fossil productions; and the island has, in all ages, been famous for gold, which still continues to be procured in considerable quantities. There are also mines of copper, iron, and tin. Sulphur and saltpetre are collected in large quantities. Mineral and hot springs are found in many districts. There are also various earths, namely, the yellow, red, and white ochres. Gold is found chiefly in the interior. Colonies of Malays have settled themselves in almost all the districts where it is procured, and appear to be the only persons who dig for it in mines, or collect it in streams. The mines are numerous. The merchants carry the gold from the interior to the seacoast, where they barter it for iron and iron working-tools, opium, and the fine piece-goods of Madras and Bengal. Sulphur, yellow arsenic, edible birds-nests, so much celebrated as a peculiar luxury of the table, especially among the Chinese; the biche de mer, and beeswax, are all articles of trade. Imp. From the coast of Coromandel various cotton goods, as blue and white long-cloth, chintz, and coloured handkerchiefs, and salt. From Bengal, muslins, striped and plain, and several other kinds of cotton goods, taffetas, and some other silks, with opium in considerable quantities. From the Malabar coast, various cotton goods, mostly of a coarse raw fabric. From China, coarse porcelain, kwalis, or iron pans, in sets of various sizes: tobacco, shred very fine; gold thread, fans, and a number of small articles. From Celebes and other Eastern islands, rough striped cotton cloth, krises and other weapons, silken krisbelts, hats, small pieces of ordnance, spices; also salt of a large grain, and sometimes rice. From Europe, silver, iron, steel, lead, cutlery, various sorts of hardware, brass wire, and broad-cloths, especially scarlet. Manf. Generally speaking, the inhabitants have made no great progress in the arts of industry. They make nails; also various kinds of tools; such as adzes of different sorts, axes, hoes, &c. In carpenters' work they are equally rude. To painting and drawing they are quite strangers. In carving, both in wood and ivory, they are curious and fanciful; but their designs are always grotesque and out of nature. In cane and basket-work they are particularly neat and expert; as well as in mats, of which some kinds are much prized for their extreme fineness and ornamental borders. Silk and cotton cloths, of varied colours, manufactured by themselves, are worn by the natives in all parts of the country, especially by the women, who are very expert at embroidery, the gold and silver thread for which is procured from China, as well as their needles. Different kinds of earthenware are manufactured; and cocoanut-oil is extracted and in general use. Gunpowder is also manufactured in various parts. But of all their manufactures, their work in fine gold and silver filigree has been most admired, and it deserves the greater admiration considering the coarse tools with which it is made. They are also particularly expert in the manufacture of fishing-nets and in making springs for catching birds. Inhabitants. The laws of the Sumatrans are properly a set of long-established customs, handed down to them from their ancestors, the authority for which is founded in usage and general consent. The manners of the women are in general pure and unexceptionable. They are brought up in the strictest reserve and chastity. Polygamy is permitted among them, but is rarely practised, except among the great. All ranks are passionately addicted to gaming and cock-fighting. The Sumatrans, and more particularly the Malays, are much attached, in common with the eastern nations, to the practice of smoking opium. The native Sumatran of the interior is temperate and sober, his diet being mostly vegetable, and his only beverage water. Hospitality is greatly practised, with very simple manners. On the other hand, they are litigious, indolent, dishonest in their dealings with strangers, which they consider as no moral defect, regardless of truth, mean, servile, and, though cleanly in their persons, filthy in their apparel, which they never wash. The island is divided amongst a number of petty states. Pop. Vaguely estimated at from 2,000,000 to 3,000,000. Lat. between 5° 40′ N. and 6° S. Lon. between 95° 20′ and 106° E.

SUMBAWA, soom-baw'-wa, a large island in the Asiatic Archipelago, separated from the island of Lombock by the Straits of Allass. It belongs to the Sunda group. Ext. 160 miles long, with a breadth varying from 20 to 60. Desc. Nearly divided into two portions by a bay, and possessing a soil of great fertility. On its E. side is the volcano of Tomboro, 9,000 feet high. Pro. Sappan-wood, rice, horses, saltpetre, sulphur, wax, birdsnests, tobacco, and excellent ponies. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. between 8° and 9° S. Lon. between 116° 50′ and 119° 10′ E. Its capital town is of the same name, and is the residence of a chief subject to the sultan of Bima.

SUMBHUL, soom'-bool, a town of British India, in the presidency of Bengal, 50 miles from Bareilly. Pop. 10,500.

SUMBHULPORE, soom'-bool-por, the capital of a district of the same name, in Hindostan, on the Mahanuddy river, 143 miles from Cuttack. Pop. Unascertained.—The DISTRICT has an area of 4,693 square miles, and a population of 80,000. Lat. between 21° and 22° 5′ N. Lon. between 83° 6′ and 84° 51′ E.

SUMMIT, sum'-mit, a county of the United States, Ohio. Area, 532 square miles. Pop. 28,000.

SUMNER, sum'-ner, a county in West Tennessee, U.S. Area, 496 square miles. Pop. 24,000.

SUMPTER, sum'-ter, a raj of Bundelcund, India. Area, 175 square miles. Pop. 28,000. Lat. between 25° 42′ and 25° 57′ N. Lon. between 78° 51′ and 79° 11′ E.

SUMPTER, the name of two counties of the United States.—1. In Alabama. Area, 963 square miles. Pop. 25,000.—2. In Georgia. Area, 589 square miles. Pop. 11,000. Also a district in S. Carolina. Area, 1,400 square miles. Pop. 35,000.

SUMY, soo'-me, a town of Russia, government of Kharkov, on the Psiol, 80 miles from Kharkov. It contains several charitable institutions, and public depôts and warehouses. Pop. 13,000.

SUNART LOCH, sun'-art, an inlet of the sea, on the W. coast of Scotland, between Ardnamurchan on the N. and Morven and the island of Mull on the S. Ext. 22 miles long, with a varying breadth up to 4 miles. It has several islands.

SUNDA, STRAITS OF, sun'-da, the arm of the sea which separates the large islands of Sumatra and Java from the Indian Ocean. Its breadth varies from 70 to 90 miles.

SUNDA ISLES, in the Asiatic Archipelago, comprise Sumatra, Java, Lombok, Bali, Flores, and several others.

SUNDERBUNDS, soon'-der-boond, or sun'-der-bund, an extensive and woody district of Bengal, in British India, situate in the delta of the Ganges, and intersected by innumerable rivers or creeks, all of which are salt, and through the whole tract nothing but brackish water is to be found. Area, 6,500 square miles. Desc. They have been formed by the depositions of the earth washed down by the Ganges during its periodical inundations, and are very unhealthy. Pro. Rice, indigo, sugar-cane, and the mulberry-tree. They abound with wild beasts, and are surrounded by alligators in the various channels of the Ganges.

SUNDERLAND, sun'-der-land, a market-town and seaport of Durham, near the mouth of the Wear, in the North Sea, 13 miles from Durham. It is joined to the town of Monk-Wearmouth, on the opposite side, by an iron bridge of one arch, 236 feet in span, and 100 feet above the Wear at low-water. The High Street is spacious and tolerably handsome, especially the central part, which rises with a considerable ascent. Some of the other streets, which branch off from this, are narrow and dirty; but the general appearance of the town has been greatly improved. Its public buildings are two parish churches, numerous chapels, various benevolent institutions, charity-schools, an exchange, public library, Athenæum, assembly-room, a theatre, barracks, custom-house, and excise office. The harbour is formed by two piers, situate on the south and north sides of the river, and is defended by batteries. It has a lighthouse on its N. pier. Coal is the staple article of export. Most of the coals go to the metropolis, and to different places along the eastern coast. Considerable quantities are also sent to the Baltic, and, in time of peace, to France and Holland. Manf. Flint and bottle-glass, earthenware, copperas, coal, tar, patent ropes, and chemicals. Shipbuilding is carried on to a great extent. Pop. 68,000. Lat. 54° 54′ 5″ N. Lon. 1° 22′ W.—This town is frequented as a bathing-place, and is connected with other towns in the North by a network of railways.

SUNDERLAND, the name of several townships in England, none of them with a population above 2,000.

SUNDERLAND, Henry Spencer, first Earl of, an English nobleman, who distinguished himself in defending the cause of Charles I. against the Parliament. Before he had attained his majority, he married the beautiful Dorothy Sidney, sister of Algernon Sidney, and the Saccharissa of the poet Waller. At the outburst of the civil war, he joined the king's standard. He, however, had no real sympathy with the royal cause, and he declared, in a letter to his wife, "If there could be an expedient found to salve the punctilio of honour, I would not remain here an hour." In 1643 he was created earl of Sunderland by Charles I., in reward, it is asserted, of having helped that monarch with a loan of £15,000. He fell in the first battle of Newbury. Clarendon, the royalist historian, thus speaks of him: "He was a lord of great fortune, tender years (being not above three-and-twenty years of age), and an early judgment; who, having no command in the army, attended upon the king's person, under the obligation of honour; and putting himself that day in the king's troop, as volunteer, before they came to charge, was taken away by a cannon-bullet." B. 1620; killed, 1643.

SUNDERLAND, Robert Spencer, Earl of, an English statesman, who was the son of the preceding. He commenced his public career in 1671, on being appointed ambassador to Spain. He subsequently fulfilled the same functions at the court of France, and afterwards became secretary of state for foreign affairs. Under the reign of James II. he rose to the height of power as president of the council and premier minister, and, in order to retain the king's favour, became a Roman Catholic, or, at least, put on the semblance of it. Accordingly, he became so unpopular with the nation, that James was compelled to dismiss him; a change which, it is said, "pleased all men; but it came too late." On the accession of William III., Sunderland retired to Holland, where he remained during two years; but, to the general surprise, he was recalled at the end of that period, and taken into favour by the new monarch. He was not intrusted with office for several years; but it was well known that he acted as chief adviser to William. In 1695 he was appointed lord chamberlain, and remained at the head of the government during two years; after which he retired into private life. The secret of this statesman's success—of his being employed by James II. and his supplanter William III., was, undoubtedly, his great talents for the conduct of public affairs. "He had, indeed," says Bishop Burnet, "the superior genius to all the men of business that I have known." B. either 1641 or 1642; D. at Althorpe, 1702.

SUNEH, soo'-nai, a town of India, in the district of Salon, territory of Oude, 65 miles from Lucknow. Pop. 6,000.

SUNIUM, CAPE. (See COLONNA.)

SUPERIOR, LAKE, su-peer'-i-or, a lake of North America, and the largest body of fresh water which has yet been discovered. (See AMERICA, NORTH.)

SURA, soo'-ra, a river of Russia, principally in the governments of Penza and Simbirsk. After a course of 400 miles, it joins the Volga, or Wolga, at Vasil.

SURAT, soo-rat', a city of British India, in the Bombay presidency, on the river Taptee, about 20 miles from its mouth, and 150 miles from Bombay. It is fortified, and carries on a very extensive trade. It was here that the English East-India Company obtained permission from the Mogul emperor Jehangire to establish their first factory in Hindostan. The firman, or order, is dated in January, 1612. Since the rise of Bombay, the value of its traffic has much declined, and now consists chiefly of raw cotton, a few of its own manufactures, and articles imported from Gujerat, or Guzerat. It is situate in a fertile plain, protected on one side by the river, and on the three others by a rampart and ditch. It is garrisoned by European troops, and has a European church and cemetery, numerous Hindoo schools, and a Hindoo hospital for sick animals of all kinds. It is the seat of a high court of the presidency, and the residence of a British military commandant and other authorities. Manf. Woven goods; and large quantities of cotton are sent to Bombay. Pop. 135,000.—Of the ancient history of Surat under the Hindoo dynasties, we have no authentic records. On the decline of the Mogul authority, when the governor of every province assumed independence, Surat also wished to take advantage of the general confusion. First the Mahrattas, then the British, were called in. They took possession of the fortress in the name of the emperor of Delhi; but there were other authorities in the place, and it was not till 1803 that the success of the British against the Mahrattas compelled them to relinquish all claims on Surat. Although it can never again attain its former splendour, it is still a rich place.—The DISTRICT of the same name has an area of 1,629 square miles and a population of 493,000.

SURE, soor, a river of Belgium, joining the Moselle, 7 miles from Treves, after a course of 90 miles.

SURGÈRES, soor'-zhair, a parish and village of France, in the department of the Charente-Inférieure, 15 miles from Rochefort. Pop. 2,100.

SURINAM, su-ri-näm', a river of Dutch Guiana, which, after a course of 300 miles, enters the Atlantic, near Paramaribo.

SURREY, or SURRY, sur'-re, 'the south kingdom,' one of the inland counties of England, bounded S. by Sussex, E. by Kent, W. by Berkshire and Hampshire, and separated on the N. from Middlesex and a small part of Buckinghamshire by the river Thames. Area, 759 square miles. Desc. Diversified with hill and dale; the hills in some parts rising to a considerable height, and presenting very bold and commanding views. In some places naked heaths impart a wildness to the prospect, which is strikingly contrasted with the numberless beauties scattered over the surface of the country by the hand of art; while the hills, aspiring to the character of mountains, gradually decline into richly-wooded dales covered with luxuriant harvests. Rivers. The principal are the Wey, the Mole, and the Wandle. The Thames washes its northern border. The river Loddon skirts Surrey on its west side. Pro. Backward in agricultural operations. Wheat and barley are grown, the latter being only for malting, for which purpose it is reckoned equal in quality to any in the kingdom. Garden pease and beans are cultivated in the immediate neighbourhood of the metropolis and the sandy loams near the Thames, about Mortlake. Turnips are raised in large crops, and hops are largely cultivated about Farnham, where they are of first quality. The crops which are only partially cultivated are those of cabbages, potatoes, lucerne, and grass. Carrots, clover, and sainfoin, are extensively cultivated; and a greater quantity of land is employed in raising medicinal herbs than in any other shire in Britain. The cattle chiefly bred are sheep and oxen. Large numbers of hogs are reared, and many geese are kept on the commons and in the Weald. Minerals. Iron ore, fullers' earth; also extensive quarries of stone. There are large quarries of excellent limestone near Dorking; and chalk is abundant, and is in general use as a manure. Manf. Unimportant. Pop. 690,000.—The situation of this county being contiguous to the capital of the Roman settlements in Britain, numerous antiquities are found within its limits. St. George's Fields, Southwark, where coins and pavements have been found at different periods, was the centre of various Roman ways. The county is traversed by several railways.

SURREY, Thomas Howard, Earl of, a gallant English nobleman. He served with his brother, Sir Edward, against Sir Andrew Barton, a Scotch pirate, who infested the English coast in 1511. After the defeat and death of Barton, Surrey accompanied the marquis of Dorset in his expedition to Guienne, which ended in the conquest of Navarre by Ferdinand. On the death of his brother, Sir Edward, he was made high-admiral of England, and effectually cleared the Channel of the French cruisers. The victory of Flodden-field, in which the king of Scotland was slain, was chiefly owing to his bravery. For these services his father was restored to the title of duke of Norfolk, and himself created earl of Surrey. On the breaking out of the disturbances in Ireland, he was appointed lieutenant of that kingdom, where he suppressed the rebellion. After serving there two years, he returned, and had the command of the fleet against France. Notwithstanding his great services, Henry, at the close of life, caused the duke to be sent to the Tower on a charge of treason, and his son to be beheaded in his presence. The death of the tyrant only saved the duke's life. D. 1554.

SURREY, Henry Howard, Earl of, an accomplished English nobleman and poet, was the son of Thomas, duke of Norfolk, above mentioned. He was at first, while his friend the duke of Richmond, natural son of Henry VIII., was alive, a favourite at court; but after serving his country with great valour, he fell a victim to the jealousy of Henry VIII., who pretended to suspect him of treasonable designs against himself. He and his father were sent to the Tower, and the son beheaded on Tower-hill, in 1547. He wrote some excellent poems, and made a beautiful translation of a portion of the "Æneid." He is the first English writer of blank verse.

SURRY, the name of two counties in the United States. 1. In Virginia. Area, 263 square miles. Pop. 6,000.—2. In the north-west part of North Carolina. Area, 670 square miles. Pop. 20,000.

SURUGA, soo'-roo-ga, a maritime town of Japan, in the island of Niphon, 90 miles from Jedo. It has an imperial palace. Manf. Mats and coloured paper. Pop. Unascertained, but large.

SUS, soos, a province of Morocco, situate at its southern extremity, immediately bordering on the desert. Area, 28,686 square miles. Desc. It is the most fertile of any in the empire, and is traversed by the river Tesset, which falls into the Atlantic. Pop. 700,000. Lat. between 28° 30′ and 30° 30′ N. Lon. between 10° and 14° W.—The RIVER SUS rises in Mount Atlas, and, after a course of 130 miles, enters the Atlantic 5 miles from Agadir.

SUSA, soo'-sa, a town of Sardinia, at the foot of the Alps, 30 miles from Turin. It has numerous antiquities and extensive ruins of the fortress of La Brunetta, and a height of 11,000 feet above the level of the sea, crowned by a chapel. Near it are iron and marble-quarries. Pop. 3,300.

SUSA, a fortified seaport-town of N. Africa, Tunis, 40 miles from Hammamet. It has several mosques and bazars. Manf. Woollens, linens, and shoes. Pop. 10,000.

SUSANNAH, su-zăn'-na, was the wife of Joakim, and of the tribe of Judah, and rendered herself celebrated by her purity. She followed her husband to Babylon as a captive. Two elders or judges of Israel endeavoured to seduce her, and, failing in their object, they accused her of adultery. She was condemned to death; but Daniel obtained a reversal of the sentence, and succeeded in establishing her innocence. This is stated to have occurred at Babylon, about 600 B.C.

SUSARION, su-sair'-i-on, the most ancient of the Greek tragic poets. He took his subjects from history, and flourished about 589 B.C.

SUSIANA, soo-se-a'-na, a province of ancient Persia, answering to the modern Khuzistan.

SUSQUEHANNAH, sus-que-hăn'-na, a county on the N. side of Pennsylvania, U.S. Area, 712 square miles. Pop. 28,000.

SUSQUEHANNAH, a river of the United States, and the largest of Pennsylvania, rising in Otsego lake, New York, and, after a course of 350 miles, entering Chesapeake Bay, near the N.E. corner of Maryland.

SUSSEX, sus'-sex, one of the southern counties of England, bounded W. by Hampshire, N. by Surrey, E. and N.E. by Kent, and S. by the British Channel. Area, 1,466 square miles. Desc. Diversified with downs and intervening valleys, through which many little streams pursue their respective courses to the sea. The wooded scenery and the pasture-land give to the county in general a rural and a rich diversity of appearance. The wastes are very considerable, and chiefly occupy the northern side of the county. Rivers. The Arun, Rother, Ouse, and Adur, all small, and falling into the British Channel. Pro. From the remotest antiquity, Sussex has been celebrated for its timber, principally oak, which is the reigning feature of the Weald. The crops commonly raised are wheat, oats, clover, turnips, pease, barley, and tares. In the western part are some considerable orchards; and, where the soil is adapted to the fruit, the plantations are thickly interspersed. It is distinguished for its breed of cattle and sheep, the black-faced Southdown being in high repute. Minerals. In the easternmost parts of the Weald is found every sort of limestone. The Sussex marble is cut into slabs for ornamental chimney-pieces, and is highly esteemed. Iron-stone abounds, and chalk is plentiful. Fuller's earth and red ochre are also found. Manf. Salt, charcoal, gunpowder, potash, bricks, and earthenware. Pop. 340,000.—This county contains many Roman and some British antiquities. It is traversed in length and breadth by the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway.

SUSSEX, several counties of the United States. 1. In New Jersey. Area, 568 square miles. Pop. 24,000.—2. In Delaware. Area, 994 square miles. Pop. 27,000.—3. In Virginia. Area, 465 square miles. Pop. 10,000.

SUSSEX, Duke of. (See AUGUSTUS FREDERICK.)

SUTERA, soo-tăi'-ra, a town of the island of Sicily, 20 miles from Caltanisetta. Pop. 4,000.

SUTHERLANDSHIRE, sŭth'-er-land-sheer, one of the most northerly counties of Scotland, extending the whole breadth of the island, from the German to the Atlantic oceans. It is bounded W. by the Minch, an arm of the Atlantic Ocean, which separates it from the islands of Harris and Lewis; N. by the Northern Ocean; E. by the county of Caithness; S.E. by the Moray Firth; and S. and S.W. by the Dornoch Firth, the Oickel, and some lesser streams, which separate it from the county of Ross. Area, 1,800 square miles. Desc. Generally rugged and mountainous, excepting along the E. shore. It may, however, in a more particular manner, be described as divided into three districts; namely, the eastern, near the German Ocean; the western, on the coast of the Atlantic; and the middle, or central district. The eastern consists of a strip of level land, which runs along the coast side, and is from a quarter to a mile in breadth. The middle resembles the other parts of the North Highlands. It consists of the four straths or valleys of the rivers of Helmsdale, Brora, Fleet, and Oickel, with their tributary streams issuing from the adjoining mountains. The shores bordering the Atlantic are bold, and the whole district wild, rocky, and mountainous. The Assynt Mountains are huge and barren, without scarcely a stalk of heath to be seen on their surface; yet the glens, ravines, and hollows betwixt these mountains are extremely favourable to pasturage. Owing to the vicinity of the Atlantic Ocean, from which the west wind brings heavy clouds, there is no part of Scotland more subject to rain than the western district. On the coasts of the numerous bays there are many rugged and partially arable fields; but the climate, from the constant rains and mists, does not second the favourable properties of the soil. Rivers. Numerous. The principal are the Oickel, or Firth of Dornoch, which is navigable 12 miles for vessels of fifty tons; the water of Fleet, or Strathfleet; the water of Brora, and the water of Helmsdale. On the northern and western coasts are the water of Hallidale, the water of Strathy, the river Naver, the waters of Kenloch, Hope, and Dribol. Lakes. Numerous. The chief is Loch Shin, which stretches 20 miles from north-west to south-east, and is about 1 mile broad, and abounds with salmon and trout. Forests. There are three great deer forests. Pro. Game are found in great plenty; as common and Alpine hares, moorfowl, black-cocks, ptarmigans, wild pigeons, and partridges. The breeds of sheep are excellent; and, although extensive agricultural improvements have been effected, the produce is not great. Minerals. Rock crystals and pebbles are found in many parts; also beautiful garnets and specimens of native gold. Manf. Almost unknown. The trade mostly consists in the exchange of sheep, wool, cattle, and fish for woven fabrics and other manufactured goods and colonial produce. Pop. 28,000.—Previous to the year 1803, this county was separated by physical obstacles from the rest of Scotland. The country being intersected by the Moray Firth, and by the four friths of the Beauly, Cromarty, Dornoch, and Loch Fleet, all these dangerous and inconvenient inlets had to be crossed in order to reach the shire, which was nearly entirely insulated. There were no inns for the accommodation of the traveller; and beyond the Dornoch Firth there were no roads. Sutherlandshire was one of the last strongholds of the system of feudal Scotland, where that ancient state of manners prevailed, after it had been banished from the other parts of the country, by the progress of improvement and increased rents.

SUTSCHAWA, soot-sha'-va, a fortified town of Austria, on the frontier of Moldavia, 34 miles from Kimpolung. It has several Greek and Armenian churches, and a high school. Pop. 5,000.

SUTTON, sut'-ton, the name of numerous parishes, hamlets, and townships in England, with populations varying between 200 and 8,000. The largest is in Cheshire, 2 miles from Macclesfield, and in the W. Riding of Yorkshire, 3 miles from Hull.

SUTTON, the name of several townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 3,000.

SUTTON, Thomas, the founder of the Charter-house. He was educated at Eton College, and studied the law in Lincoln's Inn, but never followed that profession. Having purchased some estates in the county of Durham, he discovered coal-mines there, which produced him immense property. He also gained a large fortune by commerce and marriage. On the death of his wife, in 1602, he led a retired life; and, having no issue, he purchased the Charter-house, which he erected into an hospital and seminary of learning. B. in Lincolnshire, 1532; D. in London, 1611.

SUTTON-COLDFIELD, a town of Warwickshire, 7 miles from Birmingham. It has a church, gaol, workhouse, and a Latin and Greek school. Manf. Hardwares, gun-barrels, and tools. Pop. 5,000.

SUTULEGE, SUTLUJ, or SUDLEGE, sut'-ledj, a celebrated river of Hindostan, being the easternmost of the five rivers which are called the Punjab. It rises in Tibet, about lat. 30° 8′ N., and lon. 81° 53′ E., and, after a course of nearly 1,000 miles, joins the Chenab, 33 miles from Bhawlpoor.

SUVIA, soo'-ve-a, a name of Mogadore. (See MOGADORE.)

SUWANNEE, su-wa'-ne, a river of the United States, running through Georgia, and, after a course of 200 miles, falling into the Gulf of Mexico, in Florida, by numerous channels.

SUWAROFF, Alexander, soo-wa'-roff, a celebrated Russian general. He entered the army at the age of 17, and, after passing through the subordinate grades, became a colonel in 1762. He displayed the greatest bravery when serving under Romanzoff against the Turks, and having slain several janissaries with his own hand, he put their heads into a sack, which he laid at the feet of his general. In 1783 he compelled the Tartars of Kuban and Budziak to submit and swear allegiance to the empress; for which he was named general-in-chief. In 1787 he defeated the Turks at Oczakow, which place was taken by storm. In 1789 he attacked the Mussulmans with a very inferior force, and defeated them, near the river Rymnik, for which he was created a count of the Roman empire, and obtained the surname of Rymniski. By this victory he saved the prince of Saxe-Coburg and the imperial army. In the following year he stormed Ismail, wherein above 30,000 Turks were either killed or wounded, and 10,000 taken prisoners. Always laconic, he announced his success to the empress as follows: "Praise be to God, and praise be to you; the fortress is taken, and I am in it." Indeed, he was wont to observe that the pen was not a fit instrument for a soldier. In December, 1791, peace was concluded, and Suwaroff was loaded with honours. His talents were again called into action in the war of Poland, when he took Prague, where 30,000 Poles fell on the field of battle. This was followed by the fall of Warsaw and the partition of Poland. For these services he was made field-marshal, and obtained the grant of a large estate. When the emperor Paul entered into the war against France, in 1799, Suwaroff had the command of the army, with which he marched into Italy, where he was opposed by Moreau. Overpowered by numbers, the Russian hero effected a most brilliant retreat over the mountains of Switzerland, and, entering Germany, marched to Russia by order of his sovereign. For his services in this campaign, he was created a prince by the title of Italisky. He was, however, treated by Paul with great ingratitude, which is supposed to have deeply affected his spirit. He was held in the greatest respect by his soldiers, and, although he showed himself a brilliant tactician, he used to say that the whole of his system was comprised in the words, "Advance and strike." He was one of the few generals who never lost a battle. B. in Finland, 1730; D. at St. Petersburg, 1800.

SVEABORG, or SWEABORG, swe'-borg, or sve'-a-borg, a seaport and fortress on the Gulf of Finland, 3½ miles from Helsingfors. The harbour is capable of containing seventy men of war, and easily defended by batteries which sweep the channel forming the only entrance for large ships. It is formed by several small islands, of which the principal, called Wargoe, contains the arsenal, docks, basins, and magazines, for fitting out or repairing men of war. Pop. 4,000. In 1789 it was taken from Sweden by Russia; and in 1855 it was bombarded and destroyed by the allied British and French fleets, without the loss of a man on the side of the latter.

SVENDBORG, svend'-borg, a town of Denmark, on the island of Funen. It has shipbuilding-docks, a harbour, and an export trade. Pop. 4,000.

SWABIA. (See SUABIA.)

SWAFFHAM, swaff'-ham, a well-built market-town of Norfolk, 14 miles from Lynn. It stands on an eminence, and has streets diverging from a spacious market-place, a church, gaol, an assembly-room, theatre, and schools. Adjacent to the town is a racing-ground. Pop. 4,000.

SWAIN, Charles, swain, a modern English writer, known as the "Manchester Poet." He was educated for a commercial pursuit; and, after spending fourteen years in the office of his uncle, the proprietor of large dye-works, he abandoned commerce to acquire the art of engraving, which he afterwards practised as a profession. His first essay in poetry was made in 1828, at which time he produced a collection of lyrics, upon subjects of history and imagination. His later works were, "Beauties of the Mind;" "Dryburgh Abbey, an Elegy upon the Death of Sir Walter Scott;" "English Melodies;" "Dramatic Chapters;" and "Rhymes for Childhood." To evince their respect for him, his fellow-townsmen presented him with a testimonial. B. at Manchester, 1803.

SWAINSON, William, swain'-son, a modern English writer upon natural history, who also travelled in various parts of the globe, and made a large collection of objects in natural history. He was a voluminous writer; his principal works being, "Zoological Illustrations;" "The Naturalist's Guide;" several volumes upon natural history for "Lardner's Cyclopædia;" "Habits and Instincts of Animals;" "History and Natural Arrangement of Insects;" and a treatise on the "Natural History and Classification of Birds." In 1841 he emigrated with his family to New Zealand, where he continued to reside. B. about the commencement of the present century.

SWALE, swaile, a river of England, rising on the borders of Westmoreland and, after a course of 70 miles, joining the Ure, near Boroughbridge.

SWAMMERDAM, John, swam'-mer-dam, a celebrated Dutch naturalist, who was educated at Leyden, where he took his doctor's degree in medicine in 1667. He applied himself with great assiduity to the study of anatomy and of insects. In 1667, while pursuing a course of dissection at the hospital at Amsterdam, he invented a method of injecting the blood-vessels with a waxen liquid, which afterwards became solid; also a thermometer to ascertain the degree of heat in animals. Towards the close of his life, he embraced the mysterious dogmas of Antoinette Bourignon. His principal works are, "Treatise on Respiration;" "General History of Insects;" "The Anatomy of the Day-Fly," which latter cost him ten years of incessant application; and a treatise upon the "Natural History of Bees," "which," says Buchanan, "all ages, from the commencement of natural history, have produced nothing to equal—nothing to compare with." His valuable manuscripts on insects subsequently came into the possession of Boerhaave, who published them; but his museum was disposed of to various purchasers. The "History of Insects" has been translated into English by Thomas Floyd. B. at Amsterdam, 1637; D. 1681.

SWAN RIVER, the principal river in W. Australia, rising, under the name of Avon, near lat. 32° 30′ S., and lon. 117° E. It gave name to the first colonial settlement in W. Australia, founded in 1829. After watering several counties, it falls into the Indian Ocean, at a bay called Melville Water, in lat. 32° S., lon. 115° 42′ E.

SWANSEA, swan'-se, a market-town, seaport, and borough of South Wales, in Glamorganshire, standing on a beautiful bay of the Bristol Channel, on the river Tawy, in the midst of inexhaustible mines of coal and iron, 28 miles from Merthyr-Tydfil. By means of its harbour, and of the Tawy, it commands a ready outlet for these productions of the interior. The streets are numerous, and contain a large proportion of well-built houses. It is much resorted to during the summer for sea-bathing; and, to accommodate strangers, numerous elegant lodging-houses have been erected. Of the public buildings, there are the parish church, a handsome modern edifice, with a large square tower at one end; the castle, which has been converted into a poor-house; and a gaol, principally used for the confinement of debtors; a town-hall, royal and mechanics' institutes, news-rooms, infirmary, a commodious theatre, and schools. Manf. Immense establishments for working in iron, copper, brass, spelter, and tin: it has also potteries on a large scale, a soap-factory, breweries, distilleries, and rope-walks. Its principal trade, however, is in the export of coal; and it has floating docks. Pop. 25,000. Lat. 51° 37′ N. Lon. 3° 56′ W.

SWEDEN, swe'-den, the most N. country of Europe, forming the E. and larger portion of the Scandinavian peninsula, and one of the kingdoms composing the monarchy of Sweden and Norway. It is bounded E. by the Gulf of Bothnia and the Baltic, S. and W. by portions of the Baltic and by Norway. Coastline. About 1,400 miles, deeply indented with bays or flords, and studded with numerous low sandy islets. Political Divisions. Originally Sweden consisted of three kingdoms,—Gothland, Sweden proper, and Norrland, the last including Swedish Lapland. This distinction, however, is now abolished, and the whole kingdom divided into three regions, which are again subdivided into 24 laens, or districts. Area, 171,000 square miles. Desc. Mountainous in the W., but, in general, flat; and it is remarkable that along the whole road, from Gottenburg in the west, to Stockholm in the east, there is not a single acclivity of consequence till within a few miles of the latter. Climate. Less severe than might be expected in so high a latitude. In Stockholm the average of temperature throughout the year is four degrees higher than at St. Petersburg. The summers are hot, and spring is almost unknown. In the N. snow covers the ground for five or six months in the year; and the W. coasts are milder and more humid than the E. Rivers. Numerous. The principal are the Dal and the Clara, rising in the mountains bordering on Norway, and flowing into the Gulf of Bothnia and the Lake of Wener. The Angerman, the Umea, the Skelefiea, the Pitea, the Lulea, and the Torneo, are in Lapland. Lakes. Nearly one-eighth of the country is covered with lakes. The largest are the Wener, Wetter, and the Maeler, all in the S. provinces. In point of size, Wener is the third lake in Europe. Forests. Extensive. More than three parts of the country are under timber. The principal trees are fir, birch, with oak, elm, and beech in the more S. parts. Zoology. The domestic animals are the same as those of Britain. The others are, hares and foxes, beavers, wolves, and, in the cold provinces of the north, bears, the leming, and the reindeer. Water-fowl are abundant, and the mosquitoes are as troublesome as they are in tropical countries. Pro. Only about a fiftieth part of the country is cultivated. Agriculture is in a very backward state, but being improved. The plants are similar to those of Britain. Apple, pear, and cherry trees, grow but languidly; while berries of many different kinds are produced spontaneously, and spread luxuriantly. Wheat succeeds only in the southern provinces; oats are raised more generally, and in larger quantities; but rye and barley are the kinds of grain most frequently met with. Minerals. Abundant; comprising iron, copper, lead, coal, porphyry, some silver, and marble. Swedish iron is of superior quality, and its quantity is immense. Manf. Principally confined to articles of domestic use. They consist of woollens, cottons, paper, linens, sugar, and tobacco. Tanning is carried on to some extent, and distilling and brewing are followed, also shipbuilding; but the pottery, glass, woollens, sugar, snuff, and tobacco are merely sufficient to meet the home consumption. Education. General. The university of Upsal was founded in 1477, and has maintained a good character, particularly for physical science. The university of Lund is of much more recent date, and on a smaller scale. There are a number of high schools, whilst the scientific and literary societies of Sweden are numerous, and belong chiefly to Stockholm. In the schools of the lower classes, the method of mutual instruction prevails. Religion. Lutheranism. Army. 150,000. Navy. 10 ships of the line, 10 brigs, 8 frigates, 12 steamers, and about 300 small vessels. Gov. A constitutional monarchy. Pop. 3,500,000. Lat. between 55° 20′ and 70° 11′ 40″ N. Lon. between 11° 15′ and 24° 10′ E. The two kingdoms, Gothland and Svealand, of which Sweden once consisted, were united in the 13th century by the failure of the royal line in the former. In 1397, by the treaty of Colmar, Sweden became subject to Margaret of Denmark, who has been styled the Semiramis of the North, and who joined the three kingdoms in one. Gustavus Vasa asserted the independence of Sweden, and ascended the throne in 1521. He bequeathed the crown to his posterity, who continued to reign, and in general with distinction; but most of them, in particular Gustavus Adolphus, his daughter Christina, Charles XII., and Gustavus III., discovered a romantic spirit, approaching, in the case of Charles XII., to a degree of infatuation. This dynasty ended in a prince (Gustavus IV.) who had all the eccentricity, and hardly any of the talents, of his predecessors. In 1809, this last monarch engaging in undertakings totally beyond the resources of his people, was deposed; and next year Marshal Bernadotte of France was elected crown-prince, and, in 1818, as Charles-John XIV., ascended the throne. In 1814 Norway was annexed to Sweden. (See NORWAY.)

SWEDEN, a township of the United States, New York. Pop. 4,000.

SWEDENBORG, Emanuel, swe'-den-borg, a Swedish mystic, and founder of a sect, whose father was a bishop of the Lutheran persuasion, and president of the Swedish churches. In 1710 he set out upon a course of travel, which embraced England, France, and Holland; and at his return to Sweden was appointed assessor of the Metallic College, which office he held till 1747. He was ennobled in 1719. His scientific pursuits were highly honourable to him, and he published several excellent works, the principal of which was the "Regnum Minerale," printed at Leipsic in 1734. He also wrote a treatise on the "Position and Course of the Planets," and another on the tides. At length he abstracted himself from those studies, imagining "that he belonged to the Society of Angels, in which things spiritual and heavenly are the only subjects of discourse and entertainment." Filled with this notion, he put forth a number of mystical books on the New Jerusalem; on Heaven and Hell; Spiritual Influx; the White Horse in the Revelations, &c. His opinions obtained little notice in his lifetime, but since his death they have produced a sect; and several conventicles have been established in London and elsewhere, called New-Jerusalem Temples, in which the memory of Swedenborg is respected as that of a prophet. There is also in London a society for the express purpose of printing and circulating his works. The tenets of this sect are, that there is one God, who is no other than Jesus Christ, and that he "always existed in a human form; that for the sake of redeeming the world he took upon himself a proper human or material body, but not a human soul; that this redemption consists in bringing the hells or evil spirits into subjection, and the heavens into order and regulation. . . . Though they hold that there is but one God and one divine person, they maintain that in this person there is a real trinity, consisting of the divinity, the humanity, and the operation of them both in the Lord Jesus. They believe that there are angels attending upon men, residing in their affections; that temptation consists in a struggle between good and bad angels within men." For further information as to Swedenborg and the sect of which he was the founder, see Wilkinson's "Introduction to Swedenborg's Writings," and Hubert's "Life of Swedenborg, with an Account of his Writings." B. at Stockholm, 1688; D. in London, 1772.

SWEDESBOROUGH, sweeds'-bur'-o, a post-township of Gloucester county, New Jersey, U.S. Pop. 2,000.

SWEINEMUNDE, sve-ne-moon'-de, a maritime town of Pomerania, at the mouth of the Sweine, 36 miles from Stettin. It is the outport of Stettin, where large vessels unload their cargoes for that place. Pop. 5,000.

SWIECIANY, swe-tse-a'-ne, a town of Russian Poland, 45 miles from Vilna. Pop. 5,000.

SWIFT, Jonathan, swift, a celebrated divine and writer. His father, who held the appointment of steward of the King's Inns, Dublin, died a few months before the birth of Jonathan, leaving his widow in narrow circumstances. At the age of 6 years the child was sent to Kilkenny school, whence, in 1682, he was removed to the university of Dublin, the expense of his education being defrayed by his uncle. While at college, he paid more attention to history and poetry than to logic and the classics; so that he was denied his degree on his first application, and obtained it with difficulty on the second. At the death of his uncle, in 1688, he went to England, where he was hospitably entertained by Sir William Temple, who had married a relation of his mother's. During his residence with Sir William, who employed him as his private secretary, he formed the resolution of embracing the ecclesiastical life, and, having taken his M.A. degree, he was ordained, and obtained the prebend of Kilroot, in the diocese of Connor, worth about £100 a year. Disappointed of preferment in England, he accompanied the earl of Berkeley, one of the lords justices of Ireland, as his chaplain and private secretary; but he was again disappointed, and dismissed with the livings of Laracor and Rathbeggan, and the rectory of Augher, instead of the deanery of Derry, which had been promised him. He then settled at Laracor, where he rebuilt the parsonage-house, repaired the church, and discharged his parochial duties in an exemplary manner. About this time, Miss Esther Johnson, the celebrated Stella, came to reside near him. She was afterwards secretly married to Swift; but the latter would never acknowledge her as his wife; in consequence of which she broke her heart.

This amiable woman was the daughter of Sir William Temple's steward, and had been bequeathed a small independence by that gentleman. At the accession of Queen Anne, Swift embarked in politics, in hopes of preferment in England, which he again missed, and in 1713 was promoted to the deanery of St. Patrick's, Dublin. The death of Queen Anne closed all his prospects, and completely embittered his temper. He was for some time very unpopular in Dublin, but came at last to be revered as an oracle. One Wood projected a coinage of £108,000 of Irish farthings and halfpence, for which he obtained a patent. Swift immediately addressed a series of letters to the people, under the signature of "a Drapier," urging them not to receive this base coin; and so successful was he, that the patent was withdrawn. After the death of Stella, in 1727, he led a very retired life, and wasted much of his time in literary trifles, which were unworthy of his pen. In 1736 he was attacked with a dangerous illness, and subsequently led an almost secluded life. His ill-treatment of Stella having been mentioned, it is necessary to notice his conduct to the lady celebrated in his works under the appellation of Vanessa. She was the daughter of Mr. Vanhomrigh, a Dutch merchant, and had conceived a strong affection for the dean, which he seems to have encouraged. He left the greatest part of his property for the purpose of endowing an hospital for lunatics at Dublin. The poetical pieces of Swift are mostly of a humorous order, but some of them are sufficiently coarse. His prose style is remarkably clear and forcible. His principal works are—a satirical romance, called "Gulliver's Travels;" the allegory of "A Tale of a Tub," in which he ridicules Popery and Puritanism; and "Political Tracts against the Whigs." Upon the character of Swift as an author, an eminent critic observes: "No one is ignorant of his merits, and his faults are equally notorious. In grave irony he is second to none, and the writings of few are more deformed by obscenity and physical indelicacy. In his zeal for simplicity he often borders upon meanness, as his own Jack is represented to have disfigured his coat by rudely tearing off its superfluous decorations. In his serious style, although it is easy and perspicuous, he is excelled by many. Swift had great skill for versification, but most of his poems were designed only for the inspection of his private friends, and his muse is often sportive, and generally trifling. Poetry he cultivated without any view to fame or profit, but in order to solace a mind that preyed upon itself when unemployed. To his reputation as a writer of prose he was equally indifferent. Posterity however, has extended to him that renown which is often withheld from more eager claimants, and it would be vain to contest his right to be considered a British classic of the first rank." B. at Dublin, 1667; D. 1745.

SWINBURNE, Henry, swin'-burn, an English writer upon jurisprudence, who became proctor to the archbishop and judge of the Prerogative court at York. He wrote "Brief Treatise on Testaments and Last Wills;" "Treatise of Spousals, or Matrimonial Contracts." D. at York, 1620.

SWINDON, swin'-don, a market-town of Wilts, 29 miles from Bath. It has a respectable free school, and is a principal station of the Great Western Railway. Pop. 5,000.

SWINFORD, swin'-ford, a parish in Staffordshire and Worcestershire. It includes the town of Swinford. Pop. 21,000.

SWINFORD-REGIS, re'-jis, a parish of Staffordshire, 3 miles from Stourbridge. It has a parish church, and iron, glass, brick, and coal works. Pop. 28,000. Near it are the traces of a large Roman camp.

SWITZERLAND, swit'-zer-land (Germ. SCHWEITZ, shvites; Fr. LA SUISSE, swesse), a country of Central Europe, bounded W. by France, S. by Sardinia and Lombardy, and N. and E. by Germany. Political Divisions. These consist of twenty-two cantons, namely, Schweitz (from which the country takes its name), Uri, Unterwalden, Berne, Zurich, Lucerne, Glaris, Zug, Appenzell, Schaffhausen, Fribourg, Soleure, Basle, Grisons, Vaud, Ticino, St. Gall, Thurgau, Aargau, Neufchatel, Valais, and Geneva. In the management of their internal affairs, these cantons are entirely independent of each other. Ext. 216 miles long, with a breadth varying between 75 and 140. Area, 15,261 square miles. Desc. The most mountainous country in Europe, having the Alps not only along the whole of its southern and eastern frontiers, but throughout the chief part of its interior; the only extensive tract of level ground, or rather of vales, with mountains of more moderate height, being to the westward, in the cantons of Basle, Zurich, and part of Berne. Even there, however, the extreme frontier is formed by mountains, the Jura ridge extending in a long line from north to south. Of the valleys the most remarkable is that of the Rhone, which is at once the widest, and surrounded by the highest mountains. Mountains. The Alps, varying in height from 5,000 to 8,000, 10,000, 12,000, and even 15,777 feet. After Mont Blanc comes Monte Rosa. Mount St. Gothard, the Great St. Bernard, and the Simplon, are not equal in height to several mountains of the interior, such as Mount Cervin, the Jungfrau-horn, the Tursteraarhorn, the Furca, the Shreckhorn, the Wetter-horn, and the Gallenstock. The Alps branch out into a number of lateral chains, and exhibit at their base, on their ascent, and towards their summit, every variety of temperature and product; rich corn-fields or luxuriant pastures extending along the lower part of many of these mountains. The middle consists of pastures less productive, but containing a great variety of plants; while the summits are often composed of rocks, craggy, inaccessible, devoid of vegetation, and covered with enormous masses of ice and snow. (See ALPS.) Glaciers. The glaciers occupy the plains or hollows which separate the peaks of the highest mountains, being lakes of frozen snow, accumulated to a vast height, or rather depth, and detaching, from time to time, enormous masses, called avalanches, which roll down with a frightful noise. The formation of glaciers takes place near the line of perpetual congelation (about 8,000 or 9,000 feet above the sea); although, in a winter of unusual rigour, their ramifications extend considerably lower. In the long Alpine range are reckoned no less than 400, extending from 16 to 18 miles in length, by 1 or 2 in breadth. Their depth can with difficulty be ascertained; but is supposed to vary from 100 to 600 feet. The total extent of their surface has been calculated at 1,000 square miles. (See GLACIERS.) Rivers. Numerous, but rapid, and therefore mostly unnavigable. The principal are the Rhone, the Ticino, the Aar, the Rhine, with its tributaries, the Thur, the Limmat, the Reuss, and the Aar. Lakes. Numerous and beautiful. The principal are those of Geneva, or Leman, Constance, Neufchatel, Bienne, Zurich, Wallenstadt, Waldstadter, or Lucerne, Thun, and Brientz. Many of these have a blue appearance, owing to their great depth, whilst the scenery by which they are surrounded is distinguished for its great beauty. Climate. Extremely variable. Zoology. The summits of the Alps are frequented by the chamois, the wild goat, white and red foxes, and a kind of hare which, in summer, resembles the hare of Britain, but in winter becomes as white as snow. The bear, the wolf, and the marmot, are also found. Of birds, the eagle and the vulture appear, and the lakes abound with fish. Pro. Agriculture is followed principally in the valleys, where wheat, barley, oats, maize, flax, hemp, and tobacco, are produced. The fruits of most frequent occurrence are grapes, chestnuts, prunes, peaches, walnuts, and cherries; in the colder situations, apples and pears; and in the southern valleys, the almond and fig; the latter, however, in small quantities. Cheese, butter, tallow, hides, form the chief articles of export from the pastoral districts. After large cattle, the animals chiefly raised are goats, sheep, and hogs. Minerals. There are mines of silver, copper, iron, and lead, in different parts; also quarries of rock salt. Marble, porphyry, alabaster, crystal, and sulphur, are occasionally found in the mountains. The principal salt-springs are at Bex, in the valley of the Rhone. There are, besides, many mineral springs. Manf. Linen, lace, thread, woollens, and cottons; clocks and watches have long been staple articles at Geneva and Neufchatel; while leather, gloves, silks, porcelain, pottery, toys, tobacco, and snuff, are made in various places. Education. Very good, except in the S.E. cantons. Of the seminaries, the principal are the celebrated university of Geneva and the university of Basle. There are academies or colleges at Zurich, Berne, and Lausanne, and schools of high reputation in various towns. Race. Mostly Teutonic, but also Greek-Latin. The German, in various kinds of patois, is spoken by upwards of a million and a half; the French is spoken on the Jura, and on the table-land W. of the lakes of Bienne and Morat; and S. of the Alps the Italian is spoken. Army. 72,000, with a reserve of 36,000: total, 108,000 men. Rel. Protestant and Roman Catholic. Two of the early reformers laboured in Switzerland,—Zuingli us in Zurich, and Calvin at Geneva. Gov. A federal republic. Switzerland, though a republic, has never, like Rome or Athens, formed one great community: it is, and has all along been, a confederacy of petty states, differing greatly from each other in their respective constitutions. In some cantons the form of government is democratic; but in most it is oligarchic. The general concerns of the republic are managed by a general assembly or diet, composed of deputies from each of the cantons. Pop. 2,394,000. Lat. between 45° 50′ and 47° 50′ N. Lon. between 5° 55′ and 10° 30′ E.—The W. part of Switzerland was called Helvetia by the Romans, and the E., Rhætia. The confederation was first founded in 1308, by the three cantons Schweitz, Uri, and Unterwalden. In 1353 it increased to eight, and in 1513 it was composed of 13. This number was further increased till 1798, when the French Directory, occupying Lombardy on the one side and the Rhenish provinces on the other, determined to add Switzerland to their acquisition. Accordingly, they invaded it with a force which it was impossible even for the mountaineers to resist, and succeeded in new-modelling the Helvetic constitution. The treaty of Amiens provided for the evacuation of Switzerland by the French. It was invaded by Napoleon I., and reduced under his authority; but was emancipated by the victories of the allies in 1814. By the constitution of 1848, the federal assembly is composed of two divisions,—a national council and a senate.

SWITZERLAND, a county of Indiana, U.S. Area, 216 square miles. Pop. 13,000.

SWORDS, sords, a long irregularly-built town of Ireland, 8 miles from Dublin. Its principal buildings are a church, a barracks, and an endowed school. Pop. 1,300.—Here, in 1641, the first Irish army of "the Pale" assembled, before the commencement of the civil war in Ireland.

SYDENHAM, sid'-en-ham, a parish of Oxfordshire, 3½ miles from Thame. Pop. 400.—Also a chapelry of Kent, 8 miles from London Bridge. In 1854 the Crystal Palace was here inaugurated by Queen Victoria. It has a station on the London and Croydon Railway.

SYDENHAM, Thomas, an eminent English physician, who, in 1642, entered of Magdalen Hall, Oxford, but left that seat of learning when it became a garrison for Charles I. He subsequently returned to the university, and, after taking his doctor's degree, settled in Westminster, and became the first physician of his time. Dr. Sydenham was the first who introduced the cool regimen in the small-pox; and his writings on consumption, fevers, and nervous diseases, though brief, are universally esteemed. The best edition of his writings is that of Dr. Swan. B. in Dorsetshire, 1624; D. in London, 1689.

SYDENHAM, Floyer, a learned English critic. He translated some of the works of Plato into English, and was distinguished as much by his modesty and the gentleness of his manners as his erudition. He died under arrest for a trifling debt, contracted at an eating-house; a circumstance which gave rise to the founding of the literary fund for the benefit of authors in distress. B. 1710; D. 1788.

SYDNEY, sid'-ne, a city and capital of New South Wales, about 7 miles from the mouth of Port Jackson, in a cove, to which it gives name. It stands principally on two hilly necks of land, with a proportion of flat ground intervening. These form, together, Sydney Cove, which is one of the finest natural basins of water that can be imagined. The appearance of the town is rude and irregular, though it has been of late much improved. It covers a large space of ground in proportion to its population. It is well paved, lighted with gas, supplied with water by a tunnelled aqueduct of upwards of 2 miles long, and is defended by several forts. The houses are mostly of one story. The public buildings are, the government-house, churches for different denominations, Sydney College, a public library, barracks, post-office, court-house, custom-house, theatre, observatory, and colonial offices. It has, besides, a market-house, and several superior schools and academies. The harbour of Port Jackson is, perhaps, exceeded by none in the world. It is navigable for vessels of any burden for about 7 miles above the town, or 15 miles from the entrance, and possesses the best anchorage the whole way. It is also perfectly sheltered from every wind that can blow. Pop. Perhaps 50,000. Lat. 33° 51′ 7″ S. Lon. 151° 14′ E.—This place has risen into importance within the present century.

SYDNEY, the capital town of the British colony of Cape Breton, in a bay on the N.E. coast of the island. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 46° 18′ N. Lon. 69° 9′ W.

SYLBURG, or SYLBURGIUS, seel'-boorg, Frederick, a learned German classicist, who contributed to the Greek Thesaurus of Stephens, and wrote some poems in that language. His Greek Grammar and "Etymologicon Magnum" were highly esteemed. B. near Marburg, 1536; D. at Heidelberg, 1596.

SYLLA (Lucius Cornelius Sulla Felix), sil'-la, a famous Roman general, who was of patrician birth. In his younger years he possessed very limited means; but upon the death of the courtesan Nicopolis, who left him her fortune, as did also his stepmother, he was enabled to put himself forward as a candidate for those high places in the republic of Rome for which his birth and accomplishments entitled him. He joined the army under Marius, and accompanied him to Numidia as quæstor; but his military talents exciting the jealousy of that general, he left him, and entered the army of Lutatius Catulus. Being chosen prætor in B.C. 93, he was appointed to place Ariobarzanes on the throne of Cappadocia, which he effected. He afterwards terminated the war with the Marsi, for which he was rewarded with the consular dignity. He now aspired to the title of perpetual dictator; but met with a powerful opponent in Marius. However, after putting an end to the war with Mithridates, and conquering Greece, he entered Rome in triumph, and put to death all whom he considered as inimical to his ambitious views. The streets of Rome were filled with dead bodies, and those to whom he had promised pardon were inhumanly massacred. After reigning tyrannically, and altering the laws according to his own humour, Sylla, in 79 B.C., voluntarily resigned the dictatorship, and retired to his estate at Puteoli, where he spent the remainder of his days in debauchery with some of the most vicious of the common people. He wrote the Memoirs of his own life, which are lost. They are supposed, however, to have been made use of by Plutarch. B. 138 B.C.; D. 78 B.C.

SYLVANUS, sil-vai'-nus, a rural deity, who is generally represented as half a man and half a goat. The worship of Sylvanus was established only in Italy. He was sometimes represented holding a cypress in his hand.

SYLVESTER, Joshua, sil-ves'-ter, an English poet, who became a merchant adventurer, and was in great esteem with Queen Elizabeth and King James. Prince Henry, son of the last monarch, appointed him his poet-pensioner. He wrote poems, translated into English verse Du Bartas's "Divine Weeks and Works," and some pieces from Fracastorius. B. 1563; D. in Holland, 1618.

SYLVIUS ÆNEAS. (See PIUS II.)

SYMI, sy'-me, an island near the coast of Asia Minor, 15 miles from Rhodes. Ext. About 6 miles long and 6 broad. Desc. Mostly barren; but every piece of ground is cultivated. The whole inhabitants reside in the town, which is built near the top of a high rocky mountain. Pop. 7,000. Lat. 36° 30′ N. Lon. 27° 51′ E. —The GULF of the same name is an inlet of the Mediterranean, on the S.W. coast of Asia Minor.

SYMMACHUS THE SAMARITAN, sim'-ma-kus, a Christian of the Ebionite sect. He translated the Old Testament into Greek, a fragment of which remains. Flourished about 200.

SYMMACHUS, Quintus Aurelius, prefect of Rome, and consul in 391. He displayed great zeal for the re-establishment of paganism, but was opposed by St. Ambrose, and banished by the emperor Theodosius. A collection of his epistles is extant. Flourished in the 4th century.

SYMPHORIEN, ST., sim-for'-e-ă, the name of several parishes and towns of France, none of them with a population above 4,300.

SYNCELLUS, George, sin-sel'-lus, a monk of Constantinople, who wrote a history of the world from the Creation down to the reign of Diocletian, which he entitled "Chronography." It is valuable as furnishing a knowledge of the dynasties of Egypt. Flourished towards the close of the 7th century.

SYNESIUS, si-ne'-si-us, a primitive bishop, was a native of Africa, and the disciple of the celebrated Hypatia, at Alexandria, where he became a convert to Christianity. In 410 he was chosen bishop of Ptolemais, in which office he conducted himself in an exemplary manner. His epistles and homilies have been published. D. about 431.

SYNGHEM, sing'-em, a town of Belgium, in East Flanders, 10 miles from Ghent. Pop. 2,500.

SYPHAX, si'-fax, king of part of Numidia, who entered into an alliance with the Romans against the Carthaginians at the beginning of the second Punic war; but having espoused the daughter of Hasdrubal, he joined Carthage. He was defeated by Masinissa and Lælius, and conducted in triumph to Rome, where he died in prison, 203 B.C.

SYRA, sy'-ra, an island of the Grecian Archipelago, in the midst of the Cyclades, near Delos. Area, about 55 miles. Desc. Mountainous and fertile. Pro. Corn, silk, wine, figs, and cotton. Pop. 28,000. The capital is of the same name, and has a population of 14,000. It is a residence of the consuls of most of the European states, and a principal station of the Mediterranean steamers plying to and from Constantinople. Lat. 37° 22′ N. Lon. 24° 34′ E.

SYRACUSE, si'-ra-kuse (Ital. SIRACUSA, se-ra-koo'-sa), a city of Sicily, in the S.E., and possessing, in ancient times, a larger population than any of the Grecian cities, 30 miles from Catania. It was founded by a colony of Corinthians, about 736 years before the Christian era. The shape of ancient Syracuse was triangular, one side being formed by the sea, the other by a line of rock, the third by a strong wall. It consisted of four parts,—that called Ortygia, situate between the two harbours; Acradina, a more extensive quarter, extending along the sea-side from north to south; Tyche, an inland and equally large division; and finally, Neapolis, forming the western extremity of the city, and defended by a high and strong ground. At present, the only inhabited part is the south-east corner, containing Ortygia and part of Acradina. It is insulated, walled, and entered by drawbridges. The streets are regular, but narrow; the houses tolerably built. The cathedral, or principal church, is the ancient temple of Minerva. There remains also the ancient amphitheatre, of an oval form, above 300 feet in length and 200 in width. In 1810 a beautiful statue of Venus was dug out from among ruins; and there are many other remains of antiquity, such as baths, walls, gates, and the palace of sixty beds constructed by Agathocles. The harbour exists in all its beauty: it is capable of receiving vessels of the greatest burden, and of containing a very numerous fleet. Though at present entirely neglected, it might easily be rendered a great naval and commercial station. The exports are limited to wine, oil, hemp, nitre, and some wheat. It contains a citadel, Royal Academy, museum of antiquities, a public library, and numerous churches. Pop. 14,000. Lat. 37° 3′ N. Lon. 15° 27′ 3″ E. This city was taken by the Romans 200 B.C., and by the Saracens in 878. In 1639 an earthquake nearly destroyed it. It is the birthplace of Plato, Simonides, Zeno, Cicero; of Theocritus and Moschus, the poets; and of Archimedes, the philosopher.

SYRACUSE, a town of the United States, New York, 34 miles from Oswego. It has very productive salt-springs. Pop. 30,000.

SYRENS, sir'-rens, sea nymphs, who charmed so much by their melodious voice, that all who heard them forgot every other employment, and listened in rapt admiration till they perished of hunger. They were three in number,—Parthenope, Ligeia, and Leucosia, and they usually lived on a small island near Cape Pelorus, in Sicily. Some authors suppose that they were monsters having the form of a woman above the waist, and the rest of the body like that of a bird. The Syrens were informed by the oracle, that as soon as any persons passed by them without suffering themselves to be charmed by their songs, they should perish; and their melody had fascinated every voyager till Ulysses, informed by Circe of the power of the Syrens' voice, stopped the ears of his companions with wax, and caused himself to be tied to the mast of his ship, commanding that no attention should be paid to his orders, should he wish to listen to the fatal song. This precaution enabled Ulysses and his companions to pass the spot with safety. The Syrens were so disappointed, that they threw themselves into the sea and perished. The Syrens are often represented holding, one a lyre, a second a flute, and the third singing.

SYRIA, sir'-e-a, a large division, which includes Palestine, in Asiatic Turkey, lying along the coast of the Mediterranean, which bounds it on the west; while on the north Mount Taurus and its branches divide it from Asia Minor; and on the east is a vast and trackless desert, stretching northwards from Arabia. On the south is Palestine. Area, with Palestine, 50,000 square miles. Desc. The leading feature in the physical aspect of Syria consists in the great mountain-chain traversing it from south to north, and known, from its highest pinnacle near Tripoli and Bairout, under the name of Lebanon, or Libanus. Connected with Mount Casius, which stretches farther to the north, it forms a continued range, running into Mount Taurus on the frontier of Asia Minor. While Lebanon faces the Mediterranean, a parallel chain, called Anti-Libanus, looks eastward upon the Syrian desert. Thus Syria, in its inhabited districts, may be considered as a country of valleys, many of which are extremely fertile. Of these, the plains of Haouran in the E., Antioch and Aleppo in the N., and Sharon in the S., may be noticed for their richness. Rivers. The Jordan, Assy, or Orontes, and the Bekaa. Lakes. The principal are those of Genesareth and Huluah, both in the valley of Jordan. There are, besides, some smaller lakes near Damascus. Climate. Varied. Along the coast the heat is great, even where the mountains are covered with snow. In the N. and E. the climate is colder; but, at Aleppo, frosts are rarely severe. In summer, the samiel, a wind like the simoom of the desert, sometimes sweeps over the country, when earthquake-shocks are felt. Pro. Wheat, barley, maize, millet, lentils, and sesamum; cotton and the mulberry flourish on the coast, and silk is produced on the slopes of Lebanon. Its fruits are held in especial esteem, particularly the oranges of Tripoli, the figs of Bairout, and the pistachios of Aleppo. As we ascend the sloping sides of Lebanon, all the varieties of European climate are successively experienced. The vine is reared by care to great perfection; and silk and wines, which rival those of Italy and France, are produced. Olives and tobacco are also cultivated successfully, and to a great extent. The other products are sugar, indigo, scammony, and other gums. Madder is also produced, and the sheep form a principal part of the wealth of the inhabitants. Sponge is fished on the Mediterranean coast; but other fisheries are comparatively unimportant. The commerce of Syria is greatly impeded by the want of good roads. As it is the high road, however, from Bagdad, Mosul, and Erzeroum, to Mecca, it is traversed by caravans, carrying its own and the products of Asia Minor, Mesopotamia, and Persia, to be exchanged here for European manufactures and cochineal. Scanderoon, Tripoli, Saide, and other ports on the Mediterranean, are the residence of a few Frank merchants, and carry on a limited intercourse with Europe. Inhabitants. Few countries present a greater variety of population. Its open plains, separated by no defined boundary from Arabia, Persia, and Asia Minor, are, here and there, covered by the wandering population of these respective countries. Turks and Greeks form, as elsewhere, the basis of population in the cities. The only tribes which can be considered as appropriate to Syria are the tenants of the heights of Lebanon. The most remarkable of these are the Druses and the Maronites. The Druses live in a species of rude independence, and are the only people in this part of Asia who have any semblance of a free government. The Maronites are another people of Lebanon, inhabiting the mountain district which rises behind Tripoli. They are more orderly and peaceable than the Druses, and are Christians, having joined the Romish communion. The Mahometans are the most numerous in the secondary towns and the rural districts. Pop. 1,870,000, mostly Mahometans. Lat. between 31° and 37° N. Lon. between 34° 30′ and 40° E.—In the earliest periods of the Jewish history, Syria was formed into a powerful kingdom, having Damascus for its capital. Its most remarkable district, however, consisted of the sea-coast, entitled Phœnicia, in which commerce flourished to a degree unexampled in ancient times. After the conquests and death of Alexander the Great, Syria was erected by his lieutenant, Seleucus, into a separate kingdom; but, under Antiochus, it was reduced by the Romans. It then fell under the Saracen sway, and afterwards became one of the richest appendages of the Turkish empire. It has since been governed by Turkish viceroys, in the same corrupt and extortionate manner as other Turkish provinces. About the middle of the last century, the Turks were obliged to grant to Daher, a powerful Arabian sheik, an annual lease of his dominions, and then to confirm it to his successor, who was afterwards, however, attacked by the Turks and put to death. His successor was the celebrated Djezzar Pacha, who soon raised a power almost equally independent; but the savage energy of whose administration was not accompanied by the improving and protecting system of his predecessor. He joined with the British in resisting the invasions of Napoleon I. After the demise of Djezzar, the power reverted to the Porte, and Soleiman was appointed pacha. In 1861, in the district of the Lebanon, the old feuds between the Maronite and Druse populations broke out, and the result was a terrible slaughter on both sides. It is divided into the pashalics of Acre, Aleppo, Damascus, and Tripoli.

SYRMIA, sir'-me-a, the most E. county of Austria, Sclavonia, between the Danube and the Drave rivers. Pop. 110,000.

SZE-MA-KWANG, ze-ma-kwang', an eminent Chinese historian, who became public censor and historiographer to the emperor Jin-Tsung. He wrote a history of China upon the model of that of his great ancestor Sze-ma-tseen. (See the following.) A translation of a poem by this author, entitled "The Garden," is given in M. Huc's "Chinese Empire." His great ability was recognized by his sovereign, and he rose to be prime-minister. In 1267, his name, inscribed as the "Prince of Literature," was put up in the temple of Confucius. His great work has been translated into French by Mailla, and entitled "The Universal Mirror for Rulers,—a History of the Chinese Empire." B. about 1018; D. 1086.

SZE-MA-TSEEN, ze-ma-tseen', a celebrated Chinese historian, who composed a work entitled "Sze-ke," which embraced the annals of China from 2697 B.C. until about 100 B.C. Rémusat, the famous French scholar, praises this work for the "multitude of facts which it contains, the neat and lively manner in which they are related, the constant simplicity and unbroken dignity of the style." B. about 145 B.C.; D. about 80 B.C.

SZENTA, zen'-ta, a market-town of Austria, on the Theiss, 16 miles from Zombor. Pop. 14,000.—Here Prince Eugene gained a victory over the Turks, in 1696.

SZENTES, zen'-tees, a town of Hungary, in the county of Csongrad, near the Theiss, 30 miles from Szegedin. Pop. 23,000.

SZIVACZ, ziv'-ace, two villages of Austrian Hungary, 14 miles from Zombor. United pop. 7,000.

SZOLNOK, zol'-nok, a market-town of Hungary, on the Theiss, 54 miles from Pesth. Pop. 11,000.

SZOLNOK, BELSO or INNER, a palatinate of Transylvania, bordering on Hungary on the north. Area, 1,335 square miles. Pop. 110,000.

SZOLNOK, KOSCEP or MIDDLE, a county or palatinate of Transylvania, bounded by Hungary entirely on the north, and partly on the west. Area, 835 square miles. Pop. 50,000.

SZTANICSICS, stan'-i-chich, a market-town of Austrian Hungary, on the Bacs, 10 miles from Zombor. Pop. 5,000.

SZURUL, zoo'-rool, the highest summit of the Lower Carpathians, between Wallachia and Transylvania, near the Rothenthurm pass. Height, 7,547 feet above the level of the sea.

TAAS, tas, a fortified town of Arabia, 55 miles from Mocha. It has many mosques. Pop. Unascertained.

TAASINGE, tas'-ing, an island of Denmark, to the S. of Fuhnen. Area, 27 square miles. Pop. 4,500.

TAB, tab, a river of Persia, separating the provinces Fars and Khuzistan, and, after a course of 150 miles, entering the Persian Gulf, 20 miles from Hindian.

TABARI, Abu Jaafar Mahomet surnamed, ta'-ba-re, a celebrated Arabian historian, who produced a history of the world from the creation to 915. He likewise composed a treatise upon Mahomedan law, and a commentary upon the Koran. His history has been translated into French, Persian, and Latin. D. at Amol, Tabaristan, 839; D. at Bagdad, 922.

TABARIA, or TIBERIAS, ta-ba-re'-a, a town of Palestine, 27 miles from Acre, on the W. shore of the Lake of Tiberias. It is now in ruins.

TABARIA, LAKE OF. (See TIBERIAS.)

TABASCO, ta-bas'-ko, a department of the Mexican Confederation, having on its N. the Gulf of Mexico, E. the Lake of Terminos and Yucatan, and on other sides the departments Chiapas, Oaxaca, and Vera Cruz. Area, 10,500 square miles. Desc. Hilly; except on the coast, where it is low, marshy, and unhealthy. Pro. Maize, sugar-cane, timber, and dye-woods. Pop. 65,000.—A RIVER of the same name, which, after a course of 250 miles, enters the Gulf of Mexico in lat. 18° 35′ N.; lon. 92° 37′ W.

TABERNA, ta-bair'-na, a town of Spain, in Valencia, 4 miles from Valencia. Pop. 4,000.

TABERNAMONTANUS, Jacobus Theodorus, ta-ber'-na-mon-tai'-nus, a German physician and botanist, who became physician to the bishop of Spire, and to John Casimir, elector-palatine. In 1588 he produced the first part of his work, entitled, "The New Herbal." He likewise wrote a treatise upon mineral waters. B. about 1520; D. 1590.

TABLE-BAY, tai' be', an inlet of the Atlantic Ocean, in S.W. Africa. Cape Colony occupies its shores, with

Cape Town, at the back of which is Table Mountain. Lat. 33° 53′ 2″ S. Lon. 18° 24′ 5″ E.

TABLE ISLAND, the name of various small islands in the Pacific Ocean and Eastern Seas.

TABLE MOUNTAIN, a mountain of S. Africa, immediately S. of Cape Town and Table Bay. It is often seen with a cloud upon it, which has received the name of its "table-cloth." Height, 3,816 feet.

TABLE MOUNTAIN, one of the Alleghany Mountains, in the United States, 18 miles from Morganton. Height, 4,000 feet.

TABOR MOUNT, tai'-bor, a mountain of Palestine, 8 miles from Nazareth. It is believed by the Greek and Latin monks in its vicinity to have been the scene of the transfiguration. Height, 1,000 feet.

TABRIZ, or TEBRIZ, ta-breez', a city of N. Persia, in the province of Azerbijan. It stands in a plain amongst forest, and is about 3½ miles in circumference. It has fine gardens, a citadel, the remains of a mosque, numerous bazars, and caravanserais. It is an extensive entrepôt of trade between Persia, India, Russia, and Constantinople. Pop. 80,000. Lat. 38° 2′ N. Lon 46° 12′ E. This city is said to have been founded in the time of Haroun-al-Raschid.

TACAZZE, ta-kat'-sai, a great river of Abyssinia, rising near lat. 12° N., lon. 39° 30′ E., and afterwards joining the Nile near Goos, in lat. 17° 45′ N.

TACFARINAS, tăk-fa-ri'-năs, a Numidian chieftain, who commanded an army against the Romans in the reign of Tiberius. He had formerly served in the Roman legions. After he had defeated several of the generals of Tiberius, he was killed in a battle with Dolabella, B.C. 25.

TACHFIN, Abul Moez Abou Omar, tach'-fin, a famous Almoravid king of Morocco, who, during twelve years, sustained a struggle against the Christians in Spain. He succeeded his father in 1113; but perished by drowning three years later, while going to the succour of Oran.

TACHOS, or TACHUS, tai'-kos, a king of Egypt, in the reign of Artaxerxes Ochus, against whom he sustained a long war. He was assisted by the Greeks; but, having ridiculed Agesilaus, king of Lacedæmon, the latter joined Nectanebus against Tachus, who was defeated and compelled to save his life by flight. Reigned in the 4th century B.C.

TACITUS, Caius Cornelius, tăs'-i-tus, a celebrated Roman historian, of whose family or early life nothing is known. His first employment is said by some to have been as procurator to Vespasian in Belgic Gaul. He himself states that he was first promoted to a high post by Vespasian. Under Domitian he fulfilled the office of prætor, and that of consul under Nerva, A.D. 97. He displayed great eloquence at the bar, and is spoken of by Pliny the younger as the greatest orator of his time. It is, however, as an historian that he has acquired immortality. Of his histories, which originally comprised the period from the accession of Galba to the death of Domitian, only a part remains. His Annals were the most important of his works; but of these we have, unfortunately, lost a valuable portion. The treatise on the Manners of the Germans, and the life of his father-in-law Agricola, are perfect, and cannot be too highly admired; but his history of the reign of Tiberius may be considered as his master-piece. His Latin is remarkable for its purity and elegance; and his greatest strength lay in portraying character. His friendship with Pliny is proverbial. The English translations of Tacitus are those of Henry Saville, Murphy, and Gordon. One of the best editions of the original is that of Bekker, Leipzig, 1831, which contains the notes of Lipsius, who stands at the head of all the modern commentators upon Tacitus. B. about 54; D. it is supposed about 130.

TACITUS, Marcus Claudius, a Roman emperor, who was elected by the senate after the death of Aurelian, in 275. He displayed great wisdom in the administration of justice and the government of the state. He also instituted some excellent regulations for the reformation of the public morals; and he restored the senate to its ancient dignity. Tacitus was likewise distinguished as a warrior. He repelled the Gothic barbarians who had invaded the Roman territories; and he was preparing for a war against Persia, when he died at Cilicia, of a violent disorder, though, according to some, he was assassinated, A.D. 276. B. 206.

TACLAGUR, tak'-la-gur', a town of Central Asia, in the Himalayah, 110 miles from Gardokh. It has a large fair in October and November. Pop. Unascertained.

TACNA, tak'-na, a town of South Peru, 80 miles from Arica, on the Pacific. Its vicinity is fertile. Pop. 8,000.

TACORA, ta-ko'-ra, a mountain of S. America, in the W. cordillera of the Andes, Bolivia. Height, 17,000 feet. Lat. 17° 10′ S. Lon. 70° W.—Also a village of the same name at its base, 13,690 feet high.

TACQUET, Andrew, ta'-ket, a celebrated Dutch mathematician, who held the appointment of professor in the college of the Jesuits for fifteen years. He was the author of a treatise on astronomy and several important works on mathematics. B. at Antwerp, 1611; D. 1660.

TACUNGA, ta-koon'-ga, a town of Ecuador, S. America, Quito, 44 miles from Quito. Pop. 10,000, the greater part being Spaniards and mestizoes.

TADCASTER, tăd'-kas-ter, an ancient market-town of the West Riding of Yorkshire, on the Wharf, over which it has a bridge, 9 miles from York. It has a church, standing on the site of an ancient fortress. In the vicinity are stone-quarries. Besides the ancient church, here is also an hospital for twelve persons, and a free school. Pop. 3,000.—It has a station on the York and Harrowgate Railway.

TADMOR, tăd'-mor, a ruined city of Syria. (See PALMYRA.)

TAF, or TAAFF, tăf, a river of S. Wales, Glamorganshire, rising among the hills in Brecknockshire, and passing by the ancient city of Llandaff, and afterwards by Cardiff, towards the estuary of the Severn, which, after a course of 10 miles, it enters.

TAFFECHAN, taf-fe'-kan, a parish of S. Wales, 10 miles from Brecon, and now annexed to Llanthattan parish.

TAFFELNEH, tăf'-fel-nai, a fortified maritime town of N. Africa, Morocco, 30 miles from Mogadore. Pop. 3,000.—The CAPE of the same name is 5 miles to the N.W.

TAFFI, Andrew, taf'-fe, an Italian painter, who first introduced into his native country the art of painting in mosaic. This knowledge he acquired from some Greek artists who were engaged in executing mosaics at the church of St. Mark, Venice. With Apollonius, one of the best of these Greek artists, he entered into a close friendship, and together they produced some remarkable works, one of the best-known of which is that entitled the "Dead Christ," at Florence. B. at Florence, 1213; D. at the same city, 1294.

TAFILELT, taf'-i-lelt', one of the great subdivisions of the Moroccan empire, lying to the E. of Mount Atlas. It consists of a vast plain, presenting an unvaried surface, like the sea out of sight of land. It is used as a place of banishment for political offenders. Pop. Unascertained; perhaps about 600,000.—The TOWN of the same name is in lat. 31° 45′ N., lon. 4° 3′ W.

TAGANROG, tag'-an-rog', a town of European Russia, in the government of Ekaterinoslav, near the north-west extremity of the Sea of Azoph. It has a harbour and fortress, maritime and commercial courts, a naval hospital, and a lazaretto. Its port was formed by Peter the Great, and the emperor Alexander I. died here in 1825. Pop. 18,000.—The DISTRICT of Taganrog has a population of 77,000.

TAGAL, ta-gal', a Dutch residency of the island of Java, Pacific Ocean. It has iron-forges and a large fishing population. Pop. 240,000.

TAGES, tai'-jees, a grandson of Jupiter, was the first who taught the twelve nations of the Etruscans the arts of augury and divination. He was said to have arisen from a clod of earth turned up by the plough of an Etruscan labourer, and to have assumed human shape in order to instruct the Etruscans in that knowledge of omens and of incantations for which they afterwards became so celebrated.

TAGLIAMENTO, tal'-ya-men'-to, a river of Austrian Italy, in the government of Venice, rising in the Alps, and, after a course of 100 miles, entering the Adriatic Sea near its N. extremity. In the time of the French empire of Napoleon I. it gave name to a department.

TAGLIOCOZZO, tal'-yo-kot'-so, a town of Naples, on the Ismele, 20 miles from Aquila. Pop. 4,000.—In 1269 Charles of Anjou here defeated Conradin, and ended the rule of the Hohanstauffen dynasty in Italy.

TAGUS, tai'-gus (Sp. TAJO, ta'-ho; Port. TEJO, tai'-zho), the largest river of Spain, rising from a spring in the mountains of Albaracin, between Aragon and Old Castile, in lat. 40° 38′ N., lon. 1° 35′ W. Pursuing its course in a westward direction, a little inclined to the south, it passes the palace of Aranjuez, the cities of Toledo, Talavera, Alcantara, Abrantes, and Lisbon, and flows into the Atlantic 2 miles below Lisbon. Total length, 540 miles.

TAHITI, ta-he'-te. (See OTAHEITE.)

TAI, tai, or ti, the name of several cities of China, principally in the N. provinces.

TAIEF, taif, a town of Hedsjas, in Arabia, 58 miles from Mecca. Pop. Unascertained.

TAIN, tain, a parish and irregularly-built burgh, and the county-town of Ross-shire, Scotland, on the Firth of Dornoch, 24 miles from Inverness. The town is old, and has an elegant reading-room, an ancient tower, court-house, a large and elegant church, an academy, and a grammar-school. It has a retail trade, mills of various kinds, and an iron-foundry. Pop. of parish, 3,600; of town, 2,600.

TAIN, a parish and town of France, in the department of Drôme, opposite Tournon. In its neighbourhood excellent hermitage wine is produced. Pop. 2,700.—It has a station on the railway from Avignon to Lyons.

TAI-PING, ti'-ping, two cities of the first magnitude, and capitals of departments in the provinces of Nganhoei and Quang-si.

TAI-PINGS, or TAE-PINGS, the name taken to themselves by the enormous mass of Chinese rebels, from their chief, Tae-ping-wang. The rebellion, of which this personage is the head, sprang into existence in 1850, in the vast province of Quang-si, situate in the south-west of the empire. In this mountainous district, inhabited by a poor but sober and intrepid population, this extraordinary movement readily found followers, for here the power of the present dynasty of Mantchoo Tartars has never been able to uproot the veneration in which the old native Chinese, or Ming dynasty, has been held. The rebels seek to restore the Ming emperors, from whom their chief pretends to be descended. They forbid the use of tobacco, wine, and opium; and they are bitter opponents of the idolatrous religion of the empire. Their own religious belief is perhaps the most extraordinary fact of the whole movement: it would seem to be founded upon the Bible, but so overloaded and disguised by an admixture of Chinese ideas, that it can no more be said to be identical with Christianity than can Mahometanism or Mormonism. Indeed, Tae-ping, the founder of the faith, and the spiritual and physical head of the rebellion, may be characterized as a mixture of Mahomet and Joe Smith; for he appears to possess the fierce energy and the love of fire and sword of the one, combined with the half-crazed brain and the religious enthusiasm of the other.

TAI-TONG, ti-tong', a city of China, of the first rank, in Shansee, 155 miles from Peking.

TAI-WAN, ti-wan', the capital town of the island of Formosa, in the China Sea. It has two famous temples; but has decayed. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 23° 8′ N. Lon. 120° 22′ E.

TAI-YUAN, ti-yu'-an, a city of China, of the first rank, in Shansee, 230 miles from Peking.

TALAVERA DE LA REYNA, tă-lă-ve'-ra, or ta-la-vai'-ra dai la rai'-e-na, an ancient city of Spain, in New Castile, on the Tagus, over which there is a bridge of 35 arches, 36 miles from Toledo. It is surrounded by a fertile plain of vast extent, intersected by the river. Parts of the old ramparts are still in preservation; but they are little more than objects of curiosity. It contains several well-built churches, numerous convents, hospitals, has two public walks; but nothing can be poorer than the general appearance of the place. The dwelling-houses are seldom more than one story in height; the streets are badly paved, and are crossed by a number of narrow lanes. It has a classical, a theological, and a divinity school. Manf. Silk, soap, hats, and earthenware. Pop. 6,300.—This is a place of great antiquity, and contains many Roman monuments. It is noted for a battle fought in July, 1809, between the French army, commanded by Joseph Bonaparte and marshals Jourdain and Victor, and the allied force of British and Spaniards, under the duke of Wellington. The French were repulsed.

TALBERT, Francis Xavier, tal'-bair, a French writer, who was educated for the law, which he renounced for the ecclesiastical state, and obtained a canonry. His works are "Discourse on the Inequality among Men" (this was crowned by the academy of Dijon, in 1755), "Panegyric on St. Louis," elegies upon Bonnet, Montaigne, Cardinal d'Amboise, Chancellor de l'Hôpital, Philip, regent of France, and Boileau. He also wrote some poems. B. at Besançon, 1728; D. at Lemberg, 1803.

TALBOT, tal'-bot, a county in Maryland, U.S. Area, 336 square miles. Pop. 14,000.—Another in Georgia. Area, 451 square miles. Pop. 17,000.

TALBOT, John, earl of Shrewsbury. He displayed great valour in the reduction of Ireland, where he was sent in 1414, as commander-in-chief, by Henry V. Subsequently he went to France, and served under the duke of Bedford. In conjunction with the earl of Salisbury, he conducted the siege of Orleans, which he was, however, compelled to raise in 1429, by Joan of Arc. At the battle of Patay he was made prisoner; but recovered his liberty not long afterwards. He was for some time again in Ireland, and, on his return to France, he gained several victories, and took some strong places; so that his name became a terror to the French. He was slain at the siege of Châtillon, in 1453. B. at Bletchmore, Shropshire, 1373.

TALBOT, Charles, Earl, afterwards duke of Shrewsbury, was descended from the above. He was one of the first promoters of the revolution, for which he was created a duke, and made lord chamberlain, viceroy of Ireland, and high treasurer. B. 1660; D. in London, 1717.

TALBOT, Richard. (See TYRCONNEL, Duke of.)

TALBOT, William Henry Fox, a modern English writer, and the discoverer of the process of obtaining pictures upon paper by the action of light, called at first the Talbotype, but which was afterwards, together with other inventions, merged in the general term of Photography. In 1833, while engaged in obtaining drawings of the scenery upon the Lake of Como, by the aid of the camera-lucida, he was, in his own words, "led to reflect on the inimitable beauty of the pictures of Nature's painting, which the glass lens of the camera throws upon the paper in its focus," and upon the possibility of rendering these images permanent. Possessing some chemical knowledge, he was aware of the fact that paper could, by chemical agency, be rendered sensitive to the action of the sun's rays. Starting from this basis, he made a large number of carefully-planned experiments, and succeeded to an extent sufficiently satisfactory; but not wishing to make known his discovery before he had brought it to maturity, he delayed its publication until he saw the notification of the invention of the Daguerreotype given to the world. (See DAGUERRE.) This event, he stated, "in some degree frustrated the hope with which he had pursued, during nearly five years, this long and complicated but interesting series of experiments,—the hope, namely, of being the first to announce to the world the existence of the new art which has since been named Photography." There was, however, between the two processes, this difference,—Daguerre obtained sun-pictures upon metal plates, and Mr. Fox Talbot upon paper, both mediums being previously rendered sensitive to the action of light by chemical means. Again, both the French and the English inventor had only followed up a principle which had been previously announced by other chemists. These gentlemen were, however, the first to give a practical application to the principle. Daguerre completed his researches by the year 1839; but it was not until September, 1840, that Mr. Talbot brought his process to any great degree of perfection. He secured his invention by patent, and granted licenses to those who desired to make use of the process for commercial purposes. The new art was so greatly improved and extended by new discoveries, and so widely employed by private persons, that it was found necessary to induce Mr. Fox Talbot to surrender some portions of his patent, which, in the interests of science and art, that gentleman did. He continued his experiments, and greatly contributed to bring the art of photograpy to that point of perfection which it subsequently attained. He likewise gave an account of some experiments relative to the engraving of steel plates by means of photography. In this art, however, very much more satisfactory results were obtained by M. Niépce de Saint Victor. (See NIÉPCE DE SAINT VICTOR.) Mr. Talbot, at a subsequent date, made some attempts at deciphering Assyrian cuneiform inscriptions. He was the author, among other works, of—"Hermes, or Classical and Antiquarian Re-cian. He was gentleman of the chapel to Edward VI. and Queen Mary, and his salary is said to have been sevenpence-halfpenny a day. In the reign of Elizabeth he was appointed organist, in conjunction with his former pupil Bird, with whom he published a collection of hymns for church service. B. about 1529; D. 1585.

TALLYA, tal'-ya, a town of Hungary, 10 miles from Tokay. It has several Protestant and Roman Catholic churches. Pop. 6,000.

TALLYABO, tal-ya'-bo, one of the Xulla Islands, in the Asiatic Archipelago, separated on the E. by a narrow strait from the island of Mangolia. Ext. 100 miles long, with a breadth of 20. Lat. 1° 10′ S. Lon. 125° E.

TALMA, Francis Joseph, tal'-ma, a celebrated French tragedian, who made his first attempt upon the stage in his 20th year, which was pronounced a failure. He thereupon resumed the practice of the dental art, for which he had been educated. Four years subsequently he made another appearance as an actor; and, after two years' application to his new profession, he succeeded in winning universal approbation. He advanced rapidly, until he was acknowledged the best tragic actor in France. The first to perform the part of Titus in a Roman toga, he shortly afterwards carried out a total reform in stage costume. The emperor Napoleon I., and subsequently Louis XVIII., presented him with many flattering marks of their esteem; and, during his last illness, the audiences at the Théâtre Français required each evening to be informed of his condition before the performance was allowed to begin. He was pronounced as without a rival in seventy-one characters; among which were Coriolanus, Macbeth, Hamlet, Othello, Sylla, Cæsar, and Nero. While a child he had spent about eight years in England, and had thus acquired the elements of the English language, in which he sub-equently improved himself until he spoke it perfectly. The friend of John Kemble, he went to London in order to be present at the farewell performance of that actor. B. at Paris, 1763; D. at the same city, 1826.

TAMAN, ta'-man, an island in the S. of European Russia, in the government of Taurida. It is formed by the Straits of Taman, the Sea of Azoph, and the Black Sea. It has an import trade, and exports salt, wax, honey, and furs. Its inhabitants are few.—The ISLAND OF TAMAN has numerous mud volcanoes, and the GULF is to the E. of the Strait of Yenikale.

TAMAR, tai'-mar, a river of England, rising in Devonshire; and on being joined by the Tavy and passing near Saltash, it forms the noble harbour of Hamoaze, below Plymouth, falling into the sea at Mount Edgecumbe.

TAMAR, a river of Tasmania, or Van Diemen's Land, entering Bass's Strait 4 miles from Georgetown.

TAMAULIPAS, ta'-mou-le'-pas, a maritime department of the Mexican Confederacy, bounded on the W. by the Gulf of Mexico, on the N. by the Rio Bravo, and on its other sides by different departments. Area, 23,220 square miles. Desc. Mostly composed of vast plains, covered with innumerable herds of cattle and horses. Pop. Perhaps 120,000. Lat. between 22° and 27′ N. Lon. between 97° 20′ and 100° W.

TAMBACH, tam'-bak, a town of Germany, 10 miles from Gotha. Manf. Paper and iron goods. Pop. 1,500.

TAMBO, tam'-bo, a town of Peru, in the province of Calca and Lares, on the north shore of the river Quillabamba, 45 miles from Cuzco. In the vicinity is a mountain, on which is a fortress, which belonged to the Incas, built of large wrought stone, fitted together so artfully as to render the junction scarcely perceptible. Pop. Unascertained.

TAMBOV, tam'-bov, a government in the central part of European Russia, lying to the west of Penza and Saratov. Area, 25,000 square miles. Desc. Generally level, but here and there presenting an undulating appearance. Rivers. The principal are the Tzna and the Moksha. Pro. Immense forests, with rye, oats, and buckwheat. Large herds of cattle are fattened for both the St. Petersburg and Moscow markets, and the forests supply timber for shipbuilding. The horses reared are of a good breed. Manf. Woollens and tallow, and there are numbers of distilleries and different kinds of mills. Pop. 1,790,000. Lat. between 51° 20′ and 55° N. Lon. between 38° 30′ and 43° 30′ E.

TAMBOV, capital of the government, on the Tzna, 280 miles from Moscow. It has manufactures of woollen, canvas, linen, and alum. Pop. 20,000.

TAMBRE, tam'-brai, a river of Spain, in Galicia, rising near the edge of the Asturian mountains, and, after a course of 60 miles, falling into the Atlantic at Noya.

TAME, or THAME, taim, a river of England, which, after a course of 40 miles through Oxford and Bucks, runs into the Thames below Dorchester.—Also a tributary of the Trent, in Staffordshire.—Also in Yorkshire, which forms a part of the boundary between Cheshire and Lancashire, and, after a course of 18 miles, joins the Mersey at Stockport.

TAMERLANE. (See TIMUR.)

TAMIAGUA, tam-e-a'-gwa, a lake of Mexico, which is connected with the sea between the river Tampico and the Punta Delgada. Ext. 60 miles long, with a breadth of 20 at its widest part.

TAMLAGHT, tam'-laught, the name of several parishes in Ireland, Ulster, none of them with a population above 8,400.

TAMPA, BAY OF, tam'-pa, the largest in the Gulf of Mexico. Ext. 35 miles long, with an average width of 15. It is on the W. of the Florida peninsula.

TAMPICO, tam-pe'-ko, a river of Mexico, running, after a course of 200 miles, into the Gulf of Mexico.—Also a LAKE, or shallow lagoon, communicating on the E. with the Lake of Tamiagua.

TAMPICO, a seaport town of the Mexican Confederation, on the S. shore of the lake of the same name, 214 miles from Vera Cruz. It has military and naval hospitals, and well-supplied markets. Pop. 7,000.

TAMWORTH, tam'-werth, a well-built market-town and borough of England, in Staffordshire, at the junction of the Tame and Anker, 7 miles from Lichfield. Its church is supposed to occupy the site of a nunnery, and is a very spacious building, containing some fine monuments. It has, besides, several meeting-houses, an hospital, founded and endowed by Guy; and a grammar-school founded by Queen Elizabeth; other free schools, a town-hall, almshouses, assembly and reading rooms, market-house, and a bronze statue erected in 1852 to the late Sir Robert Peel. Tamworth castle is still in existence, and from the elevation of its site has an air of considerable grandeur. Manf. Cotton-spinning, calico-printing, lace, wool-stapling; and there are a number of breweries, tanneries, and a carpet-factory. Pop. 9,000.—It has a station on the Trent Valley branch of the London and North-Western Railway, here carried over the Anker by a viaduct of eighteen arches.

TANA-ELF, ta'-na-elf, the most N. river of Europe, and, after a course of 180 miles, entering the Arctic Ocean in lat. 70° 30′ N., and lon. 28° E.

TANAQUIL, or CAIA CECILIA, tăn'-a-quil, wife of Tarquin, fifth king of Rome. She was a native of Tarquinia, and so well skilled in augury that she persuaded her husband to go to Rome, where he was elected king. After he was murdered, she raised her son-in-law, Servius Tullius, to the throne. She was a woman of such liberality that the Romans preserved her girdle as a relic, with great veneration.

TANARO, ta-na'-ro, a river of Piedmont, rising near the Col de Tenda, in the S. Alps, and, after a course of 140 miles, falling into the Po, 10 miles from Alessandria.

TANCARVILLE, John de Melun, Count de, tan'-car-veel, a celebrated French warrior, who took part in the conquest of Prussia by the Teutonic Knights, and also fought against the Moors in Spain, against the English in Normandy, and elsewhere. John, king of France, nominated him grand chamberlain of the kingdom. Taken prisoner at the battle of Poitiers, he returned in 1358, and played a prominent part in the signature of the peace of Bretigny in 1360. He subsequently won the favour of Charles V., who appointed him governor of Champagne, Burgundy, and Languedoc. D. 1382.

TANCRED, tăn'-kred, a Sicilian prince, of Norman extraction, who accompanied Bohemond, prince of Tarentum, to the Holy Land. His exploits, true or fabulous, have been immortalized by Tasso in the "Jerusalem Delivered." His life, written by an old chronicler, is included in the historical memoirs of M. Guizot.

TANCRED OF HAUTEVILLE, a Norman baron, who fought under Richard the Good, duke of Normandy. His twelve sons were famous for their strength, beauty of person, and valour. Serlon, the eldest, accompanied William of Normandy to the conquest of England; William, another son, who was surnamed "Strong of Arm," became count of Apulia; a third member of the same family, Robert "Wiskard," or the "wise," won the dukedom of Calabria, and, after his brother's death, that of Apulia. This latter was the founder of the Norman dynasty of Sicily.

TANCRED, king of Sicily, ascended the throne in 1189, after the death of William II. He was soon afterwards attacked by the emperor Henry VI. of Germany, who, having married Constance, the aunt of William II., set up, in consequence, a claim to the throne of Sicily. Tancred defeated the German army, and retained his crown until his death, which occurred in the year 1194. The emperor subsequently became master of Sicily, and took prisoners, William, the infant son of Tancred, and his mother, Queen Sibylla, who had been appointed regent. The child was mutilated and deprived of sight, and Sibylla imprisoned in a convent. Thus ended the Norman dynasty of Sicily, which had reigned there for upwards of a hundred years.

TANEY, tai'-ne, a county of the United States, in Missouri. Area, 1,000 square miles. Pop. 5,000.

TANFIELD, tăn'-feeld, three hamlets of England, one in Cheshire and two in Yorkshire. The first has a population of 3,500, mostly employed in collieries. The others are small.

TANGERMUNDE, tan-ger-moon'-de(r), a town of Prussia, on the Elbe, 59 miles from Berlin. Manf. Woollen and linen goods. Pop. 4,200.

TANGIER, tăn'-jeer, a fortified seaport of Africa, in Morocco, situate on the Straits of Gibraltar, a few miles to the east of Cape Spartel. It is an ancient town, known under the name of Tinja to the Romans, who took it under Sertorius. In modern times it has been a subject of eager contest between the Moors and the Portuguese. It now subsists chiefly by supplying the British garrison of Gibraltar with cattle and vegetables. The bay of Tangier is encumbered by the ruins of the mole and fortification, and is not very safe during winter, in westerly winds. Pop. Perhaps 7,500. Lat. 35° 42′ N. Lon. 5° 50′ W.—In 1662 this place was ceded to England as a portion of the dowry of Charles II., and, in 1844, was bombarded by the French.

TANGIER ISLANDS, several islands of the Chesapeake, near the coast of Maryland, and opposite the entrance of the river Potomac.

TANIS, tai'-nis, a ruined city of Egypt, on an arm of the Nile, at its delta, 12 miles from Menzaleh. It has the remains of a large temple, and other remarkable monuments. The plain of San, or "Field of Zoan," where Moses performed his miracles, is now a desert waste.

TANJORE, tan-jor', a maritime district of the south of British India, in the presidency of Madras, having on its E. and S.E. the Bay of Bengal, and on its other sides Madurah and Trichinopoly. Area, 3,900 square miles. Desc. Exceedingly fertile, especially in the delta of the Cauvery. Pro. Maize, millet, oil-seeds, tobacco, indigo, fruits, and vegetables. An intricate and wide system of irrigation is here carried on, by means of the facilities which the Cauvery and its branches afford. Pop. 1,700,000, mostly Brahmins. Lat. between 9° 52′ and 11° 23′ N. Lon. between 78° 55′ and 79° 55′ E.

TANJORE, a celebrated town and fortress, and capital of the above district, 170 miles from Madras. Including the suburbs, it is nearly six miles in circumference. There are two forts, one of which comprehends the rajah's palace, in which is a group sculptured by Flaxman; the other containing one of the handsomest temples in the south of India, and a college, formerly a celebrated place of Hindoo learning. Pop. Estimated at 80,000. Lat. 10° 42′ N. Lon. 79° 11′ E.

TANN, tan, a town of Bavaria. (See THAUN.)

TANNA, tan'-na, a town and fortress of Hindostan, district of Bombay, on the island of Salsette. The fort, which is very strong, commands the passage between the island and the mainland. The town is straggling, but not large, although it contains several Portuguese churches.—Another fortress, situate on the Hoogly river, about 2 miles below Calcutta.

TANNA, an island in the S. Pacific Ocean, belonging to the group of the New Hebrides. It was discovered by Captain Cook, in 1774. Ext. About 22 miles in length and 10 in breadth. Lat. 19° 32′ S. Lon. 169° 44′ E.

TANNAH, tan'-na, a collectorate of the Bombay presidency, India, with an area of 5,477 square miles. Desc. Fertile; producing rice, wheat, sugarcane, and ginger. It is traversed by the Indian Peninsular Railway, which extends from the city of Bombay in the direction of the Western Ghauts. Pop. 816,000. Lat. between 17° 58′ and 20° 20′ N. Lon. between 72° 42′ and 73° 48′ E.

TANNER, Thomas, tăn'-ner, a learned English prelate, who received his education at Queen's College, Oxford. In 1695 he was elected fellow of All Souls, and consecrated bishop of St. Asaph in 1732. He wrote "Notitia Monastica; or, an Account of all the Religious Houses in England and Wales;" and "Bibliotheca Britannico-Hibernica." He also produced a new and improved edition of Wood's "Athenæ Oxonienses." He bequeathed a valuable collection of ancient charters, deeds, &c., to the Bodleian Library at Oxford. B. in Wiltshire, 1674; D. 1735.

TANSILLO, Luigi, tan-seel'-lo, an Italian poet, who spent a great part of his life in the family of the Marquis de Villafranca, viceroy of Naples, and is said to have been appointed judge of Gaeta. He wrote in his youth a poem entitled "Il Vendemmiatore" (or the Vintager). On account of its indecency, all his works were laid under an interdict; but, having afterwards presented another to the pope, on the "Tears of St. Peter," his holiness took off the prohibition from all his poems except the culpable one. B. at Nola, Naples, about 1510; D. about 1584.

TANTALUS, tăn'-ta-lus, a king of Lydia, son of Jupiter. He was father of Niobe and Pelops, by Dione, one of the Atlantides, and is represented by the poets as punished in Hades with an insatiable thirst, and placed up to the chin in the midst of a pool of water, which flowed away as soon as he attempted to taste it. There hung also above his head a bough, richly loaded with delicious fruit, which, as soon as he attempted to seize it, was carried away from his reach by a sudden blast of wind. He was thus punished either for theft, cruelty, and impiety, or lasciviousness; for the causes are variously stated.

TAORMINA, tă'-or-mē'-na, a seaport of the island of Sicily, in the Val di Demona, on the eastern coast, 26 miles from Catania. It is noted for its numerous churches and convents, some of which are profusely decorated with marble. Pop. 4,000.—It is built on the site of the ancient Taurominium, and has many remains of antiquity; amongst which may be noticed a theatre, capable of containing 40,000 spectators, and an aqueduct and reservoir, which supplied the ancient city with water.

TAOS, tă'-ose, a town of Mexico, in a county of the same name, on the Rio del Norte. Pop. 8,900.

TAOUKA, tă'-ou-ka, one of the Society Islands.

TAPANOOLY, tă'-pa-noo'-le, a district of the island of Sumatra, on the small island of Puchong Keechil, at the bottom of the Bay of Tapanooly, which, with the island of Mansalar, forms one of the finest ports in the world. Lat. 1° 40′ N. Lon. 98° 50′ E.

TAPAYOS, or TAPAJOS, ta-pa'-yose, a river of Brazil, in the province of Para, deriving its copious sources from numerous branches rising in the interior mountains of Brazil. It is one of those great rivers which come from the south to feed the Amazon. Its course is north for more than 600 miles, between the Chingu and the Madera, and it falls into the Amazon in lat. 2° 24′ 50″ S., lon. 55° W.

TAPPAHANOC, tăp-pa-hăn'-nok, a river and post-town of the United States, in Virginia, 43 miles from its mouth in Chesapeake Bay. The town has a good harbour and a custom-house.

TAPTEE, tap-tē', a river of India, rising near Baitool, in the centre of the peninsula, and entering the Gulf of Cambay near Surat. In 1837 an inundation of this river washed away 69 villages, by which 2,203 houses were destroyed, and 112 lives lost. The property was valued at £23,000.

TAR, or PAMLICO, tar, a river of N. Carolina, U.S., which, after a course of 160 miles, runs into Pamlico Sound, in lat. 35° 22′ N.

TARA, tai'-ra, a parish of Ireland, in the county of Meath, Leinster, 2 miles from Skreen. Pop. 422. The hill of this name was, in remote antiquity, a principal seat of the Irish kings. From it was originally brought the famous stone upon which the Scottish sovereigns were crowned, and which is now the chair of Edward the Confessor in Westminster. "The harp" which hung in its ancient castle forms a subject for one of the "Irish Melodies" of T. Moore.

TARA, ta'-ra, a town in Siberia, in the government of Tobolsk, on the Irtish, 135 miles from Omsk. It is inhabited chiefly by Tartars, who carry on a trade with Independent Turkestan and the Chinese. Manf. Leather, hats, and vitriol. Pop. 4,500.

TARANCON, ta'-ran-kone, an ill-built town of Spain, in the province of Toledo, 42 miles from Madrid. Pop. 5,000.

TARANTAISE, ta'-ran-taise, a province of Savoy, between Faucigny, Savoy proper, Maurienne, and Aosta. Area, 780 square miles. Pop. 40,000.

TARANTO, ta'-ran-to, or ta-ran'-to, an ancient town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, built on a small island in the Gulf of Taranto, 44 miles from Brindisi. It has a castle of some strength for the protection of its harbour, a cathedral, some other churches, convents, hospitals, a diocesan school, and an orphan asylum. Manf. Linen and cotton fabrics, and velvets. It has also a trade in olive-oil, fruits, and shell-fish. Pop. 18,000. This is the Tarentum of antiquity, reputed to have been founded 700 B.C. by colonists from Sparta. It was long a wealthy seat of commerce; but being reduced by the Romans in 209 B.C., it never recovered its importance.

TARANTO, GULF OF, a spacious bay of the Mediterranean, formed by the two S.E. and S.W. extremities of Italy. Ext. About 70 miles long, with an average breadth of 60. It receives numerous rivers.

TARAPOTO, tar'-a-po-to, a town of S. America, N. Peru, situate in a fine plain, 120 miles from San Jean-de-Bracamoros. Manf. Chiefly cotton cloths. Pop. 5,500.

TARARE, tar'-arc, a town of France, in the department of the Rhone, 21 miles from Lyons. Manf. Plain and figured muslins. Pop. 10,400.

TARASCON, ta'-ras'-kawng', a town of France, in the department of the Mouths of the Rhone, and on the Rhone, 12 miles from Avignon. It has a church, town-hall, court-house, and barracks. Manf. Woollens, silk, and stockings. It also exports wine, brandy, olive-oil, &c. Pop. 12,600.

TARAZONA, ta-ra-tho'-na, two towns in Spain.—1. On the Queiles, 50 miles from Saragossa. Manf. Leather and coarse woollen caps. Pop. 6,000.—2. In the province of Albacete. Manf. Printed cottons and handkerchiefs. Pop. 6,500.

TARBERT (EAST and WEST), tar'-bert, two inlets on the W. coast of Scotland, on opposite sides of the great S. peninsula of Argyleshire, and approaching each other to within 1 mile.

TARBES, tarb, a town of France, capital of the department of the Upper Pyrenees, on the Adour, 25 miles from Pau. It is surrounded by a wall and defended by an old castle. Its public edifices are the cathedral, the churches, the residence of the bishop, the theatre, and the hospital. Manf. Copper wares, cutlery, and paper. It has, besides, a national stud and an active trade in horses. Pop. 14,100.

TARBERT (EAST and WEST), LOCHS, tar'-bet, two inlets of the sea, on the opposite sides of the island of Harris, Outer Hebrides, Scotland. Ext. Nearly 6 miles long, and at their widest part about 5.

TARBOLTON, tar'-bole-ton, a burgh of barony and village of Scotland, Ayrshire, 8 miles from Kilmarnock. It has a church and a subscription library. Manf. Cotton, woollen, and linen fabrics. Pop. of parish, 3,000.

TARIFA, ta-re'-fa, a petty town of Spain, on the north side of the Straits of Gibraltar, and 15 miles from Gibraltar. It is defended by an old castle, built by the Moors. The inhabitants are mostly engaged in the tunny and anchovy fisheries. Pop. 8,000. This place forms an important military post to the Spaniards, and, in 1811, was successfully defended by the British against an attack of the French.

TARIJA, ST. BERNARDO DE, ta-re'-ha, the capital of a province of the same name, in South America, 80 miles from Cinti. Pop. 2,000.—The PROVINCE has an area of 12,000 square miles. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. between 21° and 22° S. Lon. between 62° and 67° W.

TARIK, or TARIF, Ben Zeyyad, ta'-reek, an Arab general, who, at the orders of Muza, governor of Africa, invaded Spain in 710, landing at the foot of the rock called after him Gebel Tarik, which subsequently became corrupted into Gibraltar. In the following year he defeated Roderick, the last of the Visigothic kings of Spain, in an engagement, wherein the king and the flower of his Gothic chivalry fell. Muza, becoming jealous of Tarik, cast him into prison; but he was released at the command of the caliph of Damascus. D. in obscurity, about 720.

TARKI, tar'-ke, a town of the Russian dominions, in Transcaucasia, on the W. coast of the Caspian, 70 miles from Derbend. It is inclosed by hills, and has a citadel. Pop. 8,000.

TARLTON, Richard, tarl'-ton, a celebrated English actor and jester. He performed at the "Bull," in Bishopsgate Street, the Judge's character in a play called "The Famous Victories of Henry V.," which was prior to that of Shakspere. Stow says he was constituted one of the queen's players in 1583. He was the author of a drama called "The Seven Deadly Sins," of which Gabriel Hervey speaks as a "most deadly, but most lively play." This play has been lost. Dr. Cave, in his work entitled "De Politica," says, "We have our Tarlton, in whose voice and countenance exists every kind of humorous expression, and whose eccentric brain is filled with quaint and witty conceptions." B. in Shropshire, date unknown; D. in London, 1588.

TARMA, tar'-ma, a town of S. America, Peru, about 100 miles from Lima. It has mineral springs, for which it is resorted to by invalids. Pop. about 8,000.

TARN, tarn, a river of France, rising in Mont Lozère, and, after a course of 220 miles, joining the Garonne, 3 miles from Moissac.

TARN, a department of France, formed of a part of the old province of Upper Languedoc, and adjacent to the departments of the Aveyron and Upper Garonne. Area, 2,234 square miles. Desc. Mountainous in the S.E., being traversed by branches of the Cevennes; in the other parts exhibiting a succession of undulating hills, interspersed with beautiful plains. Rivers. The Agout, Aveyron, and Tarn. Pro. All the usual cerealia, with various fruits. Cattle and sheep are extensively reared, and coal is worked. Manf. The principal are woollens and cottons. Pop. 365,000.

TARN-AND-GARONNE, a department in the S. of France, formed of portions of the old province Guienne, and surrounded by the departments Gers, Lot, and Lot-and-Garonne. Area, 1,373 square miles. Desc. Fertile in the plains; but generally exhibiting an undulating surface. Rivers. The Garonne, Tarn, and Aveyron. Pro. Wheat, barley, maize, hemp, flax, vines, chestnuts, and several fruits of a southern climate, as almonds and figs. Horses and mules are also extensively reared. Manf. Unimportant. Pop. 240,000.

TARNOPOL, tar'-no-pol, a town of Austrian Poland, on the river Sired, 84 miles from Lemberg. It has both Greek and Catholic churches. Pop. 17,000.

TARO, ta'-ro, a river of the north of Italy, which, after a course of 55 miles, falls into the Po, 6 miles from Casal-Maggiore.

TARPA, Spurius Metius, tar'-pa, a Roman critic in the time of Augustus. He was appointed, with four others, to examine in the Temple of Apollo the merit of poetical pieces and plays. Cicero and Horace mention him with honour.

TARPEIA, tar-pe'-ya, the daughter of Tarpeius, governor of the Capitol under Romulus. She betrayed that place to Tatius, the general of the Sabines, on condition of receiving what himself and his soldiers wore on their left arms, meaning their bracelets of gold. When Tatius entered the place, he threw his bracelet and shield on Tarpeia, in which he was imitated by all his followers; so that she perished under the weight. She was buried on the mount which was afterwards called by her name, and from which persons convicted of treason were precipitated.

TARQUIN THE ELDER, tar'-quin (TARQUINIUS, tar-quin'-i-us), according to early Roman history, the fifth king of Rome, was the son of Greek parents, and born in the town of Tarquinii, in Etruria. His original name was Lucumon, which he changed to Tarquinius on going to Rome, by the advice of his wife Tanaquil. (See TANAQUIL.) He so endeared himself to the Romans by the liberality of his manners, that Ancus Martius nominated him guardian of his children. The people, on the death of that monarch, placed, in 616 B.C., the crown on the head of Tarquin, who reigned with great moderation and popularity. He defeated the Latins and Sabines, and conquered Etruria. He increased the number of the senate, repaired the Capitol, which he ornamented with several elegant buildings, and formed aqueducts and subterraneous sewers. He also introduced several reforms into the constitution of the state. He was killed by assassins, set on by the sons of his predecessor, 578 B.C.

TARQUIN, surnamed Superbus, 'the Proud,' or 'the Tyrant,' was grandson of the preceding, and seventh and last king of Rome. He married Tullia, daughter of Servius Tullius, and at her instigation murdered his father-in-law, and seized the kingdom. His reign was tyrannical and extravagant, so that his subjects were about to revolt, when, to divert their attention, he engaged in a foreign war; but, while he was at the siege of Ardea, the infamous conduct of his son Sextus proved the ruin of his family. (See LUCRETIA and BRUTUS.) The Romans rose and shut the gates against Tarquin, who retired to Etruria. Tarquin subsequently found protection under the mighty Lars Porsenna, of Clusium. Several attempts were made by Tarquin to regain his kingdom; but, after the battle of the lake Regillus, in 496, when Aruns, his only surviving son, was slain, the old king abandoned the contest in despair, and, retiring to Cumæ, died there in 495 B.C. Niebuhr declares that the greater portion of the history of the Tarquins is fabulous. Macaulay, in his "Lays of Ancient Rome," makes use of the story of the Tarquins as the subject of two ballads,—"Horatius," and "The Battle of the Lake Regillus." The historian is of opinion that the history of the Tarquins, as we have it, has "been compiled from the works of several popular poets; and one at least of these poets appears to have visited the Greek colonies in Italy, if not Greece itself. . . . . Many of the most striking adventures of the house of Tarquin, before Lucretia makes her appearance, have a Greek character." He built the Capitol, purchased the famous Sibylline books, which he deposited in the threefold temple of Jupiter Juno and Minerva, erected by him.

TARQUIN, Sextus, son of Tarquin the Proud. Pretending to be a deserter from his father's army, he took refuge at the Latin town of Gabii, whose citizens became so charmed with him, that he was raised to the highest offices, and placed in command of the Gabian army. After putting to death or banishing the most distinguished men in the city, he treacherously surrendered it to his father. He violated the chaste Lucretia; whereupon Brutus roused the Roman people, and the family of the Tarquins were banished for ever. His father retired to Etruria, with his son Aruns; but Sextus returned to Gabii, where, his former faithlessness being remembered, he was put to death.

TARRAGONA, tar'-ra-go'-na, a seaport city of Spain, in Catalonia, near the mouth of the river Francoli, in the Mediterranean, 50 miles from Barcelona. It is built on a hill, and surrounded by walls with turrets, erected either by the Moors or by the Christians of the Middle Ages. It has a large and elegant cathedral, built in the Gothic style, archbishop's palace, seminary, hospital, academies of design and of naval architecture, barracks, and a theatre. Manf. Soap, spirits, coarse cloth, hats, and barrels, with an export trade in Barcelona nuts, wine, brandy, and almonds. Pop. 13,400. It was taken by Marshal Suchet in 1811.

TARRAKAI, BAY OF, tar'-ra-kai, part of the Sea of Japan, E. Asia, dividing the island of Saghalia from Manchooria. Ext. 400 miles long, with a breadth varying between 50 and 200.

TARRASA, tar-ra'-sa, a town of Spain, in Catalonia, 15 miles from Barcelona. Pop. 5,000.

TARREGA, tar-rai'-ga, a town of Spain, in Catalonia, 5 miles from Cervera. Pop. 4,000.

TARRYTOUN, tär'-re-toun, a village of the United States, N. York, on the Hudson, 26 miles from New York. Pop. 1,000. Near this place Major André, the English spy, was captured in the revolutionary war.

TARSUS, or TARSOUS, tar'-sus, a city of Asia Minor, on the river Cydnus, 18 miles from Adana. Its antiquity is great, as it is said both by Arrian and Strabo to have been founded by Sardanapalus. It was much favoured by Augustus, as well as Adrian, and rose to such celebrity as to rival in wealth and grandeur, as well as in the cultivation of literature and science, Athens, Antioch, and Alexandria. Hardly a single inscription, or monument of beauty or art, can now be discovered. The city is situate in a fertile plain, on the Cydnus. The houses are intersected by gardens and orchards; they seldom exceed one story in height, are flat-roofed, and mostly constructed of hewn stone, derived from the demolition of the ancient edifices. There is a castle, said to have been built by Bajazet, and it contains public baths, a number of mosques, several handsome caravanserais, and a small ancient church. The port is about seven or eight miles distant from the town. Its vicinity being productive of corn and cotton, these, with wool, goats' hair, wax, skins, hides, and hair sacks, it exports. Its imports comprise rice, coffee, sugar, and hardwares. Pop. Estimated at 8,000; but in winter this number is said to increase to 30,000. It is the birthplace of St. Paul, of the philosopher Athenodorous, and the Stoic Antipater.

TARTAGLIA, Nicholas, tar-tal'-ya, a celebrated Italian mathematician, who was the son of a porter, and was left an orphan in his sixth year. His surname is unknown; that by which he is called, signifying 'stammerer,' being a derisive epithet bestowed upon him in his youth, because of an impediment in his speech, which arose from his having been wounded in the mouth by a French soldier at the taking of Brescia, in 1512. After being employed as a tutor at Verona and Vicenza, he became professor of mathematics at Brescia, which place he quitted for Venice, where he held a like appointment. He composed a number of learned works upon natural philosophy, algebra, and military engineering. The algebraic formula which is called Cardan's rule, was, in reality, discovered by Tartaglia, who, after many importunities, consented to impart a knowledge of it to Cardan. The latter, in his "Ars Magna," published the rule, although he had made a solemn pledge to Tartaglia that he would keep it secret. Thereupon, Tartaglia challenged Cardan to a public disputation upon mathematical subjects. The disciple of Cardan, Luigi Ferrari, accepted the challenge. A public contest between the two was held at Milan; but when Tartaglia was triumphing over his rival, the spectators, anxious to preserve their townsman Ferrari from defeat, raised a tumult, which brought the sitting to a termination. He is said to have made the first Italian translation of Euclid; he likewise dedicated a treatise on mechanics, hydrostatics, and the art of fortifying places, to Henry VIII. B. at Brescia, about the commencement of the 16th century; D. at Venice, 1557.

TARTARY, or TATARY, tar'-ta-re, the name vaguely given to a most extensive region of Asia, occupying nearly the whole central part of that continent, interposed between Asiatic Russia on the north, and the great empires of Persia, Hindostan, and China on the south. The grand division of this extensive portion of Asia is into Independent Tartary and Chinese Tartary. Independent Tartary is bounded on the east by a chain of mountains called the Beloor Taugh, connected with the Indian ranges of the Himaleh, and the Mooz Taugh, and which separates it from Cashgar and the other districts of Chinese Tartary. On the south it has the country of Balk, or Bulkh (now forming part of the kingdom of Cabul), and the Persian province of Korassan; on the west it extends as far as the Caspian; while, on the north, it has the provinces of Oufa, Orenburg, and Tobolsk, belonging to Asiatic Russia. Since the time of Timur, the population and political state of this country have undergone an entire change. Chinese Tartary includes the whole territory contained between Hindostan and Asiatic Russia, and from the Eastern Ocean to the mountain boundary of Independent Tartary. Under the appellation of Tartars are comprehended many various tribes, having local names and characters, but who generally agree in following a pastoral life, living in tents in the open fields, without towns or villages. They delight in horsemanship, and have a breed of the finest horses in the world; whilst they subsist principally on horse flesh, and drink mares' milk. This race was known and celebrated in antiquity under the name of Scythians, a people who are described under the same warlike, rude, and pastoral features which now distinguish the tenants of the same regions, and who were formidable to all the civilized nations of antiquity. It was by them that the Roman power in Italy and in Constantinople was overthrown. In the 12th century Tartary became the seat of the most formidable and extensive empire that perhaps has ever been established. Zingis, originally an obscure Mongol chief, having succeeded in uniting under his standard all the neighbouring tribes, successively conquered China, Persia, and all Central Asia, from the Black Sea to the Eastern Ocean. His successors added Russia, and overran Poland, with part of Germany. Timur, a Tartar chief, conquered all Persia, broke the power of the Turks in Asia Minor, and established in India a dynasty which continued to reign and to form the most splendid court of Asia, till the close of the last century. China has always been subject to Tartar dynasties. For a long time, however, the power of this great race has been much on the decline, Russia having not only cleared her territory of it, but having annexed part of its territories to her dominion. (See TURKESTAN, CHINESE, and TURKESTAN, INDEPENDENT, MANCHOORIA, MONGOLIA, SIBERIA, &c.)

TARTARY, CRIM. (See CRIMEA.)

TARTINI, Joseph, tar-te'-ne, a celebrated Italian musician, who became so excellent a performer on the violin, that he was appointed master of the band in the church of St. Anthony, at Padua. His works are Sonatas, and a treatise on Music, which was translated into English by Stillingfleet. B. at Pisano, 1692; D. at Padua, 1770.

TARVER, John Charles, tar'-ver, a learned philologist. He was born in France, of English parents, who were thrown into prison, at the outbreak of war between England and France, in 1793. His parents contrived to effect their escape; but he was left behind until a favourable opportunity should occur to send him to his family. The French gentleman in whose charge he had been placed, educated him as his own son, and, in 1808, obtained for him an appointment in the "Administration de la Marine." He subsequently became secretary to the admiral of the fleet at Toulon, Brest, and other ports. On the conclusion of the war, he paid a visit to his family, and shortly afterwards, being resolved to settle in England, he resigned his post under the French government. He obtained the situation of French master in the grammar-school at Macclesfield. In 1826 he was nominated to a like post in Eton school, and retained it until his death. He produced a work of great importance, entitled "The Phraseological French Dictionary," and likewise published "Dictionary of French Verbs," "Lectures on French History," and revised editions of the French grammars of Levizac and Wanostrocht. B. at Dieppe, Normandy, 1790; D. 1851.

TASHKEND, tash-kent', a town of Independent Turkestan, on an affluent of the Jaxartes, 90 miles from Khokan. It has a garrison, mosques, and many public buildings. Pop. Perhaps 30,000.

TASKER, William, tas'-ker, an English divine and poet. His principal works are "Odes of Pindar and Horace, translated into English Verse," "Ode to the Warlike Genius of Britain," and "Letters on Physiognomy." D. 1800.

TASMAN, Abel Jansen, tăs'-man, a celebrated Dutch navigator, who, having distinguished himself in the service of the Dutch East-India Company, was commissioned by Anthony Van Diemen to explore the coast of the Australian continent. Tasman sailed from Batavia in 1642. He first discovered a land which he named Van Diemen, and afterwards the country now called New Zealand. In 1644 he set sail upon a second voyage, the results of which were carefully concealed by the Dutch government. But, says Flinders, "it seems to be the general opinion that Tasman sailed round the Gulf of Carpentaria, and then westward along Arnheim, and the northern coast of Van Diemen's Land. . . . This opinion is strengthened by finding the names of Tasman, and of the governor-general (Van Diemen), and of two of the council who signed his instructions, applied to places at the head of the gulf; as is also that of Maria, the daughter of the governor, to whom Tasman is said to have been attached." Nothing is known of the life of Tasman, neither his birthplace nor where he died. Flourished in the 17th century.

TASSIE, James, tas'-se, an eminent Scotch numismatist, who was bred to the business of a stonemason, but, happening to visit an exhibition of paintings at Glasgow, he resolved to become an artist. Still continuing to work at his trade, he studied drawing in his leisure hours. In 1766 he repaired to Dublin, where he found employment as a sculptor and modeller. In the same city he was introduced to Doctor Quin, who was engaged in making experiments in the art of imitating gems by means of coloured glass. Tassie soon afterwards became assistant to this gentleman, and made so much progress in his new employment that he was advised by Dr. Quin to make it his business, and to establish himself in London. He acted upon this suggestion, and, after struggling with difficulties for a time, he gradually attained a high reputation. By the year 1775 he had collected a large number of ancient and modern gems, of which he sold sulphur impressions, or pastes. In 1788 he was commissioned to execute a set of casts of his gems for the empress of Russia, as, at a later period, his nephew and successor supplied the emperor Alexander with a set of casts taken from the valuable coins which had formerly belonged to Dr. William Hunter, and of which he had become the proprietor. His pastes were very much used by the jewellers, who set them in rings, bracelets, &c. In 1791 Tassie published a curious but important work, in the shape of a catalogue of his collection, which at this time contained upwards of 15,000 articles. To this catalogue, which was comprised in two thick quarto volumes, was appended a treatise by Mr. E. Raspe, upon the art of imitating gems by means of pastes, as well as some valuable information respecting the history of engraving upon stones. Tassie obtained from the Society of Arts a prize for his successful imitations of ancient onyx. After his death, his business was continued by his nephew in Leicester Square. B. near Glasgow, 1735; D. in London, 1799.

TASSILON, duke of Bavaria, tas'-si-lon, who declared war against Charlemagne, by whom he was defeated and taken prisoner in 788. He was condemned to death by the General Assembly of the Franks, but the sentence was commuted into imprisonment for life.

TASSO, Bernardo, an Italian, and the father of the more illustrious Torquato Tasso. His poetical talents recommended him to the notice of the prince of Salerno, who appointed him as his secretary. He accompanied his patron to the court of Charles V. in Germany, to lay the grievances of the Neapolitan people before the emperor. But the prince finding Charles incensed against them, and fearing for his own safety, fled to France, whither he was accompanied by Bernardo Tasso. He subsequently returned to Italy, and was appointed governor of Ostiglia by the duke of Mantua. He wrote a poem upon the old Spanish romance of "Amadis de Gaula;" another, entitled "Floridante." His letters, in three volumes, have been published. B. at Bergamo, 1493; D. 1569.

TASSO, Torquato, tas'-so, a celebrated Italian poet. His father was secretary to Ferrante Sanseverino, prince of Salerno, who, being charged to represent to Charles V. the injustice of Don Pedro de Toledo, Spanish viceroy of Naples, was obliged to fly to France, and was accompanied by Bernardo Tasso and his son, who, though he was but nine years old, wrote verses on their misfortune, in which he compared himself to young Ascanius escaping with Æneas. Young Tasso was sent to Padua to study the law, and while there he wrote his poem of "Rinaldo," at the age of 18. In 1565 he was taken into the service of Cardinal d'Este, brother of the duke of Ferrara, with whose sister, the princess Eleanora, he fell in love. This fatal passion proved the source of that melancholy humour of which he was the prey during twenty years. The duke of Ferrara, however, was unaware of this poetical passion, and made Tasso his especial favourite. Quitting Ferrara, he went to his sister, at Sorrento; but his love for the princess becoming stronger by absence, he returned to the court of Ferrara, where, in the presence of the duke, he had the imprudence to throw a knife at one of the domestics of his patron, who ordered Tasso to be taken to a convent, and there confined, as a man deprived of his reason. Effecting his escape from this place shortly afterwards, he repaired to Naples, where for some time he enjoyed repose. After wandering over Italy in an erratic manner, Tasso, in 1579, returned to Ferrara, when, being refused admittance to the duke's presence, he uttered some contemptuous words as to the family of Este; whereupon he was arrested, and during seven years confined in the hospital of Santa Anna as a lunatic. At length he obtained his liberty, through the intercession of Vincenzo Gonzago, son of the duke of Mantua. In 1592 Pope Clement VIII., who was a great admirer of his talents, called him to Rome, where he was received with honourable marks of distinction; and great preparations were made for solemnly crowning him in the Capitol as the prince of poets, when he fell sick, and died on the evening before the intended ceremony. The work which has immortalized his name is the epic poem of "Jerusalem Delivered," which has been translated into English by Hoole, Fairfax, Hunt, and others. The best Italian edition is that of Professor Rosini, Padua, 1820. B. at Sorrento, Naples, 1544; D. at Rome, 1595.

TASSONI, Alexander, tas-so'-ne, an Italian poet. His "Secchia Rapita," or "Rape of the Bucket," a mock-heroic poem, was written on the occasion of the war between Modena and Bologna. Besides this, he wrote "Observations on Petrarch," and an abridgement of the Ecclesiastical Annals of Baronius. B. at Modena, 1565; D. at the same city, 1635.

TATA. (See DOTIO.)

TATARBAZAR, or TATAR BAZARDJIK, ta'-tar-ba-zar', a town of European Turkey, in Bulgaria, 14 miles from Philippopoli. Pop. 10,000.

TATARY. (See TARTARY.)

TATE, Nahum, tait, an Irish poet, who was appointed laureat in 1692. Tate wrote "Panacea," a poem on tea; ten dramatic pieces, a number of poems on various subjects, and, in conjunction with Brady, he translated the Psalms into metre. B. at Dublin, 1652; D. in London, 1715.

TATIANUS, of Syria, tai'-shi-ai'-nus, a Platonic philosopher, who became a convert to Christianity, and a disciple of Justin Martyr. He still, however, retained the Platonic ideas, and fell into dangerous errors, particularly that of Marcian, respecting the two supreme principles of good and evil. He rejected some of St. Paul's epistles, and formed a sect called the Encratites, or Continent. He was the author of a Harmony of the four Gospels, but nothing remains of his except an Apology for the Christian Religion, printed at Oxford in 1700. Flourished in the 2nd century.

TATIUS, tai'-shi-us, king of the Sabines, who, to revenge the rape of the Sabine women, made war upon the Romans, and, by treachery, obtained possession of the Capitol. (See TARPEIA.) The mediation of the Sabine women effected a reconciliation, and Tatius brought his subjects to reside at Rome, where he shared the government with Romulus, who is, however, supposed to have caused him to be murdered at Lavinium, 742 B.C.

TATIUS, Achilles, a native of Alexandria, who embraced the Christian religion, and wrote a "Commentary on the Phenomena of Aratus," which is extant; also a Greek romance, called "The Amours of Leucippus and Clitophon."

TATTA, tat'-ta, an ancient and celebrated city of Sinde, near the banks of the Indus, 50 miles from Hyderabad. Its principal edifice is a brick mosque, erected by Shah-Jehan. Its cemetery is ancient, and its climate unhealthy. Pop. Estimated at from 3,000 to 40,000.—This place is supposed to be the Patala of the historians of Alexander the Great.

TATTERSHALL, tät'-ter-shal, a market-town of Lincolnshire, 9 miles from Horncastle. It has a church, in the form of a cross, a beautiful and spacious edifice; also a castle. Pop. 1,000.—A station on the Great North Lincoln Railway.

TAUBATE, tou-ba'-tai, a modern town of Brazil, 80 miles from San Paulo. Pop. of district, 10,000.

TAUBMANN, Frederick, toub'-man, a learned German writer and poet, who became professor of poetry and eloquence at the university of Wittenberg. He was also appointed court-poet. He greatly contributed to revive the study of the Latin language, by producing a dissertation upon that subject, which was published a year after his death. He also edited the works of Plautus and Virgil, and enjoyed the reputation of being one of the wittiest men of his age. His poems, which were composed in Latin, are included in the Melodæsia, Columbæ Poeticæ, and other collections. B. at Wontees, near Baireuth, 1565; D. at Wittenberg, 1613.

TAUCHNITZ, Charles Christian Philip, touk'-nitz, an eminent German bookseller, and the director of a house established at Leipsic by his father towards the close of the last century. It owes its reputation to its editions of classical authors, correct in text, well printed, and of the most moderate price. His cousin Christian Bernard has published a collection of British authors, which has been extended to upwards of 400 volumes.

TAULER, or THAULER, John, tou'-ler, a celebrated German divine, who became a Dominican monk at an early age, and distinguished himself by his attainments in philosophy and mystic theology, of which school of divinity he was the founder in Germany. To him also is in great part due the creation of a German prose literature. A translation of his sermons into modern High German was published at Frankfort-on-the-Maine in 1825. B. either at Cologne or Strasburg, 1294; D. at the latter place, 1361.

TAUNTON, tawn'-ton, a market-town and borough of Somersetshire, on the river Tone, 12 miles from Bridgewater. It consists of four principal streets, with various minor ones branching off. The public buildings are the St. Mary Magdalene and St. James's churches, the market-house, the town-hall, with the free grammar-school, the assembly-rooms, the Taunton and Somerset Institution, with news-rooms, a valuable library, the theatre, hospitals, almshouses, infirmary, and other charities. St. Mary's church is a very elegant and splendid building, in the Gothic style of architecture. Part of the castle still remains, but is now converted to various uses. Manf. Coarse woollen goods, such as serges, corduroys, sagathies, druggets, shalloons, and silk. These, however, have greatly declined. Large quantities of malt liquor are sent to Bristol for exportation, and Welsh coal is imported. Pop. 14,200.—Taunton is a place of great antiquity, and numerous Roman coins have been found in its neighbourhood. It was a chief residence of the West-Saxon kings, especially of Ina. It was also the seat of the "bloody assize" of Judge Jeffreys after the battle of Sedgemoor. It has a station on the Great Western Railway.

TAUNTON, a river of the United States, falling into Narraganset Bay at Tiverton, opposite the north end of Rhode Island.

TAUNTON, a post-township of Massachusetts, U.S., on the river Taunton, 32 miles from Boston. Manf. Hardware goods. Pop. 10,500.—It is connected by railway with Boston and New Bedford.

TAURELLIUS. (See TORELLI.)

TAURIDA, or KRIM, taw'-re-da, a government in the south of European Russia, comprising the peninsula of the Crimea, a considerable tract to the north of the peninsula, between the Dnieper and the Berda; the island of Taman, and the land of the Tschernomorski, or Black-Sea Cossacks, lying to the east of the Crimea. Area, 25,000 square miles. Desc. Diversified with mountains, plains, and salt lakes. On the mainland it is nearly a desert steppe, entirely destitute of trees. Vast herds of sheep are reared by the Tartars, who live chiefly on millet and the produce of their herds. Pop. About 600,000. Lat. between 44° 25′ and 47° 40′ N. Lon. between 31° 30′ and 36° 30′ E. (See CRIMEA.)

TAURUS, taw'-rus, a mountain-chain of Western Asia.

TAUSAN, TAUSSEN, or TAGESEN, John, taus'-sen, a Danish divine, who, meeting accidentally with some of the writings of Luther, was so impressed by them as to proceed to Wittenberg, to study under the Reformer. Returning to Denmark in 1521, he preached sermons upon the new doctrines, and with so much effect, that Protestantism began to take root throughout the kingdom. In 1541 he was appointed Protestant bishop of Ripen. He was the author of a large number of controversial works. B. at Birkinde, in the island of Funen, 1494; D. 1561.

TAUSS, tauss, a walled town of Austrian Bohemia, 80 miles from Prague. Manf. Tapes chiefly. Pop. 6,500.

TAUSTE, tous'-tai, a town of Spain, in Aragon, on the Riguel, 170 miles from Madrid. Manf. Woollens, nitre, and soap. Pop. 4,000.

TAVAI POENAMMOO, ta-vai' po-en-nam'-moo, the native name of New Munster (Middle Island), New Zealand.

TAVANNES, ta-van', the name of an ancient family of Burgundy, which has furnished several distinguished personages to French history; the most celebrated being—

TAVANNES, Gaspard de Saulx, Lord of, an eminent French general, who, while a page to Francis I., was, with that monarch, taken prisoner at Pavia. He subsequently distinguished himself by his bravery at La Rochelle, in 1543, and at the battle of Cerisoles in the following year. Appointed to the command of the army, he took Metz in 1552, and, two years later, went to the succour of the Pope in Italy. He had a principal share in the education of the young duke of Anjou, afterwards Henry III. of France, and, in 1560, participated in the victories of Jarnac and Moncontour over the Protestants. For these services he was created a marshal of France. Always vehemently opposed to the doctrines of the Reformers, he has been charged with being one of the chief promoters of the massacre of St. Bartholomew. B. at Dijon, 1509; D. 1573.

TAVANNES, William de Saulx, Lord of, was the eldest son of the preceding. He became a zealous partisan of Henry IV., and distinguished himself in several battles. He wrote a work entitled "Historical Memoirs, from the year 1560 until 1596." B. 1533; D. 1633.

TAVANNES, Jean de Saulx, Viscount de, was the third son of the marshal, and brother of the preceding. He accompanied Henry III. to the siege of Rochelle, and to Poland. Returning to France, he became a prominent member of the Catholic league, was created a marshal of France, and pursued a military career until 1595, at which period he retired to his estates. He wrote a life of his father, which is sometimes entitled "Memoirs," but is totally independent of the memoirs of his brother William. B. 1555; D. about 1630.

TAVERNIER, John Baptist, Baron d'Aubonne, ta-vair'-ne-ai, a celebrated French traveller, who went through Turkey, Persia, and the East Indies six times. He acquired a large fortune by trading in jewels, with which he purchased the barony of Aubonne, and was ennobled by Louis XIV. His account of his travels is greatly esteemed, and has been translated into English. B. at Paris, 1605; D. at Moscow, 1689.

TAVIRA, or TAVILA, ta-vee'-ra, a seaport-town of Portugal, in Algarva, at the mouth of the river Segua, 140 miles from Lisbon. It is surrounded by a wall, and defended by a castle; has two churches, an hospital, and several convents. Pop. 9,000, mostly connected with fisheries.

TAVISTOCK, tav'-is-tok, a well-built market-town and borough of Devonshire, on the Tavy or Tay, 13 miles from Plymouth. The church is a spacious building, and the abbey was, at one time, a very magnificent building. Various fragments of it are still in existence, though mostly incorporated with other buildings. The other edifices are dissenting chapels, a guildhall, market-house, dispensary, almshouses, and a lying-in hospital. Manf. Serges, coarse linens; and there are mining and iron-works; but the population is chiefly agricultural. Pop. 8,100.—Sir Francis Drake, the celebrated navigator, was a native of this place.

TAVOY, ta-voi', a town of British India, in the presidency of Bengal, 25 miles from the sea, and 90 from Ye. It has a barracks for European troops. Pop. 10,000.

TAVOY, one of the Tenasserim provinces of India, with a mountainous surface intersected by fine valleys. Area, 5,000 square miles. It produces cotton, indigo, fruits, and tobacco, and is rich in tin and iron. Pop. 38,000. Lat. between 12° 44′ and 14° 50′ N.

TAW, taw, a river of Devonshire, rising in Dartmoor, and, after a course of 50 miles, joining the Torridge, and finally entering Bideford Bay.

TAWEE, taw-e', an island of the Asiatic archipelago, off the N.E. extremity of Borneo, and contiguous with the Sooloo-Island chain. Ext. 40 miles long, with a breadth of 15. Lat. 18° N. Lon. 119° 25′ E.

TAY, tai, one of the largest rivers of Scotland, rising on the frontiers of Lorn, in Argyleshire, and passing through Loch Dochart and Loch Tay. After being increased by various tributary streams, it runs to Perth; a little below which it turns to the east, and receiving the waters of the Ern, and passing through the Carse of Gowrie, it enlarges itself to about 3 miles broad; but contracts to 2 miles at Dundee, about 8 miles below which it opens into the German Ocean. Total course, from 120 to 160 miles.

TAY, LOCH, one of the most beautiful of the Scottish lakes, lies in Breadalbane, Perthshire. Ext. 15 miles long, and from 1 to 2 broad. It has occasionally been subject to extraordinary risings in its waters.

TAYLER, Frederick, tai'-ler, a modern English artist, who was considered as among the best water-colour painters. His transcripts of highland scenery, peasants, deer, and dogs, hawking and hunting parties of the 16th century, as well as a large number of illustrations for books, were characterized by great vigour and originality. "The Highland Larder—weighing the Stag;" "The Festival of the Popinjay;" "Unkennelling the Hounds;" and "The Vicar of Wakefield's Family going to Church," were his most ambitious pictures. D. near Elstree, Hertfordshire, 1804.

TAYLOR, tai'-ler, two counties in the United States. 1. In Kentucky. Area, 208 square miles. Pop. 7,500.—2. In Virginia. Area, 214 square miles. Pop. 5,500.

TAYLOR, Alfred Swaine, a modern English physician and chemical analyst, who at first studied his profession at the united hospitals of Guy and St. Thomas, but afterwards attended the lectures of Gay-Lussac, Orfila, and Dupuytren, at Paris. He was appointed lecturer on medical jurisprudence at Guy's Hospital in 1831, and in the following year became joint lecturer in chemistry at the same institution. He had previously passed his examination at the Society of Apothecaries, and had received his diploma as member of the Royal College of Surgeons. In 1848 he became a licentiate, and, at a subsequent period, a fellow of the Royal College of Physicians. Devoting himself to that department of his profession called Medical Jurisprudence, he produced some valuable works thereon, which occupy a high position in this country. He was also much employed in making post-mortem examinations and chemical analyses in cases of supposed poisoning. The evidence given by him at the trials of William Palmer and Smethurst was strongly opposed by other scientific men; but his talents as a chemical analyst have been generally admitted. B. at Northfleet, Kent, 1806.

TAYLOR, Bayard, an American author and traveller, who, in 1844, left his native country upon a course of travel in England, Switzerland, France, Germany, and Italy, an account of which he published after his return to the United States, in a work entitled, "Views Afoot, or Europe seen with the Knapsack and Staff." Attracting a large amount of attention, this work gave the young writer a position among the literary circles of his country. In 1846 he became one of the editors of the New York Tribune, in which journal he inserted a series of sketches of life in California. In 1851 he returned to Europe, and after travelling along the shores of the Mediterranean, went eastward and visited India, China, and Japan. He also sojourned in Syria, Asia Minor, Sicily, and Egypt, an account of these wanderings being conveyed, in a most lively and graphic manner, in his "Life and Landscapes in Egypt;" "Pictures of Palestine;" &c. B. in the state of Pennsylvania, 1825.

TAYLOR, Brook, a celebrated English mathematician and the discoverer of the theorem which bears his name. In 1701 he entered of St. John's College, Cambridge, and in 1708 wrote his "Treatise on the Centre of Oscillation." In 1709 he took the degree of bachelor of laws. He was chosen secretary to the Royal Society in 1714, and in the same year took his degree of doctor of laws. He published several elaborate works on mathematical subjects, the most important of which were—"Treatise on Linear Perspective," and "Methodus Incrementorum Directa et Inversa." B. at Edmonton, 1685; D. 1731.

TAYLOR, Henry, a modern English poet, who was engaged in the department of the Colonial Office, where he rose to a senior clerkship. His leisure was devoted to literature, and he produced several dramatic works in prose and verse, and a number of essays, which exhibited qualities of a very high order. The principal of these were—"Isaac Commenus," a play in verse, and in five acts; "Philip Van Arteveldo," a dramatic romance; "The Statesman," a work in prose; "Edwin the Fair," an historical drama; the "Eve of the Conquest," and other poems; the "Virgin Widow," and "Notes from Life," and "Notes from Books." B. early in the present century.

TAYLOR, Henry, an English divine, who wrote several learned works, as—"An Essay on the Beauty of the Divine Economy;" "Ben Mordecai's Apology for embracing Christianity;" "Thoughts on the Nature of the Grand Apostasy of the Christian Churches." D. 1785.

TAYLOR, Isaac, an English writer, who was originally a line-engraver, but subsequently became minister of an Independent congregation at Colchester, in Essex. He gave his children, several of whom were distinguished in literature, a careful training under his own superintendence. He was the author of—"Beginnings of Biography," "Scenes for Tarry-at-home Travellers," "Advice to the Teens," and other works intended for juvenile perusal. D. 1829.

TAYLOR, Isaac, a modern English writer, chiefly upon theological subjects. He was the son of the preceding, under whose superintendence he received a careful private education. At an early age he made a translation of Herodotus, and afterwards devoted himself to the composition of works which display deeply reflective habits and profound religious feeling as the characteristics of their author. His principal works were—"History of the Transmission of Ancient Books to Modern Times;" the "Physical Theory of Another Life;" "Spiritual Christianity;" the "Natural History of Enthusiasm;" the "Natural History of Fanaticism;" "Loyola and Jesuitism;" "Wesley and Methodism;" and the "Restoration of Belief." He likewise contributed many articles to the reviews. B. at Lavenham, Suffolk, 1787.

TAYLOR, Ann and Jane, English authoresses, and sisters of the preceding. They composed a number of works for juvenile reading of great merit. The chief of these productions were—"Essays in Rhyme;" "Contributions of Q.Q.;" "Display, a tale;" "Hymns for Infant Minds;" and "Original Poems."—Their uncle, Charles Taylor, wrote some essays upon biblical subjects, and produced an edition of Calmet's Dictionary of the Bible. D. 1821.—Ann Taylor, mother of Ann and Jane, was the author of "Maternal Solicitude," and other works.

TAYLOR, Isidore Justin Severin, Baron, a modern French antiquary and traveller, who was descended of an Irish family naturalized in France. His early education was designed to qualify him for a military career, but his own tastes were towards science and art. Instead of entering the Polytechnic school, he became the pupil of the painter Suvé; but, in a short time, he commenced writing art-criticisms for the Paris journals. About 1810 he set out upon a tour in Belgium, Germany, and Italy. Returning to France during the last disastrous days of the Empire, he was enrolled a sub-lieutenant of the Garde Mobile. Under the Restoration he served in the Royal Guard, and took part in the Spanish campaign; but, on attaining the grade of chef d'escadron, he retired from the army, having formed a resolution to devote himself to literature and the arts. In 1824 he was appointed royal commissioner of the Théâtre Français. Whilst holding this office, he introduced several improvements in the scenery and appointments of that stage, and it was to him that Victor Hugo owed the first representation of his "Hernani." The government of Charles X. sent him to Egypt to obtain the obelisk of Luxor and other rare objects of antiquity. After the revolution of 1830, Louis Philippe appointed him inspector of the fine arts; in which capacity he visited Italy, Sicily, Spain, Greece, Turkey, Asia Minor, Egypt, and Africa, bringing home from these countries a valuable collection of archæological treasures, which have found a place in the Louvre and other French museums. His most important productions were—"Voyages Pittoresques et Romantiques dans l'Ancienne France," in 20 vols., and a series of artistic works upon Spain, Portugal, the coast of Africa, Egypt, Switzerland, and Italy. He was a member of the Academy of Fine Arts, and a commander of the Legion of Honour. B. 1789.

TAYLOR, Jeremy, a learned English prelate, who was the son of a barber at Cambridge, where he received his education at Caius College, after which he entered into orders, and became so eminent a preacher, that Archbishop Laud procured him a fellowship of All Souls College, Oxford. He was also appointed chaplain to that prelate and rector of Uppingham, in Rutlandshire. In 1642 he received the degree of doctor of divinity from Charles I., whose chaplain he was, and to whose cause he adhered. After the defeat of the royalists, he retired to Caermarthenshire, where he taught a school for a livelihood. He afterwards went with Lord Conway to Ireland, where he wrote his "Cases of Conscience." Charles II., at his restoration, preferred Taylor to the bishopric of Down and Connor. In the same year he became privy counsellor and vice-chancellor of Trinity College, Dublin. Bishop Heber thinks that Jeremy Taylor was removed to a distance from court principally because he had been married to a natural daughter of Charles I., which circumstance might have given the exemplary bishop a plausible pretence for speaking plainly to the king upon many parts of his conduct. Bishop Taylor wrote, among other eloquent works, "The Great Exemplar, or the Life and Death of Jesus Christ;" "Holy Living and Dying;" and several sermons and controversial and pious treatises. "Whether," says Bishop Heber, in his life of the learned divine—"whether he describes the duties, or dangers, or hopes of man, or the mercy, power, and justice of the Most High; whether he exhorts or instructs his brethren, or offers up his supplications in their behalf to the common Father of all, his conceptions and his expressions belong to the loftiest and most sacred description of poetry, of which they only want what they cannot be said to need,—the name and the metrical arrangement." The works of Jeremy Taylor were edited and published by Bishop Heber in 1822. B. at Cambridge, 1613; D. at Lisburn, Ireland, 1667.

TAYLOR, John, commonly called "the water-poet." After going to school at Gloucester, where, he says, he could get no further than his accidence, which "gravelled" him, he repaired to London, and was bound apprentice to a waterman. Notwithstanding the laboriousness of this employment, he wrote a number of poetical pieces, for which he took the appellation of the king's water-poet. An enthusiastic royalist, he, upon the outbreak of the Revolution, went to Oxford, where he kept a tavern, which was much resorted to by the students. Taylor aided the royal cause by his satires and songs. When Oxford surrendered, he returned to London, and opened a public-house, setting up the sign of the "Mourning Crown." This, however, he was obliged to remove; on which he hung up his own portrait, with the following verses:—

"There's many a king's head hang'd up for a sign,
And many a saint's head too: then why not mine?"

He composed upwards of eighty pieces in prose and verse, which exhibit the workings of a vigorous but uneducated mind. These effusions contain many curious pictures of the time in which their author lived. B. at Gloucester, 1580; D. in London, 1654.

TAYLOR, John, a learned English critic, who was born in humble circumstances, but became, in 1730, fellow of St. John's College, Cambridge. He took his doctor's degree in the civil law, became librarian and registrar of the university, and an advocate in Doctors' Commons; but afterwards entering into orders, he was preferred to a canon residentiaryship of St. Paul's, and the archdeaconry of Buckingham. He published excellent editions of Lysias and Demosthenes, and wrote a work entitled "Elements of the Civil Law." B. at Shrewsbury, 1703; D. 1766.

TAYLOR, John, a learned dissenting minister, who produced a Hebrew and English Concordance, a work on Original Sin, and other theological treatises. D. 1761.

TAYLOR, Sir Robert, an English sculptor and architect, who was at first placed under Sir Henry Cheere, a sculptor. He subsequently studied for a short period at Rome, whence he was suddenly recalled by the death of his father. Thus thrown upon his own resources, he set up in business as a statuary, and meeting with some success as a sculptor of monuments for architectural purposes, he resolved to devote himself entirely to architecture. He soon found a great deal of employment, and, in 1756, was engaged, with Dance, to make alterations in old London Bridge. He added some wings to the Bank of England, erected the Stone Buildings and the Six Clerks' Office, in the vicinity of Lincoln's Inn. His villa for Sir Charles Asgill, and the seat of Lord Grimston, at Gorhambury, are among the best of his designs executed for private persons. He was very fortunate in his profession, and obtained the appointments of surveyor to the Admiralty, Bank of England, Greenwich Hospital, and the Foundling Hospital. While holding the office of sheriff of London, in 1783, he was created a knight. He bequeathed a sum of money to the university of Oxford, wherewith to found an institute for the study of modern languages. With these funds were erected the Taylor Buildings, at Oxford. At the time of his death he had realized a fortune of £180,000, though he was known to say that he began life with hardly eighteen pence. B. in London, 1714; D. in the same city, 1788.

TAYLOR, Rowland, an English divine and martyr, who is claimed as ancestor of Bishop Jeremy Taylor, by Heber. Archbishop Cranmer, whose chaplain Taylor was, appointed him to a living in Suffolk. Under the reign of Mary he was summoned to London, to answer the charges brought against him of having married, and refusing to celebrate mass in his church. He was condemned to be burnt at the stake; which sentence was carried out on Aldham Common, near Hadleigh, Suffolk, in 1552. "There is nothing," says Bishop Heber, "more beautiful, in the whole beautiful 'Book of Martyrs,' than the account which Fox has given of Rowland Taylor, whether in the discharge of his duty as a parish priest, or in the more arduous moments when he was called upon to bear his cross in the cause of religion. His warmth of heart, his simplicity of manners, the total absence of the false stimulants enthusiasm or pride, and the abundant overflow of better and holier feelings, are delineated, no less than his courage in death, and the buoyant cheerfulness with which he encountered it, with a spirit only inferior to the eloquence and dignity of the Phædon."

TAYLOR, Thomas, a learned English writer, whose services to English literature were immense; for he translated many of the great works of antiquity, which the professed scholars of England neglected, and, indeed, refused to reproduce in an English form. Though a poor man, his accomplishments were so highly appreciated by the duke of Norfolk, Mr. Meredith (a retired tradesman), and other liberal individuals, that he was enabled to print works which cost £10,000. Out of a long list of translations, may be quoted "The Hymns of Orpheus," "Plotinus on the Beautiful," the works of Plato, "Two Orations of the Emperor Julian," Pausanias's "Description of Greece," the works of Aristotle, Hederic's Greek Lexicon, Jamblichus's "Life of Pythagoras," and the "Metamorphoses" and philosophical works of Apuleius. B. in London, 1758; D. in the same city, 1835.

TAYLOR, Tom, a modern English dramatist and general writer, who received his earliest education at the Grange School of Sunderland, and, after spending two sessions at the university of Glasgow, in 1837 proceeded to Cambridge, where he was elected fellow of Trinity College. At a subsequent period he was appointed to the professorship of English language and literature at the University College of London. He was called to the bar as a member of the Inner Temple in 1845. In literature he distinguished himself as a humorous and keenly-observant contributor to the pages of "Punch," and as the author of a number of plays, many of which are certainly the wittiest, most elegant, and best-constructed works of the kind now to be found upon the English stage. The most popular of these dramatic pieces are "Still Waters run Deep," "The Victims," "The Unequal Match," "The Contested Election," and "The Overland Route." His artistic biographies of Haydon and Leslie are excellent. In 1850 he became assistant-secretary, and, in 1854, secretary of the Board of Health. He was a captain in the Whitehall corps of the Civil Service Rifle Volunteers. His wife set to music Tennyson's "Miller's Daughter," and other lyrics of the same writer, in a charming manner. B. at Sunderland, 1817.

TAYLOR, William, an English writer, who was designed for a commercial career, but during the process of his education, under the celebrated Mrs. Barbauld and upon the continent, he evinced so great a capacity for the acquisition of languages, as well as for mastering the intricacies of composition, that, upon his return from Germany, he was permitted by his parents to indulge his natural inclinations. When about 20, he commenced making translations from the German, in which department he afterwards acquired considerable distinction. His first publication of importance was an English reproduction of Bürger's "Lenora." In 1830 he produced a work, in three volumes, entitled, "A Survey of German Poetry," a fine selection of lyrics from the German poets. During the subsequent years of his life he continued to give translations from the German, most of which were inserted in the magazines and reviews of his day. To Taylor is unquestionably due the honour of first making the English reader acquainted with the literary treasures of Germany. B. at Norwich, 1765; D. at the same city, 1836.

TAYLOR, General Zachary, president of the United States of North America. He served in the war of 1812, and, for his defence of Fort Harrison, on the Wabash river, was raised to the rank of major; in 1819 he became lieutenant-colonel, having previously distinguished himself as commander at Green Bay, on Lake Michigan. In the Black-Hawk war, and in the Seminole war, he evinced as much tact as bravery in the execution of several harassing employments. In 1840 he was appointed to the chief command of the south-western division of the United States army. After the annexation of Texas, he was ordered to protect the new state from a threatened invasion from Mexico; but after remaining upon the defensive for several months, he proceeded westward, and having encountered the Mexican army under Santa Anna, numbering 20,000 men, he inflicted a signal defeat upon it at Buenavista, although his own force was not greater than 6,000. This decisive engagement led to the peace of 1848, after which he retired to his estate in Louisiana. In the same year, however, he was put in nomination and elected to the presidentship of the United States. B. in Orange County, Virginia, 1784; D. at Washington, 1850.

TAZEWELL, taiz'-wel, two counties in the United States. 1. In Virginia. Area, 1,000 square miles. Pop. 10,000.—2. In Illinois. Area, 704 square miles. Pop. 12,100.

TCHABKAN, or DJABKAN, tchab-kan', a river of China, in the county of Khalkas. After an estimated course of 500 miles, it enters Lake Ike-Aral-Nor, in lat. 48° N., lon. 90° E.

TCHAD, LAKE, tchăd, a lake in Soudan, Africa, surrounded by various states. Ext. 200 miles long, with a breadth of 140. Its height above the sea is estimated at 850 feet, and its mean depth from 8 to 15. Lat. between 12° 30′ and 14° 30′ N. Lon. between 14° and 17° E. (See the closing portion of our article AFRICA.)

TCHADDA, tchăd'-a, a river of Central Africa.

TCHANG-TCHA, tchang-tcha', a city of China, of the first rank, in Hou-quang, 742 miles from Peking.

TCHANG, tchăng, a prefix to the names of numerous towns and cities in China.

TCHATIR-DAGH, tchu'-teer-da, a mountain in S. Russia. (See CRIMEA.)

TCHAUSSYR, tchous-seer', a town of Russia, 25 miles from Moghilev. It has several churches, a Jews' synagogue, and a convent. Pop. 5,000.

TCHEBOKSARI, tche-bok'-sa-re, a town of Russia, on the Volga, 75 miles from Kasan. Pop. 5,000.

TCHERIKOV, tche'-re-kof, a town of Russia, on the Soj, 40 miles from Smolensk. Pop. Unascertained.—In 1708 the Russians repulsed Charles XII. here.

TCHERKASK, OLD, tcher-kask', a town of Russia, on the Don, 45 miles from Azov, where Peter the Great founded a church. Pop. 15,000.

TCHERKASK, NEW, a town of Russia, 14 miles from Old Tcherkask. Pop. 18,000.

TCHERKESSIA. (See CIRCASSIA.)

TCHERNIGOV, tcher'-ne-gof, a fertile government of S. Russia, with an area of 21,250 square miles, and a population of 1,440,000. Lat. between 50° 20′ and 53° 10′ N. Lon. between 30° 20′ and 34° 40′ E. It produces rye, barley, oats, flax, hemp, horses, and cattle.

TCHIN, and TCHING, tchin, the prefixes to numerous cities in China.

TRANO, tai-a'-no, a town of Italy, in the kingdom of Naples, 12 miles from Capua. Pop. 8,000.

TEARN, teern, a river of Staffordshire and Salop, which falls into the Severn.

TEATH, or TEITH, teeth, a river of Scotland, in Perthshire, taking its rise from two sources, uniting, and, after a course of 15 miles, joining the Forth at the bridge of Drip.

TEBALDEO, or TIBALDEO, Antonio, te-bal'-de-o, an eminent Italian poet, who composed in both Latin and Italian. He was a favourite with Leo X., after whose death, however, he fell into distress. His works consist of pastorals and epigrams. B. at Ferrara, about 1463; D. at Rome, 1537.

TECHE, tesh, a river of the United States, in Louisiana, joining, after a course of 180 miles, Lake Chatimaches.

TEGNER, Esaias, teg'-ner, the greatest poet of Sweden. After pursuing a brilliant career at the university of Lund, he became professor of Greek in that seat of learning, and, on taking orders, was appointed pastor to a congregation at Stafje. His works were collected in 6 vols., and published at Stockholm in 1847-8. His poems of "Frithiof," "Axel," and "The Children of the Lord's Supper," have been translated into English, the last in admirable version, by Professor Longfellow. B. in Sweden, 1782; D. 1846.

TEDLA, ted'-la, a province of Morocco, Africa, lying immediately to the W. of Mount Atlas.

TEDSI, ted'-se, a town of Morocco, Africa, in the province of Sus, 25 miles from Terodant. Its vicinity is highly productive. Pop. 14,000.

TEEN-TSIN, teen-tsin', a town of China, on the Pei-ho, at the commencement of the Grand Canal, 70 miles from Peking. It is a great salt depôt, besides being the seat of an extensive trade.

TEEREE, te'-re, a town of Beloochistan, province of Sarawan, 70 miles from Kelat, on the route to Shawl.

TEES, tees, a river running between the counties of York and Durham, and, after a course of 90 miles, joining the North Sea by an estuary 10 miles from Stockton.

TEESTA, tees'-ta, a river of Hindostan, rising in Tibet, and, after a course of 300 miles, joining the Ganges 40 miles from Dacca.

TEFFÉ, tef'-fai, a river of S. America, Brazil, joining the Amazon near Ega, after a course of 500 miles.

TEFLIS, or TIFLIS, tif'-lis (Native, tif-lees'), a city of Asiatic Russia, and capital of the kingdom of Georgia, standing on the banks of the Kur. It was founded in 1063. The streets are, without exception, narrow, and intolerably filthy in wet weather, and dusty in dry; but since it has passed under the dominion of Russia, it has been improved. Alterations have been made in the bazar, or great market-place for merchants, which has been totally roofed in, but with open circles left in the rafters, for the admission of air and light. On each side of this place are lines of shops of every description; such as fruiterers, grocers, barbers, cooks, mercers, saddlers, armorers, &c., all open, whose various articles are spread and displayed to the best advantage. Not far from the bazar is the public caravanserai, where merchant travellers take up their quarters. The residence of the governor-general is at a short distance from the body of the city, on the gentle slope of a hill, fronting the river, and commanding a fine view of the Caucasian Mountains. This building, with the arsenal, hospital, churches, and a few villas in the neighbourhood, with the streets and squares, forcibly remind one of its being a European city. The rest is purely Asiatic, but very different from the idea commonly received in Europe of that term — gay minarets, painted domes, and gilded trellis-work. Here is a collection of low flat-roofed dwellings, built of dun brick, mingled with stones and mud; the doors and windows exceedingly small; the latter covered with paper, glass being in little use, from its scarcity and dearness. Teflis has been long celebrated for its baths, which are situate at one extremity of the bazar. The citadel stands on the summit of a very high promontory. It exhibits a mass of ruins, grand and imposing. There are several fine churches, of different Christian persuasions, and one dedicated to the Roman Catholic mode of worship is among the most beautiful. The cathedral of Holy Zion, the great Armenian church, is more extensive, but does not equal its tolerated rival in richness and grace of architecture. The noble waters of the Kur roll near its base, increasing in rapidity and sound as they pour onward amongst the closing in of the bold cliffs which embank the stream. At this narrowed point, a bridge of a single arch connects the town with a considerable suburb, called Avlabar. It is chiefly inhabited by a colony of Armenians. Here also are the ruins of an ancient fort, church, and houses; and about two miles further from this side of the city, stand the remains of another sacred edifice of old times. The Russians have established various schools in the city, the commerce of which has considerably extended since it fell into their hands. Pop. Estimated at 50,000. Lat. 41° 41′ 4″ N. Lon. 44° 50′ 30″ E. —Since the conquest of the Russians, it has been the residence of their governor and commander-in-chief, who has always a great force stationed here under him. The Asiatic manners of the inhabitants have been greatly changed by their intercourse with their European conquerors.

TEFLIS, a government of Russia, one of the four into which Transcaucasia was divided in 1846. It is bounded on the N. by the Caucasus, on the N.E. by Derbend, E. by Shamachi, S. by Persia, N.W. by Kutais, and W.S.W. by Asiatic Turkey. Area, 30,000 square miles. It is composed of several circles, besides the territory called the Ossetian.

TEFSA, or TEFZA, tef'-za, a town of Africa, Morocco, the capital of the province Tedla. Manf.

Woollen mantles. Pop. 10,500, with the suburb Efza.

TEHAMA, te-ha'-ma, two maritime plains of Arabia, one extending along the W. coast from Ras Mohammed to Jiddah, a distance of 550 miles; the other from Batna to Babel-Mandeb, with a width of from 20 to 40 miles.

TEHERAN, te-ran', or te-rawn', the capital city of Persia, 210 miles from Ispahan, and 70 from the Caspian Sea. It is about 5 miles in circumference, surrounded by a strong wall, flanked by innumerable towers and a broad dry ditch. It contains no edifice of importance except the ark, which combines the character of citadel and royal palace. The Persian monarchs make it their residence, and it has numerous well-furnished shops and bazars. Manf. Carpets and iron goods. Pop. resident, 10,000; in winter, 60,000. Lat. 35° 40′ N. Lon. 50° 52′ E.

TEHUACAN, tai-wa-kan', a town of the Mexican Confederation, one of the most frequented sanctuaries of the Mexicans. It has four principal churches, besides convents. The streets, houses, and squares, are handsome, and it contains many families of Spaniards, mulattoes, and mestizoes, besides above 2,000 Indians. Pop. about 12,000.

TEHUANTEPEC, tai-wan'-tai-pek', a seaport-town of Mexico, in the intendancy of Oaxaca, 196 miles from Mexico. Pop. Perhaps 7,000. There is a very large open gulf of the same name in the front of the city.—The ISTHMUS of the same name is the narrowest part of the land separating the Gulf of Mexico from the Pacific Ocean, and is 130 miles across.

TEIFY, or TIVY, tiv'-e, a river of N. Wales, rising in Cardiganshire, and, after a course of 70 miles, falling into Cardigan Bay.

TEIGN, tain, a river of Devonshire, rising in Dartmoor, and, after a course of about 45 miles, falling into the English Channel at Teignmouth.

TEIGNMOUTH, tain'-mouth, a seaport-town of Devonshire, at the mouth of the river Teign, 12 miles from Exeter. It is a place of great antiquity, and now become one of the principal watering-places on the south-western coast. A small rivulet divides it into East and West Teignmouth. The principal resort of visitors is to East Teignmouth, where the public rooms are. The church of East Teignmouth is a venerable structure; the church of West Teignmouth was a very ancient stone fabric, built in the form of a cross, and was taken down, and a handsome octagon edifice erected in its stead. The chief trade consists in the exportation of pipe of potters' clay to Staffordshire, Liverpool, &c. A great number of vessels are also sent hence to the Newfoundland fishery. Pop. 5,200.

TEIGNMOUTH, John Shore, Lord, an English statesman and author, who commenced life in 1769, as a cadet in the service of the East-India Company. In a few years his acquirements in Persian and other Eastern languages obtained for him rapid promotion. He became the intimate friend of Warren Hastings, and accompanied the governor-general to England in 1785. In the following year he returned to the East, on becoming a member of the Supreme Council under Lord Cornwallis, the new governor-general. In 1793 he was created a baronet, for his services in aid of the judicial measures introduced by Lord Cornwallis, whose successor he became in the same year. He retained this high post until 1797, when he resigned, and was created Baron Teignmouth. He succeeded Sir William Jones as president of the Asiatic Society, and, subsequently to his return to England, produced the memoirs and correspondence of that oriental scholar. In 1807 he was created a commissioner for the affairs of India, and about the same time a member of the privy council. He was the author of a letter to the Rev. Christopher Wordsworth, on the subject of the Bible Society; and "Considerations on communicating to the Inhabitants of India the Knowledge of Christianity." B. in Devonshire, 1751; D. 1834.

TEILLEUL, tai'-yul, a town of France, in the department of La Manche, 8 miles from Mortain. Pop. 2,800.

TEILO, ti'-lo, a British saint. He founded a college at Llandaff, which was afterwards erected into a bishopric. There were several churches dedicated to him in Wales. Some authors have attributed to him a learned work upon the antiquities of his native country. Flourished in the 5th century.

TEISSIER, Anthony, tais'-se-ai, a French writer, who, at the revocation of the edict of Nantes, went to Prussia, where he was appointed historiographer, and obtained a pension. His most important works are—"Panegyrics on Learned Men;" catalogue, in Latin, of all the authors who wrote indices, catalogues, &c.; and translations from St. Chrysostom, Calvin, St. Clement, Sleide, &c. D. at Montpellier, 1632; D. at Berlin, 1715.

TEJUCO, tai-zhoo'-ko. (See CUIABA.)

TEKIN, Alp, te'-kin, the founder of the Ghaznavide dynasty, who was at first a Turcoman slave. He was appointed governor of Khorassan; but revolted against his monarch, and took Gazna, which he made his capital, and from which the dynasty he founded took its name. D. 975.

TELAMON, tel'-a-mon, a king of the island of Salamis, who was brother to Peleus, and father to Teucer and Ajax. He fled from Megara, his native country, after he had accidentally killed his brother Phocus while playing with the quoit, and took refuge at Salamis. He accompanied Jason in his expedition to Colchis, and was armbearer to Hercules, when that hero took Laomedon prisoner, and destroyed Troy. Telamon was rewarded by Hercules for his services with the hand of Hesione, whom the conqueror had obtained among the spoils of Troy; and with her he returned to Greece.

TELCHINES, tel-ki'-nees, a people of Rhodes, who were the first who raised statues to the gods. According to Ovid, they had the power of changing themselves into whatever shape they pleased, could poison and fascinate all objects with their eyes, and cause rain and hail to fall at pleasure. They insulted Venus, for which the goddess inspired them with a sudden fury, so that they committed the grossest crimes. Jupiter destroyed them all by a deluge.

TELECLIDES, tel-e-kli'-dees, an eminent Athenian comic poet, who flourished in the time of Pericles.

TELEGONUS, te-leg'-o-nus, a son of Ulysses and Circe. He went to Ithaca in search of his father, but was shipwrecked on the coast; and, being destitute of provisions, he plundered some of the inhabitants of the island. Ulysses and Telemachus went to defend the property of their subjects; a quarrel arose, and Telegonus killed Ulysses without knowing him to be his father. Telegonus afterwards returned to his native country, and carried thither his father's body, where he was buried. Telemachus also accompanied him in his return. Telegonus had a son called Italus, who gave his name to Italy.

TELEMACHUS, te-lem'-a-kus, a son of Ulysses and Penelope. He was still in the cradle when his father went, with the rest of the Greeks, to the Trojan war. At the end of this war, Telemachus, anxious to see his father, went to seek him, and visited the court of Menelaus and Nestor to obtain information. After his return, the suitors of his mother Penelope conspired to murder him; but he avoided their snares, and, by means of Minerva, discovered his father, who had arrived in the island two days before him, and was then in the house of Eumæus, a swineherd. With this faithful servant and Ulysses, Telemachus delivered his mother from the importunities of her suitors. After the death of his father, Telemachus went to the island of Ææa, where he married Circe, or, according to others, Cassiphone, the daughter of Circe, by whom he had a son called Latinus. Telemachus was accompanied in his visit to Nestor and Menelaus by the goddess of wisdom under the form of Mentor. The story of Telemachus, taken from Homer's "Odyssey," was used as the subject of a celebrated moral romance by Fénélon.

TELEMANN, George Philip, tel'-e-man, an eminent German musician, who early in life gave promise of that future excellence as a composer which his performances during manhood fulfilled. As composer to the Lyric Theatre at Hamburg, he produced thirty fine operas; and, according to Dr. Burney, he composed 600 overtures. He was the companion of the great Handel during the student days of the young men. Although few of his works are generally known in England, they are admitted by competent critics to abound in substantial beauties. B. at Magdeburg, 1681; D. 1767.

TELEPHUS, tel'-e-fus, a king of Mysia, son of Hercules and Auge. He was exposed as soon as born, on Mount Parthenius; but his life was preserved by a goat, and by some shepherds. He married one of the daughters of Priam, king of Troy, whom he assisted against the Greeks, and would have defeated them, had not Achilles, with the aid of Bacchus, been enabled to wound him severely. At the suggestion of Ulysses, who wished to gain over Telephus to the Greek cause, the wound was cured by the application of some rust from the point of the spear which had caused the hurt. It is said that Telephus showed himself so grateful to the Greeks, that he fought with them against his father-in-law.

TELFORD, Thomas, tel'-ford, a celebrated Scotch civil engineer, who was the son of a shepherd in Dumfriesshire, and, after receiving some little education in the parish school of Westerkirk, was, in his 14th year, apprenticed to a stonemason. He continued to work at this business in the rural districts of Scotland, and at Edinburgh, until about the year 1782, when he repaired to London, and found employment upon the quadrangle of Somerset House, then in course of erection under Sir William Chambers. Devoting his spare time to the study of architecture and drawing, he was, in 1784, intrusted with the construction of a house for the resident commissioner in Portsmouth dockyard. He remained there during three years, gaining considerable experience relative to the engineering works of a dockyard. His talents were discerned by some members of the Johnstone family, who resided near his native place, and, through their influence, he was appointed to superintend some alterations in the castle, and afterwards to build a gaol at Shrewsbury. He was now fairly launched upon that career in which he won fame. After being engaged to erect more than forty bridges, he was, about 1793, appointed civil engineer to the Ellesmere Canal Company, to connect the Severn, the Dee, and the Mersey, by a number of navigations. The Caledonian Canal, the Glasgow, Paisley, and Ardrossan, the Macclesfield, the Birmingham and Liverpool Junction, the Weaver Navigation in Cheshire, were, at a subsequent period, either entirely or partially constructed by him. The Gotha Canal, in Sweden, was also his work. In 1802 he was appointed engineer to the Commissioners of Highland Roads and Bridges; and of the great works executed by him in this capacity, he himself said, that "the whole of Scotland, from its southern boundary near Carlisle to the northern extremity of Caithness, and from Aberdeenshire on the east to the Argyleshire islands on the west, has been intersected by roads; its largest rivers, and even inferior streams, crossed by bridges; and all this in the space of twenty-five years, and, with some few exceptions, under the same individual commissioners." The improvement of harbours, and the erection of Highland churches and manses, were also included in the foregoing commission. The improved road from London to Holyhead, the Menai suspension-bridge, St. Katherine's docks, London, and the harbour-works at Aberdeen and Dundee, are held to be his greatest triumphs as an engineer. He left an account of all his undertakings, in a work which was finished and published by his executors after his death, entitled "Life of Thomas Telford, Civil Engineer, written by himself: containing a Descriptive Narrative of his Professional Labours;" to which a supplementary volume, containing eighty-three plates of his engineering works, was added. In early life he wrote some poetical pieces in imitation of Ramsay and Fergusson, which were inserted, under the signature of Eskdale Tam, in Ruddiman's "Weekly Magazine." In later years he wrote articles on Architecture, Civil Architecture, and Inland Navigation, for Brewster's "Edinburgh Encyclopædia." He was never married, and, until his 70th year, had never known any serious illness. He left £2,000 to be awarded in annual premiums by the Institution of Civil Engineers, and £1,000 to the minister of his native parish, for the establishment and continual supply of books to a library there. He was a fellow of the Royal Societies of Edinburgh and England. B. in the district of Eskdale, Dumfriesshire, 1757; D. in London, 1834.

TELL, William, tel, one of the principal confederates who restored the independence of Switzerland in 1307. Gessler, the Austrian governor for the emperor Albert, placed the ducal hat of his master upon a pole, which was set up in the market-place at Altorf, and all who passed were required to make obeisance to it. This was refused by Tell, who was sentenced to shoot an arrow at an apple placed on the head of his own son. He fortunately succeeded in cleaving the apple without injuring the child. Gessler observing another arrow in his girdle, asked what it was for; to which Tell boldly replied, "To have slain thee, if I had killed my son." The governor, upon this, ordered Tell to be bound and put into a boat, in order to convey him to a dungeon in his own castle. But a storm coming on, the boatmen declared they should be lost if Tell, who was accounted the best pilot on the lake, was not intrusted with the helm. On this Gessler ordered him to be released, and Tell, steering for a point of land since called the Rock of Tell, jumped ashore and gained the mountains. Shortly after, he shot the governor, and the confederates having taken arms, effected the deliverance of their country. This romantic story, however, is considered as fabulous by Johann von Müller, Grimm, and other writers.

TELLER, William Abraham, tel'-ler, an eminent German Protestant theologian, who became professor at Helmstadt; but, having published some works which were considered as heterodox, he was deprived of the appointment. He established himself at Berlin in 1767, and there received the post of member of the Consistorial Court. He wrote a number of works upon theology, in German, and some dissertations in Latin. "Equally remote from mysticism on the one hand, and from dry metaphysical philosophy on the other, he addresses himself to the reason and the heart, and, while he touches the latter, carries conviction to the former." B. at Leipzig, 1734; D. at Berlin, 1804.

TELLEZ, Balthazar, tel'-laiz, an eminent historian, who was professor of theology, belles-lettres, and philosophy, in various colleges belonging to the Society of Jesuits, of which order he was a member. His most important works are—the History of the Jesuits in Portugal, and the History of Ethiopia. B. at Lisbon, 1595; D. at the same city, 1675.

TELLEZ, Gabriel, tel'-laith, a celebrated Spanish dramatist, who takes rank immediately after Calderon and Lope de Vega. He is said to have written more than three hundred plays, the greater number of which were destroyed at the order of the Inquisition. He always wrote under an assumed name, being of the clerical profession, and his comedies being marked by considerable license both in words and morals. B. at Madrid, probably in 1585; D. 1675.

TELLICHERY, tel'-li-cher'-ve, a fortified seaport-town of British India, in the presidency of Madras, Malabar, 93 miles from Seringapatam. It is a place of considerable consequence, but has much declined, although still inhabited by a number of rich native merchants, and the principal mart for sandal-wood and cardamums. Pop. Estimated at 20,000. Lat. 11° 44′ N. Lon. 75° 36′ E. —In 1782 Hyder Ali besieged it unsuccessfully.

TELLIER, Michael le, tel'-le-ai, a French lawyer and statesman, and father of the Marquis de Louvois, who gained unenviable notoriety by proposing the edict of Nantes. After passing through different offices, he was recommended by Cardinal Mazarine to Louis XIII. for the place of secretary of state, which post he filled with considerable reputation till 1666, when he resigned it to his son. B. at Paris, 1603; D. 1685.

TELLIER, Francis Michael le. (See LOUVOIS, Marquis de.)

TEMANZA, Thomas, tai-man'-dza, an eminent Italian architect and writer upon architecture, who constructed the church of La Madalena at Venice, the Rotunda at Piazzolo, &c. He was the author of "Lives of the most eminent Venetian Architects and Sculptors;" "Civil Architecture;" the "Antiquities of Rimini;" and a number of dissertations upon various branches of architecture. He became chief of the Commission of Inquirers at Venice. B. at Venice, 1705; D. at the same city, 1789.

TEME, or TEAM, teem, a river of South Wales, rising near Newtown, Montgomeryshire, and, after a course of 62 miles, joining the Severn 3 miles from Worcester.

TEMES, tem-esh', a river of Hungary, rising in the Carpathian Mountains, and, after a course of 180 miles, joining the Danube 6 miles from Belgrade.

TEMESVAR, or BANNAT OF, tem-esh-var', a county of the south of Hungary, bounded by Transylvania, and by the rivers Marosch and the Danube. Area, about 1,860 square miles. Pop. above 375,000. In 1779 the Bannat was declared by the Austrian government to form part of Hungary, and divided into the three palatinates of Torontal, Temesvar, and Krassova.

TEMESVAR, a fortified city of Hungary, the capital of the county of the same name, and one of the strongest fortresses of the Austrian empire, 72 miles from Belgrade. It stands at the confluence of the rivers Temes and Rega. Of its public buildings, the chief are the cathedral, a Greek and a Catholic church, monasteries, hospitals, a synagogue, and extensive barracks for the garrison. Manf. Silk, iron goods, and woollens. Pop. 23,000, comprising Germans, Hungarians, Wallachs, Greeks, and Jews.

TEMMINCK, C. J., tem'-mink, an eminent Dutch naturalist, who became director of the Academy of Arts and Sciences at Haarlem. His most important works were,—"Systematic Catalogue of Ornithology," "Manual of Ornithology," an Atlas of Birds, and an account of some new species of birds in the museum of the Linnæan Society. This last paper was inserted in the Transactions of the Linnæan Society. To the family of pigeons he devoted considerable attention, and produced thereon a valuable work, entitled "Natural History of Pigeons." B. about 1780.

TEMPESTA, Antonio, tem-pes'-ta, an eminent painter, who was the disciple of Strada, and excelled in landscapes with figures. He also etched a large number of subjects. B. at Florence, 1555; D. at the same city, 1630.

TEMPIO, tem'-pe-o, a town of Sardinia, 32 miles from Sassari. Pop. 9,500.

TEMPLE, William, tem'-pel, an eminent English statesman and diplomatist. At the Restoration he became a member of the Irish Convention; but in 1633 he repaired to England. He rendered important services as ambassador to the United Provinces, particularly in effecting the league between England, Holland, and Sweden in 1668, known as the Triple Alliance, and in bringing about the marriage of the prince of Orange (afterwards William III.) with Mary, daughter of the duke of York. In 1680 he retired from public affairs, and divided his time between his books and his gardens; but he was often consulted by the ministers, and by King William in person. His works consist of Memoirs, Letters, Miscellanies, and "Observations on the United Provinces of the Netherlands." "He was," says Sir J. Mackintosh, "a most admirable person. He seems to be the model of a negotiator, uniting politeness and address to honesty." B. in London, 1628; D. 1699.—His son JOHN TEMPLE was appointed secretary at war immediately after the Revolution, but drowned himself a week afterwards.

TEMPLEBURG, tem'-pel-boorg, a walled town of Prussian Pomerania, 44 miles from Koslin. Pop. 3,500.

TEMPLEMAN, Peter, tem'-pel-man, an English physician and writer, who settled in practice at London, and, on the establishment of the British Museum, was appointed keeper of the reading-room, which place he resigned on being elected secretary to the Society of Arts. He wrote some poetical pieces, and translated Norden's "Travels in Egypt." B. at Dorchester, 1711; D. 1769.

TEMPLEMICHAEL, tem-pel-mi'-kel, the name of several parishes in Leinster, Ireland, none of them with a population above 10,000.

TEMPLEMORE, tem'-pel-mor, a neat modern town of Ireland, in the county of Tipperary, 75 miles from Dublin. It is near the Devil's Bit Mountains, and consists chiefly of one long and well-built street. Pop. 4,400.

TEMPLEPATRICK, tem-pel-pat'-rik, a parish and town of Ireland, in the county of Antrim, 87 miles from Dublin. Pop. of parish, 4,000.

TEMPLEROBIN, tem'-pel-rob'-in, a parish of Ireland, Munster county, in the harbour of Cork. It consists of Spike and Hawlbowline islands, and a part of the Great Island, with a portion of Queenstown. Pop. 15,500.

TEMPLIN, temp'-lin, a town of Prussia, 42 miles from Berlin. Pop. 3,400.

TENASSERIM PROVINCES, ten-as'-se-rim, British India, consist of a long and narrow strip of territory in Further India, separated from Siam on the E. by a mountain-chain, and having on their W. the Indian Ocean and the Saluen river. Ext. 500 miles long, and from 40 to 80 broad. Area, 33,000 square miles. Desc. Mostly mountainous. Pop. 150,000.—Also a RIVER of Further India, falling, after a course of 200 miles, into the Indian Ocean.

TENBURY, ten'-ber-re, a market-town of Worcestershire, on the Teme, over which is a stone bridge, 17 miles from Worcester. The church stands near to the river, and has suffered greatly from the floods, which frequently occur. The trade consists chiefly of hops and cider. Pop. 1,800.

TENBY, ten'-be, a market-town and borough of Wales, in Pembrokeshire, situate in Caermarthen Bay, at the mouth of the Bristol Channel, 8 miles from Pembroke. The town stands on a rocky promontory of considerable elevation, inclosed by the sea on every side except the north, where a narrow isthmus connects it with the mainland. It was once surrounded by a strong and lofty wall, which in some places is yet nearly entire. The church extends 110 feet in length, and at the west end has a large square tower, surmounted by a spire, rising altogether to the height of 152 feet. There were other ancient religious establishments. The remains of the castle are yet considerable, though mostly in a very dilapidated state. Besides these, there are a market-house, assembly-rooms, theatre, and splendid bathing establishments. Tenby was formerly a place of great trade, which has now declined; but it still exports butter, corn, coal, and oysters. Pop. 3,000.

TENCE, tänce, a town of France, in the department of the Upper Loire, on the Lignon, 9 miles from Yssengeaux. Pop. 6,300.

TENCIN, Claudine Alexandrine Guerin de, täṅ'-sā, was the sister of Cardinal de Tencin, and took the veil in the monastery of Montfleury; but, with the consent of the pope, she threw off the religious habit, and entered the gay world at Paris, where she led the fashion for some time, and was celebrated for her intrigues, for which she was once confined in the Châtelet, and afterwards in the Bastille. She was the mother of the celebrated French philosopher D'Alembert, whom she abandoned in his infancy. "The Siege of Calais, or the Misfortunes of Love," and some other romances, were written by her. B. 1681; D. 1749.

TENDRE, MONT, tandr, one of the Jura mountains of Switzerland, on the E. side of the Lake de Joux. Height, 5,338 feet above the level of the sea.

TENEDOS, ten'-e-dos, a rocky island of the Grecian Archipelago, close to the coast of Asia Minor, and at a small distance from the entrance of the Dardanelles. Ext. 5 miles long, with a breadth of 2. Desc. Rocky, and apparently barren, yet producing the finest wine in the archipelago. Pop. 600. Lat. 39° 53′ N. Lon. 26° E.

TENERANI, ten-er-a'-nee, Pietro, an eminent Italian sculptor, who pursued his studies under Canova and Thorwaldsen. He executed a large number of statues and other pieces of sculpture for her Majesty Queen Victoria, the duke of Devonshire, the emperor of Russia, the late king of Naples, as well as for several cities of the United States. He was appointed professor of sculpture in the Academy of St. Luke, at Rome, and was knighted by King Louis of Bavaria. B. about 1799.

TENERIFFE, ten'-e-rif (Sp. TENERIFE, tai-nai-re'-fa), the largest island of the Canary group, situate off the western coast of Africa. Ext. 74 miles long, with a breadth of 35. Area, 877 square miles. Gen. Desc. As a natural object, it is chiefly remarkable for its lofty peak and the sloping sides of which it actually consists. The climate of Teneriffe is peculiarly delightful and salutary. By the rapidity of the rise of the island, it presents, within a very short distance, every variation of temperature, from the colder climates of Europe to those of the equinoctial regions. The port of Santa Cruz, from which the principal trade is carried on, is, however, intensely hot. The declivities and rising hills are ... with vines, and cultivated like a garden. Perpetual spring prevails in the district, and in the summer evenings the breeze from the sea comes loaded with delicious coolness. In this part of the island, the date, the plantain, the sugarcane, the olive, the fruit-trees of Europe, the vine, and corn, are cultivated. Above this fertile tract rises what is called the region of the laurels, forming an extensive border that extends all around Teneriffe. Above this is a vast forest of fir and pine, characteristic of the colder regions of the earth; and above this is a vast plain, like a sea of sand, covered with the dust of pumice-stone, which continually fills the air. At the top there is scarcely room to stand; and the crater is inclosed by a wall so steep, that it could not be entered, were there not a breach in one spot. The view from the peak, attaining an elevation of upwards of 12,000 feet above the level of the sea, is uncommonly extensive. The transparent atmosphere enables the spectator to distinguish even the houses, the sails of the vessels, and the trunks of the trees. Beyond is discovered a vast extent of ocean, studded with the whole archipelago of the Fortunate Islands. The summit may be considered as an extinct volcano, having remained tranquil during many ages. The commercial importance of Teneriffe depends chiefly on its wine, which, though of an inferior quality to that of Madeira, yet, being sold at a cheaper rate, is in considerable demand. It also exports orchilla-weed, rosewood, and a few other trifling articles. Santa Cruz affords beef and fish in plenty, and excellent water. A considerable trade is also carried on between this island and the Spanish West Indies. Pop. about 90,000. Lat. of peak, 28° 16′ 5″ N. Lon. 16° 39′ W.

TENG TCHOU, teng-tchoo', the name of two Chinese cities, the one in the province of Shan-tung, at the entrance of the Gulf of Chili, and the other in Fo-kien, 140 miles from Amoy.

TENIERS, David, ten'-e-ers, called the Elder, an eminent Dutch painter, who studied under Rubens, after which he went to Rome, where he imitated the manner of Elsheimer. He returned to Antwerp, after ten years' absence in Italy. His subjects are alchemists, country fairs, alehouses, and merry meetings, all of them painted in an admirable style. B. at Antwerp, 1582; D. at the same city, 1649.

TENIERS, David, called the Younger, a celebrated Dutch painter, and son of the preceding, whom he surpassed. He painted night-scenes, feasts, the "Temptation of St. Anthony," &c. His pieces are numerous, and very valuable. The National Gallery contains four of his paintings. B. at Antwerp, 1610; D. at Brussels, 1694.

TENISON, Thomas, ten'-i-son, an eminent English prelate, who was educated at the free school of Norwich; whence he removed to Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, where he took his degrees. In 1680 he was presented to the rectory of St. Martin in the Fields, and in 1689 to the archdeaconry of London. He was so strenuous an advocate for the Protestant cause in the reign of James II., that King William advanced him to the bishopric of Lincoln in 1691, and to the see of Canterbury in 1694. He wrote some sermons, tracts against popery, and published the "Remains of Lord Chancellor Bacon." He founded a library and school in St. Martin's parish. This library, after remaining for many years in a neglected condition, was sold by auction in 1861. B. at Cottenham, Cambridgeshire, 1636; D. in London, 1715.

TENNANT, Smithson, ten'-nant, an eminent English chemist, who, after studying under Dr. Black at Edinburgh, and at the university of Cambridge, set out upon a course of European travel, which embraced France, Holland, Denmark, and Sweden. After taking a degree as bachelor of physic at Cambridge in 1788, he went to London; but, as he enjoyed an independent fortune, he did not practise. In 1813 he was appointed professor of chemistry in the university of Cambridge; but, in the following year, while visiting a small fort near Boulogne, with Baron Bulow, he and his companion were thrown into the ditch. The baron escaped with the most trifling injuries, but Mr. Tennant's skull was so severely fractured, that he died within an hour after the accident. His most important contributions were furnished to the Philosophical Transactions: these were chiefly on the decomposition of fixed air; on the nature of the diamond; on the action of nitre upon gold and platina; on an easier mode of procuring potassium, and on the different sorts of lime used in agriculture. B. at Selby, Yorkshire, 1761; D. 1815.

TENNANT, William, a Scotch poet, who studied for a short time at the university of St. Andrews. He was so unfortunate as to lose the use of his feet while still young. Unaided, he taught himself German, Portuguese, Hebrew, Syriac, Chaldaic, and other languages. After spending many years as a schoolmaster and classical teacher, he, in 1835, received the appointment of professor of Oriental languages in the university of St. Andrews. He wrote three dramas, exhibiting considerable poetical power; the well-known poem of "Anster Fair;" "The Life of Allan Ramsay;" and other works. B. at Easter-Anstruther, Fife, 1785; D. 1848.

TENIERS.

TENNEMANN, Wilhelm Gottlieb, ten'-ne-man, an eminent German philosophical writer, who became professor of philosophy and librarian at the university of Marburg. He made a German translation of Hume "On the Human Understanding;" and of Locke's essay upon the same subject. His most important work was, "Comparative History of the Systems of Philosophy," which has been reproduced under the title of "A Manual of Philosophy," in Bohn's Philological Library, and edited and enlarged by J. R. Morell. The same work has been translated into French by Victor Cousin. B. 1761; D. 1819.

TENNENT, Sir James Emerson, ten'-nent, a modern statesman and writer, who, after concluding his educational career at Trinity College, Dublin, repaired to Greece, whither he had been attracted by an ardent sympathy for the cause of Greek independence. Three eloquent and remarkable works resulted from this journey:—"Greece in 1825;" "Letters from the Ægean;" and the "History of Modern Greece;" the last of which contained some curious details relative to the establishment of the monarchy. Shortly after the appearance of the last work, he was called to the bar at Lincoln's Inn, but never practised. Until 1832 he had borne only his paternal name of Emerson; but having in the previous year married the daughter and heiress of William Tennent, a wealthy banker of Belfast, he, upon succeeding to the estates of that gentleman, assumed the additional name of Tennent. In the latter year he entered the House of Commons as member for Belfast, which he represented with little interruption until 1845, when he received the honour of knighthood, and was appointed civil secretary to the colonial government of Ceylon. At a subsequent period he became lieutenant-governor of Ceylon. After his return to England he was, in 1852, returned member for Lisburn, and received the appointment of secretary to the Poor-Law Board, an office which he resigned to accept that of joint secretary to the Board of Trade. His active parliamentary and official life did not prevent his frequently appearing as the author of valuable works, the chief of which were,—"A Treatise on the Copyright of Designs for Printed Fabrics;" "Christianity in Ceylon;" and "Wine, its Uses and Taxation." In 1859 he produced his "Ceylon," which speedily became one of the most popular works of the day, and was translated into several foreign languages. It is distinguished among even the best works of its class for its correct and extensive series of observations upon natural history. Upon the habits of one animal—the elephant—the book throws a world of light; and so greatly is our knowledge of this gigantic quadruped increased, that it is not too much to say of the book, that, until its appearance, we were but dimly acquainted with, perhaps, the most interesting animal of the brute creation. In the House of Commons he distinguished himself by carrying the Copyright of Designs Act, for which boon the manufacturers of the United Kingdom presented him, in 1843, with a testimonial and a service of plate of the value of £3,000. B. at Belfast, 1804.

TENNESSEE, ten'-nes-see', one of the United States, in the central part of the Union, but included amongst the western states. It is bounded N. by Kentucky, E. by North Carolina and Virginia, S. by Georgia, Alabama territory, and Mississippi state, and W. by the Mississippi. Area, 45,600 square miles. Desc. Mountainous in the centre, being intersected by the Cumberland Mountains, which divide it into E. and W. Tennessee. The western part is undulating, with some portions of it level; but in the E. the scenery is of a grander and more picturesque kind. Rivers. The principal are the Mississippi, Tennessee, Cumberland, Holston, Clinch, Obian, and Wolf. Zoology. The animals are similar to those found in other parts of the United States. The bison, the elk, and the deer, have become scarce, except on the mountains. Bears, panthers, wild cats, and wolves, are yet seen in the forests, but seldom visit cultivated places: the beaver, otter, and musk-rat are found on the upper branches of the Cumberland. Climate. Generally healthy. In East Tennessee the heat of summer is tempered by the mountain air, and the winter resembles the spring in more northern countries. Pro. Wheat, barley, oats, rye, buckwheat, Indian corn, flax, hemp, tobacco, indigo, rice, and cotton. Fruit-trees succeed excellently, and the wild plum, crab-apple, and wild strawberry are of a delicious flavour: the wild grape-vine yields tolerable grapes. The timber of the state comprises oak of different species, black and white walnut, beech, red cedar, black and honey locust, ash, elm, mulberry, dogwood, sassafras, maple, sugar-tree, papaw, cherry, hornbeam, and cucumber-tree. Minerals. Copperas, alum, nitre, iron, and lead, are among the minerals. Some gold and silver have been found; coal is supposed to be plentiful; saltpetre is abundant. There are also mineral springs, and many valuable salt springs. Manf. Unimportant. The exports comprise cattle, salted meats, gunpowder, and coarse linens, which are chiefly sent down the rivers. Pop. 1,050,000.—This country, which formed a part of Carolina, according to the second charter of Charles II., was inhabited by the Cherokee Indians, by whom the first colonists, consisting of above sixty families, in the year 1754, were nearly destroyed. Their settlements were not renewed till 1774. In 1789 the country was ceded by Carolina to the United States, and, in 1796, was received into the federal union.

TENNESSEE, a navigable river of the United States, in Tennessee, rising in the mountains of Virginia and Carolina, and, after a course of 1,200 miles, joining the Ohio at Paduca, by a mouth 600 yards across.

TENNYSON, Alfred, ten'-ni-son, a distinguished modern English poet, who was the son of the Rev. Dr. George Clayton Tennyson, rector of Somersby, Lincolnshire. The poet was descended of the illustrious families of Lascelles, Clayton, the D'Eyncourts, and other Norman and Saxon lines. While at the university of Cambridge, he wrote a poem entitled "Timbuctoo," which, in 1829, gained the chancellor's medal. Shortly afterwards he produced, in conjunction with his brother Charles, a small volume of poems, which is stated to have been commended by Coleridge. His first effort of any consequence was in 1830, when he put forth a collection of poems, chiefly lyrical, which contained, among other pieces, "Mariana," "Lilian," "The Mermaid," "Recollections of the Arabian Nights," "The Dying Swan," "All Things will Die," "Hero to Leander," "The Ballad of Oriana," and "The Sea-fairies." Of this volume an eminent critic observed, "It must always possess considerable interest for those who read and admire his mature productions; but, with few exceptions, the poems it contains owe their main attraction to the fact that they are the earliest efforts of one who has gained a position of which they afforded no certain promise. Many of them are exquisitely musical; great command of the sources of metre is manifest, and a richness of phraseology everywhere abounds; but substantial interest they certainly want." "Poems by Alfred Tennyson" appeared in 1833, and contained, in addition to several of his former productions improved and altered, "The Miller's Daughter," "The Lotus-Eaters," "Locksley Hall," "Lady Clara Vere de Vere," "The Talking Oak," &c. This volume showed that the poet had taken a great stride. "With the publication of this series," says the critic already quoted, "Mr. Tennyson appears distinctly as the poet of his own age. His apprenticeship over, his mastery over the instruments of his art is complete, and he employs it in either presenting the life of his contemporaries, the thoughts, incidents, and emotions of the nineteenth century in England, or in treating legend and history with reference to the moral and intellectual sympathies now active among us." "The Princess" was given to the public—a public now expectantly appreciative of everything that came from the poet—in 1847. "In Memoriam" followed,—a glorious tribute to the memory of Arthur Hallam, the son of the historian. Shortly after the appearance of this grand elegy, or rather series of elegies, Mr. Tennyson was appointed poet-laureat; to the trifling salary attached to which post was added a pension of £200 per annum. The "Ode on the Death of the Duke of Wellington" appeared in 1852, "Maud" in 1855, and "The Idylls of the King" in 1859. A gorgeously-illustrated edition of his poems has been published, upon which the best artists of the time have been employed. In 1856 he was created D.C.L. of the university of Oxford. He was married to a Lincolnshire lady, and lived completely aloof from society,—a manner which characterized him throughout his life,—in the Isle of Wight. B. at Somersby, Lincolnshire, 1810.

TENON, Jacques René, ten'-awng, a celebrated French surgeon, who studied botany under the eminent Antoine and Bernard Jussieu; and, after concluding his scientific education, established himself in practice; but, in 1744, joined the army as surgeon of the first rank. He subsequently rose to the highest reputation, and was appointed member of the Royal Academy of Surgery, a member of the Institute, and was created a member of the Legion of Honour. He was the author of more than thirty works upon medical science, the most important of which were,—"Memoirs relative to Anatomy, Pathology, and Surgery," and "Memoirs upon the Hospitals of Paris." His last work, put forth when he was in his 90th year, was entitled, "On the Means of Prolonging Life." B. 1724; D. 1816.

TENTERDEN, ten'-ter-den, a market-town of Kent, near the river Rother, 24 miles from Canterbury. The church is a large and handsome fabric, and has a steeple conspicuous as a landmark. Pop. about 4,000.

TENTERDEN, Charles Abbott, Lord, an eminent English judge. He was the son of a barber at Canterbury, who was "a tall, erect, and primitive-looking man, with a large club pigtail, going about with the instruments of his business, and attended frequently by his son Charles, a youth as decent, grave, and primitive-looking as himself." In 1781 young Abbott was elected to Corpus Christi College, Oxford, of which he became fellow and tutor. In 1788 he entered himself of the Inner Temple. After commencing the active pursuit of his profession, he quickly rose to great eminence; was appointed counsel to the Treasury, the Bank, and several large mercantile companies. In 1816 he accepted a judgeship in the court of Common Pleas, having previously refused a like mark of distinction, his income as a counsel being far beyond the salary of a judge. He was knighted in 1818, and in the same year succeeded Lord Ellenborough as chief-justice of the court of King's Bench. In that capacity Lord Brougham describes him as follows:—"It was an edifying sight to observe Lord Tenterden, whose temper had been visibly affected during the trial (for on the bench he had not always that entire command of it which he possessed at the bar), addressing himself to the points in the case with the same perfect calmness and indifference with which a mathematician pursues an abstract truth; as if there were neither the parties nor the advocates in existence, and only bent on the discovery and the elucidation of truth." In 1827 he was created a peer, with the title of Baron Tenterden. As a speaker in the House of Lords, he opposed the repeal of the Corporation and Test Acts, and the Roman Catholic Relief Bill. He was the author of a treatise upon the law relative to Merchant Ships and Seamen, which is stated to be the best work upon that subject. B. at Canterbury, 1762; D. 1832.

TENTORI, Christopher, ten'-to-re, a learned Italian writer, who produced a "History of the Republic of Venice," and several other works upon the same subject. B. 1745; D. 1810.

TENZEL, or TENTZEL, William Ernest, tent'-zel, a learned German historian and antiquary, whose principal works were,—"Saxonia Numismatica," "Continuation of Sagittarius's History of Gotha," and "History of the Reformation." B. at Greussen, Thuringia, 1659; D. 1707.

TEPEACA, tep-e-a'-ka, a town of the Mexican Confederation, 20 miles from La Puebla. The principal square is large; and in the middle of it is a fort, which served as a retreat and place of defence to Cortes and his army, upon his retiring from Mexico. In one of the fronts of it is the convent of San Francisco, a large, magnificent, and beautiful building, founded entirely on arches, all the expenses of it having been defrayed by Cortes and his captains. On the other side of the square is the parish church. Manf. Woollen goods. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 19° N. Lon. 98° 2′ W.

TEPELINI, tep-e-le'-ne, a town of Albania, on the Voyussa, 30 miles from Avlona. It is now nearly in ruins, and contains the palace of Ali Pasha, of Yanina, who was born here about 1749.

TEPIC, tai-peek', a town of the Mexican Confederation, on a height, 24 miles from San Blas. Pop. 10,000.

TEPLITZ, TÖPLITZ, or TEPLICK, tep'-litz, a town of Bohemia, 45 miles from Prague. Pop. 1,300.

TEPLITZ, the name of several small towns and villages of the Austrian states.

TERAMO, tai-ra'-mo, a town of Naples, in the province of Abruzzo Ultra, 25 miles from Aquila. It has a cathedral and several smaller churches. Pop. 10,000.

TERAMO, James de, an Italian writer, frequently styled Palladino. He was at first an advocate, but afterwards entered into holy orders, and became archbishop of Tarentum. He wrote, among other works, a curious romance, entitled "The Trial of Belial." B. 1349; D. 1417.

TERBURGH, Gerard, ter'-berg, a Dutch painter. He was employed at the court of Spain, where he gained great wealth, and was made a knight. On his return to his own country he settled at Daventer, and was chosen burgomaster. He painted portraits, conversations, and humorous scenes. B. at Zwoll, Holland, 1608; D. 1681.

TERCEIRA, ter-sai'-e-ra, an island near the coast of Africa, forming one of the group of the Azores, and the seat of government. Area. Estimated at 222 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, but highly fertile. Pro. Wheat, maize, fruits, and wine. Pop. 45,000. Lat. 38° 38′ 9″ N. Lon. 27° 13′ 7″ W.

TERCERO, ter-sai'-ro, a river of South America, province of Tucuman, of the Plata Confederation. After an unascertained course, it enters the Parana at the influx of the Salado.

TEREK, te-rek', a considerable river of Asiatic Russia, in the government of Caucasus. It rises amid snow-covered mountains, and, after a course of 350 miles, it divides into three branches, and falls into the Caspian Sea in lat. 44° N., lon. 46° to 48° E.

TERENCE, Publius Terentius Afer, ter'-ence, a dramatic poet. According to Suetonius, he was a native of Carthage, and was sold as a slave to Terentius Lucanus, a Roman senator, who gave him his liberty on account of his genius. He studied Greek with such assiduity as to adapt the best comedies from that language into the Latin; of which, however, only six remain. The best edition of Terence is that of Bentley, Amsterdam, 1727. Dunlop, in his "Roman Literature," has given some imitations of his plays. There is an English translation of the comedies, by George Colman. According to one account, he is said to have died of grief, on hearing that 108 plays of Menander, which he had translated while in Greece, and had dispatched to Rome, were lost at sea; while others state that he expired whilst on a voyage from Asia. B. about 218 B.C.; D. about 159 B.C.

TERENTIA, te-ren'-shi-a, the wife of Cicero, who repudiated her because she had been faithless while he was in banishment in Asia. She married Sallust, Cicero's enemy, and afterwards Massala Corvinus. She lived to her 103rd, or, according to Pliny, to her 117th year.

TERESPOL, ter'-es-pol, a town of Russian Poland, on the Bug, 60 miles from Siedlac. Pop. 1,800.

TERGA, ter'-ga, a town of Africa, Morocco, 70 miles from Fez. It is near the Mediterranean. Pop. 3,000.

TER-GOUW. (See GOUDA.)

TERLIZZI, tair-lit'-se, a town of Naples, 60 miles from Tarentum, and 7 from the Adriatic. It has a cathedral and several convents. Pop. 12,000.

TERMINI, tair'-me-ne, a seaport-town of the island of Sicily, in the Val di Mazzara, at the mouth of the river Termini, 18 miles from Palermo. The public establishments consist of a Monte di Pietà, hospitals, a poor-house for females, several convents, and some rather richly-ornamented churches. Pop. 9,000. Lat. 38° 5′ N. Lon. 13° 45′ E.

TERMINUS, ter'-mi-nus, a divinity among the Romans, who was supposed to preside over bounds and limits, and to punish all unlawful usurpation of land. He was represented with a human head, without feet or arms, to intimate that he never moved whence he was placed. It is said that when Tarquin the Proud wished to build a temple to Jupiter on the Tarpeian rock, the god Terminus refused to give way, though the other gods resigned their seats with readiness.

TERMONDE, tair'-monde, a town of Belgium. (See DENDERMONDE.)

TERNATE, tair-nat', the northernmost of a chain of islands on the west coast of Gilolo, and formerly the seat of sovereignty over all the adjacent Moluccа islands,—Tidor, Bachian, Motir, and Machian. It is of small extent, but high, and it contains a lofty peak, which sometimes discharges flames. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 0° 50′ N. Lon. 127° 21′ E.—It was taken from the Dutch in the course of the revolutionary war, but was restored at the peace of Amiens. It was again taken in August, 1810, and was restored to the Dutch, with their other possessions, in India, by the peace of Paris in 1814.

TERNAUX, William Louis, Baron, tair'-no, a celebrated French manufacturer, who was among the first to introduce spinning-machines into France. He also suggested plans for the preservation of corn in subterraneous caverns instead of granaries, and acclimatized the Thibet sheep in France. B. 1763; D. 1833.

TERNETH, ter'-neth, a town of the Netherlands, in South Brabant. Pop. 1,500.

TERNEUSE, tair'-nu(r)se, a fortified town of the Netherlands, 12 miles from Flushing. Pop. 1,100.

TERNI, tair'-ne, a town of Italy, in the States of the Church, between two branches of the river Nera, 48 miles from Rome. It has a cathedral and several churches, but no other public building of consequence. The cascades of the Velino, about 3 miles from Terni, are considered among the finest in the world. Pop. 21,000.

TERNOVA, or TIRNOVA, ter-no'-va, a town of European Turkey, in Bulgaria, 110 miles from Adrianople. It stands on a basaltic hill 1,000 feet high, and is inclosed by a wall and trench. Pop. 16,000.

TERODANT, or TARUDANT, ter'-o-dant, a city of Morocco, capital of the province of Sus, 120 miles from Morocco. The inhabitants excel in the art of dyeing. Pop. 21,000.

TERPANDER, ter-pan'-der, a lyric poet and musician of Lesbos. It is said that he appeased a tumult at Sparta by the melody and sweetness of his notes. He added three strings to the lyre, which, before his time, had only four. Supposed to have flourished about 650 B.C.

TERPSICHORE, terp-sik'-o-re, one of the muses, daughter of Jupiter and Mnemosyne. She presided over dancing, and is represented as a young virgin crowned with laurel, and holding in her hand a musical instrument.

TERRACINA, ter-ra-che'-na, a town of Italy, in the States of the Church, at the southern extremity of the Pontine marshes, 56 miles from Rome. It was anciently a town of note, and is indebted to Pope Pius VI., who resided much at it, for the purpose of superintending the draining of the marshes. The cathedral is a dark and gloomy pile, and most of the buildings of the town have a decayed appearance. Pop. 5,000.—This place was, in 1798, taken by the French.

TERRA DEL FUEGO, del fwa'-go, 'the land of fire,' the most S. region of S. America, consisting of three large islands, separated from S. Patagonia by the Strait of Magellan. There are also numerous smaller islands embraced in the term. The inhabitants are amongst the lowest in the scale of human beings, and subsist mostly by fishing and hunting. Lat. 52° 30′ to 55° 35′ S. Lon. 65° to 75° W.

TERRA DI LAVORO, di-la-vo'-ro, a province of Naples, having on its S.E. the Mediterranean, and on its other sides the provinces Naples, Molise, Principato Ultra, and the Abruzzi. Area, 2,505 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, being covered in the E. with branches of the Apennines; but fertile in its other parts. Its plains are the richest in the Italian peninsula. Pro. Wheat, oil, fruits, silk, and wines. Pop. 725,000. Lat. between 40° 48′ and 41° 48′ N. Lon. between 13° and 15° E.

TERRA FIRMA, fir'-ma, an extensive tract of country in South America, which comprehends the three provinces of Darien, Veragua, and Panama, or Terra Firma proper.

TERRA NUOVA, noo-o'-va, a town of Italy, 25 miles from Florence. Pop. 2,000.—2. Of the kingdom of Naples, 50 miles from Policastro.

TERRASSON, John, ter'-ras-sawng, a French divine and writer, who, in 1707, was admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences, and, in 1721, obtained the professorship of philosophy, Greek, and Latin. His most important works are "Critical Dissertation on the Iliad" (this has been translated into English); "Reflections in favour of Law's System" (this was a defence of the Mississippi project); "Sethos," a moral romance, in imitation of Fénelon's "Telemachus;" a translation of Diodorus Siculus. B. at Lyons, 1670; D. at Paris, 1750.

TERRASSON, Anthony, an eminent French lawyer, who was cousin of the preceding. He distinguished himself as an advocate, and composed, by order of the chancellor D'Aguesseau, the "History of Roman Jurisprudence," for which he was named censor-royal, and professor in the Royal College. Besides the above work, he wrote Miscellanies in history and literature. B. at Paris, 1705; D. 1782.

TERTULLIAN, Quintus Septimius Florens, ter-tul'-li-an, one of the fathers of the Church, was, according to St. Jerome, a native of Carthage, and the son of a centurion in the employ of the Roman proconsul. He became an eminent rhetorician, and was at first a pagan; but the constancy of the martyrs converted him to Christianity, which he defended with great zeal and eloquence. From Carthage he went to Rome, and in the persecution under Severus, he drew up a famous apology for the Christians. In the latter part of his life he fell into the errors of Montanism. The best editions of Tertullian's works are those of Rigaltius and of Semler. St. Jerome thus speaks of his writings:—"What more learned—more acute than Tertullian, whose Apology, and books against the heathen, embrace all the learning of the age!" B. about 160; D. about 245.

TERUEL, tair'-roo-el, a town of Spain, in the province of Aragon, 70 miles from Valencia. Here are the remains of a Roman aqueduct. Pop. 6,800.

TERWESTEN, Augustin, ter-wes'-ten, a Dutch painter. He improved himself in Italy, where he studied the works of the best masters. By his means the academy at the Hague was revived, and that at Berlin instituted. B. at the Hague, 1649; D. at Berlin, 1711.—He had two brothers, Elias and Matthew. The first excelled in painting fruits and flowers, and died in 1724; the other painted historical subjects, and died in 1735.

TESCHEN, tesh'-en, a town of Austrian Silesia, on the Olsa, 60 miles from Olmutz. It is inclosed by walls, and has a gymnasium and ducal castles. Manf. Woollens, linens, leather, firearms, and liqueurs. Pop. 6,500. At this place, in 1779, a treaty was concluded between Russia and Austria.

TESSIN. (See TESSINO.)

TESTA, Peter, tes'-ta, an eminent Italian painter and engraver. He was drowned in the Tiber in 1650, endeavouring to recover his hat, which had been blown into the river while he was sitting on the bank sketching a design. B. at Lucca, about 1600.

TESTI, Fulvio, tes'-te, an eminent Italian poet, and accounted the Horace of modern Italy. He became minister of state to the duke of Modena; but, being accused of treason, was imprisoned. B. at Ferrara, 1593; D. 1646.

TETBURY, tet'-ber-re, a well-built market-town of Gloucestershire, on the Avon, 25 miles from Bristol. It has a church, various chapels, schools, and a market-house. Manf. Woollen cloth. Pop. 3,400.

TETUAN, tet-oo-an', a seaport-town of Africa, Morocco, in the province of El Garb, on the Mediterranean, immediately within the Straits of Gibraltar, 18 miles from Ceuta. The environs are carefully planted with vineyards and gardens; the grapes are exquisite, and the oranges reckoned, by some, superior to any in the world. The inhabitants consist of Moors and Jews. The English fleets entering the Mediterranean often water and victual in the Bay of Tetuan. Pop. 16,000. Lat. 35° 50′ N. Lon. 5° 20′ W.—While we write, 1861, the Spanish government, resolved to abandon its claims against Morocco, declared Tetuan the property of Spain, rendered it impregnable, and colonized its territory.

TEVIOT, or TIVIOT, tev'-i-ot, a river of Scotland, in Roxburghshire, through the centre of which it flows, and, after being joined by various tributary streams, it unites with the Tweed at Kelso.—TEVIOTDALE is a name applied to most parts of Roxburghshire.

TEWKESBURY, tukes'-ber-re, a market-town and borough of Gloucestershire, situate in a delightful and fertile vale on the Avon, near its confluence with the Severn, 10 miles from Gloucester. The town consists mostly of three principal streets, with several lanes and alleys branching off. Of the public buildings, the principal is the Abbey church, which is almost the only remains of the monastery for which Tewkesbury was once famous. It is of early Norman architecture, combined with specimens of other kinds, is built in the cathedral form, and contains many interesting monuments. There are a town-hall, market-house, gaol, penitentiary, a literary and scientific institution, mechanics' institute, schools, and several charities. Manf. The clothing manufactures, for which Tewkesbury was once distinguished, have declined. At present the principal industry consists of stocking framework-knitting, particularly in cotton; malting, and the making of nails. Pop. 6,000.—This town was formerly famous for mustard, to which Shakspere alludes in his Second Part of "Henry IV." Here, in 1471, Edward IV. gained a decisive victory over the Lancastrians.

TEXAS, tex'-as, one of the United States, and formerly a part of Mexico, having N. the Indian territory and Nebraska, S. the Gulf of Mexico, E. the states of Arkansas and Louisiana, and W. New Mexico. Area, 300,000 square miles. Desc. Low along the coast, and rising gradually from the Gulf of Mexico. Much of the country consists of prairie lands. Pro. Sugar, cotton, and the fruits of warm countries in the lowlands; and in the higher grounds wheat and the grains and fruits of temperate regions. Forests abound along the prairies. Minerals. Lead, copper, coal, and salt. Gold and silver are said also to exist; but they have not been worked. Exp. Hides, horn, tallow, wax, and cotton. Imp. Manufactured goods. Pop. 220,000. Lat. between 26° and 36° 30′ N. Lon. between 93° and 107° W.—This state was annexed to the United States in 1845.

TEXAS, the name of several townships of the United States, none of them with a population above 3,000.

TEXEL, tex'-el, an island of the Netherlands, at the entrance of the Zuyder Zee, separated from the continent of North Holland by the narrow channel called the Mars-diep. Ext. 13 miles long, with a breadth of 6 at its greatest width. Desc. Low, and mostly laid out for pasture. It is secured from the sea by strong dykes; and, besides the town of Texel, contains six villages. Pop. 5,000, mostly engaged in fishing.—Off the Texel, in 1653, the English fleet, under Monk, defeated the Dutch, under Van Tromp, who was killed during the action. In 1799 the fort was taken by the English, and the whole of the Dutch fleet lying within the channel surrendered to them; but the English abandoned the fort in November following.

TEYDE, PEAK OF. (See TENERIFFE, PEAK OF.)

TAZA, taz'-ca, a town of Fez, in Africa, on the borders of the province of Rif, 60 miles from Fez It is now much decayed, but has still a fine mosque and well-supplied markets. Pop. 11,000.

TEZCUCO, tes-koo'-ko, one of the five lakes in the valley of Mexico, at the extremity of which, about three miles distant, the city is placed. Ext. 40 miles long, with a breadth of 10.—The CITY is 15 miles from Mexico, and formerly possessed considerable cotton manufactories, which, however, have suffered much by the competition of those of Queretaro. Pop. 6,000.

THACKERAY, William Makepeace, thăk'-e-rai, a distinguished English novelist, who came of an old Yorkshire family, and was the son of a gentleman in the civil service of the East-India Company. Born in the East, the future novelist was sent at an early age to England, and received his first education at the Charterhouse school, afterwards passing to the university of Cambridge, where he had as contemporaries the poet Tennyson, J. M. Kemble, the eminent Saxon scholar, and other young men who subsequently became famous in literature and science. Quitting his "alma mater" without a degree, and in the enjoyment of a respectable fortune, he formed the resolution of studying pictorial art as a profession. With this view he repaired to the continent, and spent some time at

Weimar, where he made the acquaintance of Gothe. His artist life was continued until between his 25th and 30th years, when he relinquished the crayon for the pen. From the commencement of his literary career he appears to have exhibited high qualities as a writer. His progress to popularity was nevertheless slow. He is understood to have been employed upon the Times newspaper, while under the editorship of Barnes; but it was in consequence of his success as a contributor to "Fraser's Magazine" that he became recognized as a witty, elegant, and original writer. His articles in this publication were signed "Michael Angelo Titmarsh;" and, under the same characteristic pseudonym, he produced, separately, "The Paris Sketch-Book;" "The Second Funeral of Napoleon," in three letters to Miss Smith, of London;" and the "Chronicle of the Drum." As Michael Angelo Titmarsh, he also put forth "The Great Hoggarty Diamond;" "Notes of a Journey from Cornhill to Grand Cairo;" and a series of Christmas books, entitled "Our Street," "Dr. Birch and his Young Friends," "Mrs. Perkins's Ball," "Rebecca and Rowena," and "The Kickleburys on the Rhine," to the second edition of which last he added a reply to a captious critic in the Times, who charged him with seeing only hard, selfish, and unamiable people in this world. His general recognition as a great English writer may be said to date from the time of his publishing his first serial novel, "Vanity Fair, or a Novel without a Hero." But, though the public had been long in making the discovery that a great and original genius was catering for it, it now hastened to award him a position in the same rank with the first novelist of the time, Mr. Charles Dickens. Mr. Thackeray's reputation was fully maintained by his subsequent works; everybody being charmed by his wit, his beautiful style,—so easy, yet so strong,—so full of art, but of art so delightfully concealed. "The History of Pendennis," "The History of Henry Esmond," "The Newcomes," "The Virginians,"—each work was read with grateful avidity by the countrymen of their author. His historical studies for the novel of "Henry Esmond," the action of which, being laid in the time of Queen Anne, naturally included Addison, Steele, and the wits of that day in the list of characters, would seem to have been the original foundation for those brilliant lectures upon the English humorists which he delivered in London, the provinces, and in the United States of America. Several works which have been left unnamed in the preceding list were republished in an edition of his Miscellanies; a collection which included his early contributions to "Fraser's Magazine" and "Punch,"—notably, "Jeames's Diary," the "Snob Papers," and the essays of a "Fat Contributor." In England, Scotland, and the United States, during his second visit in 1855-6, were also delivered his lectures upon the "Four Georges," which, at a later period, were published in the pages of the "Cornhill Magazine," a cheap and highly-popular magazine, of which he became the editor on its establishment in 1860. In 1857 he presented himself as a candidate for the representation of the city of Oxford in parliament; but was rejected by that constituency in favour of Mr. Cardwell. It remains to mention one of the lighter efforts of his pen,—the Christmas story of "The Rose and the Ring, or the History of Prince Giglio and Prince Bulbo," published in 1855. His latest work, in course of publication while this notice is written, is entitled "Philip," and is appearing in the pages of the "Cornhill Magazine." From an appreciative critique in the "Edinburgh Review," the following tribute to his genius is extracted. After a summary of Thackeray's merits as a novelist, the reviewer proceeds:—"'What a wonderful art!' So we may suppose some future critic of the English humorists to say,—'What an admirable gift of nature was it by which the author of these tales was endowed, and which enabled him to fix our interest, to waken our sympathy, to seize upon our credulity, so that we believe in his people, speculate gravely upon their faults or their excellencies, and talk about them as if we had breakfasted with them in the morning in their actual drawing-rooms, or should meet them this afternoon in the Park! What a genius—what vigour—what a bright-eyed intelligence and observation—what a wholesome hatred for meanness and knavery—what a vast sympathy—what a cheerfulness—what a manly relish of life—what a love of human kind!'" D. at Calcutta, 1811.

THAIS, thaï-is, a famous Athenian courtesan. She accompanied Alexander, who, during an orgy, was persuaded by her to destroy the city of Persepolis. After the death of the Macedonian conqueror, she became the wife of Ptolemy, king of Egypt.

THALBERG, Sigismond, tal'-bairg, a distinguished modern German pianist and musical composer. He was educated under Hummel. In his 15th year he appeared with success as a performer, and, in his 16th, published some excellent musical compositions. In Paris, London, and Vienna, he achieved the highest success as a pianist, and has exercised a large amount of influence over the formation of the modern method of performing upon the pianoforte. He composed variations and fantasias upon the operas of "The Huguenots," "Don Giovanni," "La Donna del Lago," &c. His "Studies for the Pianoforte" are highly esteemed, and, of all the modern masters, he has been most successful in training pupils. B. 1812.

THALES, thaï-lees, a philosopher of antiquity. After travelling many years, particularly in Egypt, where he studied mathematics, he returned to his native place, and founded a school of philosophy, generally styled the Ionian school. Among his disciples were Anaximander, Anaximenes, and Pythagoras, and he was often visited by Solon and Thrasybulus. He is generally allowed to have been the father of the Greek philosophy, and stands first on the list of the seven wise men. His doctrine was, that water is the first principle of all bodies; and, according to Diogenes, he was a believer in a deity pervading the universe. He made some inventions in geometry, and first observed the apparent diameter of the sun. He likewise observed the nature and course of eclipses. B. at Miletus, 640 B.C.; D. about 545 B.C.

THALIA, thaï-lï'-a, one of the nine muses, who presided over festivals, pastoral and comic poetry. She is represented leaning on a column, holding a mask in her right hand, by which she is distinguished from her sisters, as also by a shepherd's crook.

THAMASP, TAMASP, or THAMAS I., thä'-mas, soft of Persia, was the son of Shah Ismail, and ascended the throne in 1524. He defeated the Usbegs, took Bagdad in 1529, and conquered Chirvan in 1538. He suppressed a revolt which his two brothers had excited against his authority, and recovered, from the Ottomans, Bagdad and the surrounding territory, as well as Kars, which had been for a short period under the domination of that power. B. 1514; poisoned 1577.

THAMASP, or TAMASP II., twelfth soft of Persia, ascended the throne in 1722. Attacked on all sides by the Affghans, the Russians, and the Turks, he was, in 1729, compelled to invoke the assistance of Nadir Shah, who, after expelling the Affghans, whose king he put to death, turned his arms against and deposed Tamasp, in 1732. B. about 1698; supposed to have been killed, 1737.

THAMASP-, or TAMASP-KOULI-KHAN. (See NADIR SHAH.)

THAME, taim, a market-town and parish of Oxfordshire, on the S. bank of the Thames, which here becomes navigable. The church is a large and handsome structure of the cruciform kind, and comprises a nave, two aisles, a north and south transept, and a chancel. There are, besides, numerous schools and a market-house. Manf. Lace. Pop. 4,000.

THAME, a river. (See TAME.)

THAMES, temz, one of the most noted rivers of Great Britain, whether we consider the length of its course, its body of water, and still more the vast commerce of which it is the centre. It rises, under the name of the Isis, about 2 miles S. of Cirencester, and near Lechlade, 138 miles from London, becomes navigable for barges. After receiving the Windrush and the Evenlode, it reaches Oxford, turning round the city towards the north-east. It is here joined by the Charwell, after which it proceeds to Abingdon, and thence to Dorchester, where it receives the Thame. Continuing its course south-east by Wallingford to Reading, and forming a boundary to the counties of Berks, Bucks, Surrey, Middlesex, Essex, and Kent, it washes the towns of Henley, Marlow, Maidenhead, Windsor, Eton, Egham, Staines, Laleham, Chertsey, Weybridge, Sheppertown, Walton, Sunbury, East and West Moulsey, Hampton, Thames-Ditton, Kingston, Teddington, Twickenham, Richmond, Isleworth, Brentford, Kew, Mortlake, Barnes, Chiswick, Hammersmith, Putney, Fulham, Wandsworth, Battersea, Chelsea, and Lambeth. Here, on its north bank, are Westminster and London, and, on the opposite side, Southwark; forming together one continued city, extending to Limehouse and Deptford; and hence it rolls to Greenwich, Erith, Greenhithe, Gravesend, and Leigh, into the North Sea. It receives, in its course from Dorchester, the rivers Kennet, Loddon, Coln, Wey, Mole, Wandle, Lea, Roding, Darent, and Medway, and drains a basin estimated at an area of 6,160 square miles. Total Course. 215 miles. It is navigable to Deptford for ships of any burden, and to London Bridge for vessels of 200 tons.

THAMES, a river of New Zealand, on the S.W. shore of which is the town of Auckland.

THAMES, a river of the United States, in Connecticut, which flows south into Long-Island Sound.—Also a river of Upper Canada, which falls into Lake St. Claire.

THAMES-DITTON, temz-dil'-ton, a parish of Surrey, 2 miles from Kingston-on-Thames. Pop. 2,500.

THANET, ISLE OF, thän'-et, the N.E. extremity of the county of Kent, at the mouth of the Thames, separated from the mainland by the river Stour on the south, and by a branch of it called the Nethergong on the west. Ext. About 10 miles from east to west, and 8 from north to south. Desc. The coast of this island terminates in a perpendicular cliff of chalk; the soil is dry, and the air remarkably pure and bracing. The country is open, the surface level, and the prospect extensive; comprehending, in the interior, an expanse of rich and highly-cultivated fields, and, towards the coast, a delightful view of the ocean, varied with the shipping that are here continually passing and repassing. Pop. 32,000.—This was the first possession of the Saxons in Britain. Near the North Foreland there are two large tumuli, said to indicate the scene of a battle fought between the Saxons and the Danes, in 853.

THANN, tan, a town of France, in the department of the Upper Rhine, 22 miles from Colmar. Manf. Cotton, handkerchiefs, twist, hosiery, starch, and salt. Pop. 6,000.

THASOS, THASSUS, or TASSO, thä'-sos, an island in the Ægean Sea, 4 miles from the mainland. Area, 85 square miles. Desc. Fertile and well wooded. Pro. Corn, fruits, oil, and wine. Minerals. Marble. Pop. 6,000.

THAXTED, thäx'-ted, a market-town of the county of Essex, near the source of the Chelmer, 16 miles from Chelmsford. Its parish church is a very large and beautiful structure, in the Gothic style. The interior consists of a nave, transept, chancel, and side aisles. There are also dissenting chapels, almshouses, a school, and other charities. Pop. 2,600.

THEBES, theebs, the remains of a great city, which, at an early period, was the capital of Egypt, and the ruins of which, in Upper Egypt, extend for 7 miles along both banks of the Nile. Among its temples, the most remarkable are those of Karnak and Luxor, on the E. bank of the river. A monolith obelisk of the former has been conveyed to Paris, and erected in the Place de la Concord. Several villages are scattered over the site of this ancient city, the importance of which was destroyed after its capture by Ptolemy Lathyrus, in the 3rd century B.C.

THEDEN, John Christian Antony, tä'-den, a celebrated German surgeon. He entered the army of the king of Prussia as surgeon, and, during the military operations of the Seven Years, displayed so much skill in his profession, that Frederick promoted him to the post of chief military surgeon. After thirty years' service, he commenced writing a series of works upon surgery, which bear the impress of his long experience, and are highly esteemed. The theoretical portion of them, however, being based upon an antiquated principle, is less valuable. B. 1714; D. 1797.

THEISS (Hung. TISZA), tice, a river of Hungary, rising from two springs on the north-east frontier of the kingdom, called the Black and the White Theiss. After a course of 500 miles, it joins the Danube, 22 miles from Peterwardein.

THELLUSSON, Peter Isaac, thell'-lus-son, a native of Geneva, who settled as a merchant in London, where he acquired a prodigious fortune, and who, at his death, in 1798, left about £100,000 to his family, and the remainder of his property, considerably above half a million, was to accumulate to a certain period, when, if there were none of his descendants and name existing, the whole was to be applied by parliament towards paying off the national debt. The family endeavoured to set aside the will in chancery, but without success; and it was not until 1859, after sixty years of litigation, that the "great Thellusson will-case," the oldest lawsuit on record, was decided.

THELWALL, John, thell'-wall, an English writer, who, after spending some time in the study of the law, relinquished it for literature. He commenced his career by publishing a volume of poems, which were well received, and afterwards he became editor of a magazine. Possessed of a ready and attractive style, he joined with Horne Tooke and other political orators of the time, and gained so great a reputation, by his boldness as a political reformer, that he was included with Horne Tooke and Thomas Hardy in the indictment for high treason. After a trial of five days, he was acquitted; whereupon he retired to Wales; but, in 1801, commenced as lecturer and tutor in elocution. In the cure of stammering he was also highly successful, communicating some valuable papers upon the subject to the "Medical and Physical Journal" and the "Monthly Magazine." He was the author of "Poems written in the Tower and in Newgate;" "The Tribune;" "Political Miscellanies;" "A Letter on Stammering;" "The Peripatetic;" and a novel called "The Daughter of Adoption." B. in London, 1764; D. at Bath, 1831.

THEMIS, the'-mis, the goddess of justice among the Greeks. She was the first to whom the inhabitants of the earth raised temples. Her oracle was famous in Attica in the age of Deucalion. She was generally attended by the Seasons. Among the moderns she is represented as holding a sword in one hand and a pair of scales in the other.

THEMISON, them'-is-on, a celebrated Greek physician, who was the disciple of Asclepiades, and, departing from the old system, formed a medical sect called Methodici, which was opposed to that of the Empirici. Flourished in the 1st century before Christ.

THEMISTIUS, the-mis'-ti-us, a Greek orator and philosopher, who acquired so high a reputation, that, though a pagan, Theodosius the Great appointed him tutor to his son Arcadius, previously to which he had been nominated by Julian prefect of Constantinople. He was very intimate with St. Gregory Nazianzen. He wrote commentaries on the philosophy of Plato and Aristotle: the last only is extant. There remain some of his discourses. Flourished in the 4th century.

THEMISTOCLES, the-mis'-to-klees, a celebrated Athenian general. He signalized himself by his courage and address in early life, and fought bravely at Marathon, under Miltiades. When Xerxes invaded Greece, in 480 B.C., Themistocles was at the head of the Athenian republic, and in this capacity the fleet was intrusted to his command. The jealous rivalry of the generals in command of the allied Grecian fleet would have proved fatal to the cause, had not Themistocles freely relinquished his pretensions, and nominated his rival, Eurybiades, as head of the expedition. The Persian fleet was somewhat distressed at Artemisium by a violent storm and the feeble attack of the Greeks; but it was owing to Themistocles that a decisive battle was subsequently fought; for the Greeks, actuated by different views, were unwilling to make a stand at sea against the enemy; Themistocles, however, sent intelligence of their intentions to the Persian monarch. Xerxes, by immediately blocking them with his fleet in the Bay of Salamis, prevented their escape, and obliged them to fight for their safety, as well as for the honour of their country. This battle, which was fought near the island of Salamis, B.C. 480, was decisive, the Greeks obtaining the victory. Further to insure the peace of his country, Themistocles informed the Asiatic monarch, that the Greeks had conspired to cut down the bridge which he had built across the Hellespont, and to prevent his retreat into Asia. Xerxes hastened from Greece, left his forces without a general, and his fleets an easy conquest to the Greeks. Upon his return, Themistocles was received with the greatest honours, and, by his prudent administration, Athens was soon fortified with strong walls, the Piræus was rebuilt, and her harbours were filled with a numerous and powerful navy, which rendered her the mistress of Greece. Yet, in the midst of this glory, the conqueror of Xerxes incurred the displeasure of his countrymen. He was banished from the city, and obliged to seek the protection of a monarch whose fleets he had defeated, and whose father he had ruined. Artaxerxes received the illustrious Athenian with kindness, made him one of his greatest favourites, and, according to oriental customs, bestowed three rich cities upon him, to provide him with bread, wine, and meat. But Themistocles still remembered that Athens gave him birth, and, according to some writers, the wish of not injuring his country, and, therefore, his inability of carrying on war against Greece, at the request of Artaxerxes, obliged him to destroy himself by poison, or drinking bull's blood. The manner of his death, however, is uncertain. His remains were conveyed to Attica, and honoured with a magnificent tomb by the Athenians, who too late repented of their cruelty to the saviour of his country. B. about 514 B.C.; D. about 449 B.C.

THEMISTOGENES, the-mis-toj'-e-nees, a Greek historian, referred to by Xenophon as the author of an account of the expedition of Cyrus. It is, however, conjectured that Xenophon alluded to his own history —the "Anabasis," as the work of another writer.

THEMSCHE, temsh, a market-town of Belgium, on the Scheldt, 9 miles from Dendermonde. Manf. Linens, lace, and printed calicoes. Pop. 6,200.

THENARD, Louis James, Baron, ten'-ar, a celebrated French chemist, who, in his 20th year, became demonstrator in chemistry at the Polytechnic School at Paris. He subsequently rose to the position of professor of chemistry in the College of France. Charles X. created him a baron in 1824. In 1833 he was nominated a peer of France, having, in the meanwhile, been appointed professor in the university. One of the most distinguished chemists in the early portion of the 19th century, he was the author, among other valuable works, of "Physico-Chemical Researches," "Elementary Treatise on Chemistry, Theoretical and Practical," which latter is one of the best works of its kind, and has been reproduced in the German language. He likewise enriched the scientific journals of France with treatises upon almost every department of chemistry. B. 1777; D. at Paris, 1857.

THEOBALD, Louis, the'-o-bawld, an English dramatic writer, who wrote several dramatic pieces of little merit. He is chiefly known by his edition of Shakspere, which, though depreciated by Warburton, possesses considerable merit, and shows no want of judgment. As an editor of Shakspere, he was vastly superior to Pope, whose edition he criticised in a pamphlet entitled "Shakspere restored; or, Specimens of Blunders committed and unamended in Pope's Edition." For this, Pope assailed Theobald with all his powers of ridicule, and made him the hero of the "Dunciad." Theobald revenged himself in an admirable way: he produced an edition of Shakspere which extinguished the inaccurate one of Pope. Pope and Theobald afterwards became reconciled, and the former substituted Colley Cibber for Theobald, as the chief dunce in his satire. He was likewise the author of a Life of Sir Walter Raleigh, and some periodical papers inserted in a weekly journal of his time. B. at Sittingbourne, Kent, date unknown; D. 1744.

THEOBALDUS, or TEBALDUS, te-bal'-dus, a French prelate, who wrote a theological and didactic poem upon twelve animals,—the lion, eagle, serpent, ant, fox, stag, spider, whale, centaur and siren, elephant, dove, and panther. After describing the habits of these animals, he proceeds to make a series of moral and religious speculations thereupon. The poem has likewise been attributed to Hildebert, archbishop of Tours. The title of the work, which was first printed at Antwerp in 1482, is "Physiologus de Naturis Duodecim Animalium." Its date has been variously assigned to the 11th and 12th centuries.

THEOCRITUS, the-ok'-ri-tus, a Greek bucolic poet, of whom little is known beyond the fact that his friend and patron was Ptolemy Philadelphus. He is said to have been strangled by order of Hiero, king of Syracuse, for having written a satire against him. Of his various works, we have only the "Idylls," which are remarkable for their pleasing simplicity and sweetness; twenty-two epigrams, and a fragment of a poem entitled "Berenice." The best editions are Warton's and Reiske's. Theocritus has been translated into English by Polwhele, Creech, and others. Flourished about 280 B.C.

THEODATUS, the-od'-ă-tus, king of the Goths in Italy, was placed on the throne in 534, by his cousin Amalasonta, whom he married; but, some time afterwards, caused to be strangled. The emperor Justinian declared war against him, and Belisarius, his general, marched into Italy; on which the soldiers of Theodatus deposed him, and placed on the throne Vitiges, who put Theodatus to death, in 536.

THEODORA, the-o-do'-ra, a woman who, from being a courtesan, became empress to Justinian, and distinguished herself by her intrigues and enterprises. The name of Theodora is common to many empresses of the East at a later period. D. 548.

THEODORE OF PHARAN, the'-o-dore, so named from a town in Arabia, of which he was bishop. He is held by some writers as being the author of the dogmas of the Monothelites. Flourished under Heraclius.

THEODORETUS, or THEODORITUS, the-od'-o-re'-tus, a church historian. In 423 he was made bishop of Cyrus, in Syria, which office he discharged with great reputation. He was deposed in a synod at Ephesus, as being inclined to Nestorianism; but was restored in the general council of Chalcedon, in 451. He wrote a "History of the Church from 325 to 429," "Commentaries on the Scriptures," "Lives of Saints," and other works. B. about 393; D. 457.

THEODORIC, the-od'-o-rik, king of the Ostrogoths in Italy, was the natural son of Theodomir, and given as a hostage to the emperor Leo Magnus, in 461. He rendered great services to the emperor Zeno, who honoured him with the consulate in 484. He afterwards defeated and put to death Odoacer, and made himself master of all Italy. In 509 he espoused a sister of Clovis, king of the Franks. Theodoric displayed the qualities of a great prince. He regulated the administration of justice, allayed religious disputes, revised the laws, and encouraged commerce. D. 455; D. 526.

THEODORIC I., king of the Visigoths, succeeded Wallia in 420. During the interval 426—436, he made war upon the Romans three times, and attempted to take the city of Narbonne. He obtained territory both in Spain and Gaul, and subsequently became the ally of the Romans against Attila, whom he defeated at Châlons-sur-Marne in 451, but lost his life in the battle. His son Thorismund succeeded him.

THEODORIC II., son of Theodoric I., acquired the throne by the murder of his brother Thorismund, in 453, but was himself killed by Euric, another of the sons of Theodoric I. During his short reign he increased the empire of the Visigoths, and advanced almost as far as the Loire. Killed, 466.

THEODORUS OF MOPSUESTIA, the-o-do'-rus, so named from the place of which he was bishop, a city in Cilicia. His works, which favour Nestorianism and Socinianism, were condemned in the fifth general council. What remains is a "Commentary on the Twelve Greater Prophets," and some fragments. He is held in great respect by the Syrian Christians. D. 429.

THEODORUS OF CYRENE, whose philosophy was so disliked, that he was banished from his native city. He repaired to Athens, and afterwards to Egypt, where he obtained the favour of Ptolemy Soter, who appointed him ambassador to Lysimachus. He was styled the Atheist, for having composed a work in which he denied the existence of the gods. He is regarded as one of the forerunners of Epicurus. Flourished towards the close of the 4th century B.C.

THEODORUS, Priscianus, a physician who resided at the court of the emperor of the East. He was the author of a work in Latin, which is included in the collection of ancient physicians by Rivinus. Supposed to have flourished in the 4th century.

THEODORUS I. succeeded John IV., as bishop of Rome, in 641. He excommunicated Paulus, patriarch of Constantinople, and condemned the heresy of the Monothelites. His successor was Martin I. D. 649.

THEODORUS II. succeeded John IX. in 897, but died in less than a month after his election.

THEODORUS LASCARIS, emperor of Nicæa. (See LASCARIS, Theodorus.)

THEODORUS, or DIODORUS, bishop of Tarsus. He defended the Catholic faith against the emperor Valens, who was an Arian, but became the favourite of Gratian. He was the author of works upon theology and morals, none of which are extant. D. about 394.

THEODORUS OF CÆSAREA was at first a monk at Jerusalem, but repairing to Constantinople about 535, obtained the favour of Justinian, and was nominated archbishop of Cæsarea. Afterwards he was excommunicated and deprived of his see. Flourished in the 6th century.

THEODOSIA, the-o-do'-si-a, a town of Russia, on the coast of the Crimea, with a deep and safe harbour. Pop. 8,500.

THEODOSIUS I., the-o-do'-si-us, a Roman emperor, surnamed the Great. His father, General Theodosius, distinguished himself in Britain and Africa, but was beheaded by order of Valens in 376. The son was called to court by Gratian, associated with himself in the empire, and appointed governor of Thrace and those provinces which Valentinian had possessed in the East. He defeated the Goths in several actions, and compelled them to sue for peace. His fame spread into Persia, and Sapor III. solicited his alliance. In 385 a conspiracy was formed against him, but it was discovered; and Theodosius displayed the magnanimity of his disposition by pardoning the criminals. But in 390 he tarnished his fame in causing the inhabitants of Thessalonica to be put to the sword, on account of an insurrection which had taken place in that city. St. Ambrose was so struck with horror by this transaction, that he refused to admit Theodosius into the church till he had performed penance during eight months. The emperor, having defeated Maximus, marched to Rome, where he received the honours of a triumph; after which he returned to Constantinople and defeated the barbarians, who had ravaged Macedonia and Thrace. He then turned his arms against the usurper Eugenius, who had been placed on the throne after the murder of Valentinian. Having defeated him at Aquileia, he caused him to be beheaded in 394. He thus became emperor of the whole Roman world, and was preparing to reform the administration of his dominions by wise edicts, when his health gave way. Before his death he nominated his son Arcadius to the empire of the East, while that of the West was given to Honorius. B. 345; D. at Milan, 395.

THEODOSIUS II. was grandson of the preceding, and succeeded his father Arcadius, in 408, under the guardianship of his sister Pulcheria. She caused him to marry Athenais, daughter of Leontius, an Athenian philosopher, who, being baptized, took the name of Eudocia. Ardaburius, his general, defeated the Persians with great slaughter near the Euphrates; but Theodosius was less fortunate against the Huns, who overran the European provinces, so that the emperor was obliged to purchase a peace. Theodosius, throughout his life, was emperor only in name, the whole sovereignty being exercised by Pulcheria, his sister. During his reign, the celebrated code of laws known as the Theodosian code, was promulgated. B. 401; D. 450.

THEODOSIUS III. was nominated emperor of the East in succession to Anastasius II., in 715, by the troops of Anastasius. He at first refused the crown, but was forced to accept it. After a reign of one year he abdicated in favour of Leo III.

THEODOTIAN OF EPHESUS, the-o-do'-shun, was of the Ebionite sect of Christians, and made a translation into Greek of the Old Testament. Flourished early in the 2nd century.

THEODOTUS OF BYZANTIUM, the-od'-o-tus, surnamed the Tanner, from his occupation. In the persecution under Marcus Aurelius he was arrested, and, to save his life, renounced the Christian religion. The faithful having reproached him for his apostasy, he invented the heretical notion that Christ was only a man. He was excommunicated, but obtained many followers, who were called Theodotians.

THEOGNIS, the-og'-nis, a Greek elegiac poet. There remain of his some fragments printed in the collection of comic poets by Aldus. B. at Megara, and flourished towards the close of the 6th century.

THEON, the'-on, a Greek sophist, who wrote a poetical treatise of rhetoric, entitled "Progymnasmata." Flourished in the 1th century.

THEON, a celebrated Greek painter, who was accounted one of the first artists of his time. His paintings are alluded to by Pliny, Plutarch, and Ælian. Flourished under Philip and Alexander of Macedon.

THEON OF ALEXANDRIA, surnamed the Younger, a philosopher and mathematician in the time of Theodosius the Great, was father of the celebrated Hypatia. He wrote a Commentary on Euclid and on Aratus. Flourished in the 4th century.

THEON OF SMYRNA, surnamed the Elder, a Platonic philosopher, who is stated to have composed a work upon arithmetic, music, astronomy, and geometry, which has been lost. Flourished under Ptolemy.

THEOPHANES, George, the-of'-a-nees, a Greek historian, who entered into the monastic state, and was received with distinction at the seventh general council; but was exiled by the emperor Leo the Armenian. He wrote a Chronicle beginning where Syncellus ends, and reaching to the reign of Michael Curopalatus. D. 818.

THEOPHANES, Prokopovitch, a Russian historian, who became archbishop of Novgorod. He wrote the "Life of Peter the Great," and some theological treatise. B. 1681; D. 1736.

THEOPHANO, empress of the East, the-of'-an-o, who was a woman of obscure birth. Having become the wife of Romanus II., she evinced a treacherous and intriguing disposition. She poisoned her husband in 963, and placed her paramour Nicephorus Phocus upon the throne, whom she married, but caused to be assassinated, in order that she might espouse John Zimisces. The latter, however, banished Theophano shortly after being proclaimed emperor. She was recalled to Constantinople by her son Basil II., in 985.

THEOPHILUS, the-of'-i-lus, bishop of Antioch. He was at first a heathen; but was converted to Christianity on reading the Bible. His "Defence of Christianity" was edited by Gesner, at Zurich, and is appended to the works of Justin. Flourished in the 2nd century.

THEOPHILUS, emperor of the East, was the son and successor of Michael II. He punished with great severity all who were implicated in the murder of Leo V.; was an iconoclast, and remained almost continually at war with the caliph Motassem, whose native city, Zapetra, in Syria, he destroyed. Motassem, however, revenged this insult by sacking Armorium, the birthplace of Theodosius. D. 842.

THEOPHILUS, a jurist of Constantinople, who, with Dorotheus and Trebonian, compiled the "Institutes of Justinian." Of this undertaking he left an excellent paraphrase in Greek, which was discovered in the 16th century, at Louvain. Flourished in the 6th century.

THEOPHILUS, surnamed the Monk and the Priest, a Latin writer, who composed a work upon painting on velvet, wood, and in fresco. The work also treated of mosaics, painting on glass, and gave some curious receipts for the mixing of colours. Lived in the 12th century.

THEOPHILUS PROTOSPATHARIUS, pro-tos-path-a'-ri-us, a Greek writer upon medicine; five of whose treatises upon anatomy and physiology are extant. Nothing is known relative to his life. Supposed to have lived in the 7th century.

THEOPHRASTUS, the-o-fras'-tus, a Greek philosopher. Plato was his first master; but he afterwards became a disciple of Aristotle, who had a great esteem for him, and gave him the surname of Theophrastus, 'one who speaks divinely,' his original name being Tyrtamus. He succeeded that philosopher in his school at Athens, and his name became so celebrated, that he was attended by two thousand pupils, who came from all parts of Greece. Only a few of his works are extant; the most important of them being—"History of Stones," of which Hill has given an English translation; "Treatise of Plants," and "Moral Characters:" these have also been translated into English. The best edition of his works is that of Aldus. B. at Eresus, in the island of Lesbos, about 370 B.C.; D. at Athens, at a very advanced age.

THEOPHYLACTUS, the-o-fil-ac'-tus, archbishop of Achris, and metropolitan of Bulgaria in the 11th century. He wrote Commentaries on the Gospels and Acts of the Apostles; also on some of the minor prophets and Epistles.

THEOTOCOPULI, Dominic, the-o-to-cop'-u-li, an eminent painter, sculptor, and architect, who studied under Titian. He is supposed to have been a Greek; but he settled at Toledo, and was engaged by Philip II. to decorate the Escurial with his works. He designed several Spanish churches, and executed sculptures for them. D. at Toledo, 1625.—His son Manuel also achieved celebrity as a sculptor and architect. He designed a portion of the cathedral of Toledo. D. 1631.

THERAMENES, the-ram'-e-nees, an Athenian philosopher and general, was one of the thirty tyrants who assumed the government of Athens; but he opposed their cruelties; on which Critias, one of his colleagues, accused him of being an enemy to the state, and Theramenes was condemned to take poison, 404 B.C.

THERESIENSTADT, or MARIEN THERESIENSTADT, tai-ra'-si-en-stat, a town of the south of Hungary, in the palatinate of Bacs, 25 miles from Szegedin. It is an assemblage of villages, or rather one vast overgrown village, and has large barracks for lodging soldiers. It has a Catholic church for the Servians, a Greek for the Rascians, and a Franciscan monastery for Catholics. Weavers and tanners are the most numerous class. Pop. 34,000.

THERESIENSTADT, a fortified place of Bohemia, in the angle formed by the Elbe and the Egra, at their junction, 31 miles from Prague. Its fortress was built in 1780, by Joseph II.

THERMIA, ther'-mi-a, an island of European Turkey, in the Grecian Archipelago, belonging to the Cyclades, and situate about 40 miles from the island of Paros. Area, 48 square miles. Desc. Fertile; producing wheat, barley, wine, figs, honey, and some silk. It derives its name from the hot springs which are on its E. side. Pop. 6,000.

THERMOPYLÆ, ther-mop'-i-le, a pass in the north-east of Greece, at the base of Mount Œta, famous for the fate of Leonidas and his 300 Spartans, who here devoted themselves to their country, 480 B.C. It consists of a narrow passage, between high cliffs on one side, and on the other the sea, or an impassable marsh, formed by alluvial deposits, 9 miles from Lamia.

THERSITES, ther-si'-tees, an officer, the most deformed and illiberal of the Greeks during the Trojan war. He was fond of ridiculing his fellow-soldiers, particularly Agamemnon, Achilles, and Ulysses. Achilles killed him with one blow of his fist, because he laughed at his mourning the death of Penthesilea.

THÉRY, Augustin Francis, tai'-ry, a modern French writer, who, in 1826, was appointed censor of studies, and retained the appointment until the year 1847. He was the author of "History of Literary Opinion," "Lectures on the Profession of Schoolmaster," "An Abridgment of the History of England," and several other important educational works. He was a member of many learned bodies, and, in 1845, was created an officer of the Legion of Honour. D. at Paris, 1796.

THESEUS, the'-se-us, king of Athens, and the national hero of that state. He was the son of Ægeus by Æthra, the daughter of Pittheus, and was educated at Trœzene, in the house of his father-in-law. When he came to years of maturity, he was sent by his mother to Athens, a sword being given him, by which he might make himself known to Ægeus. In his way from Trœzene to Athens, he destroyed Corynetes, Synnis, Sciron, Cercyon, Procrustes, and the celebrated Phæa. At Athens, however, his reception was not cordial; Medea lived there with Ægeus, and she attempted to destroy him before his arrival was made public. Ægeus was himself to give the poison to his son at a feast; but the sight of his sword on the side of Theseus, reminded him of his love for Æthra. The Pallantids, who attempted to assassinate Theseus, were all put to death by the young prince. The bull of Marathon was next destroyed by him. He afterwards went to Crete, where, by means of Ariadne, who was enamoured of him, he killed the Minotaur (see MINOTAUR), and thereby redeemed the Athenians from the annual tribute of the seven chosen youths, and as many virgins, to be devoured by the monster. In the island of Naxos he, however, abandoned Ariadne, to whom he was indebted for his safety. On his return to Athens, he neglected to hoist white sails, which were to denote his success; whereupon, Ægeus, thinking his son lost, threw himself into the sea. His ascent to his father's throne was universally applauded. The Athenians were governed with mildness, and Theseus made new regulations, and enacted new laws. The fame which he had gained by his victories and policy, caused Pirithous, king of the Lapithæ, to seek his friendship. (See PIRITHOUS.) Theseus was present at the nuptials of his friend, and he was the most courageous of the Lapithæ, in the defence of Hippodamia against the brutal attempts of the Centaurs. (See LAPITHÆ and CENTAURS.) Theseus afterwards, in conjunction with Pirithous, carried off Helen, the daughter of Leda; but the resentment of Castor and Pollux soon obliged him to restore her to them. Others declare that he was delivered from Hades, whither he had gone with Pirithous to carry off Proserpine, by Hercules. During the captivity of Theseus in the kingdom of Pluto, Mnestheus obtained the crown in preference to the children of the absent monarch. At his return, Theseus attempted to eject the usurper, but to no purpose. He retired with great mortification to the court of Lycomedes, king of the island of Scyros, who, either jealous of his fame or bribed by the presents of Mnestheus, carried him to a high rock, on pretence of showing him the extent of his dominions, and threw him down a deep precipice. The children of Theseus, after the death of Mnestheus, recovered the Athenian throne.

THESIGER, Sir Frederick, thes'-i-jer, a modern English lawyer, who at first served as a midshipman in the royal navy, which he quitted to study the law. In 1818 he was called to the bar, and after rising to a large practice, and becoming the leader of the Home circuit, was nominated king's counsel in 1834. In 1840 he was returned to parliament as M.P. for Woodstock, for which place he sat until 1844, when, on being appointed solicitor-general under the Peel ministry, he became a candidate for, and was elected to represent, Abingdon. At the death of Sir William Follett he was appointed attorney-general; but the Peel ministry vacating office soon afterwards, he retired with his party. Under the Derby administration of 1852, he again became attorney-general, and lord chancellor, as Lord Chelmsford, in 1858. B. in London, 1794.

THESPIS, thes'-pis, a Greek poet of Attica, who, according to the ancient tradition, was the inventor of tragedy. He went from town to town in a waggon, on which was erected a temporary stage, where two actors, with faces daubed with the lees of wine, entertained the audience with choral songs and speeches. He is said to have written tragedies, which are lost. Flourished about 535 B.C.

THESPIUS, thes'-pi-us, king of the Thespiades, and father of fifty daughters, all of whom bore children to Hercules. The Thespiades were conducted to Sardinia by Iolus.

THESSALONICA. (See SALONICA.)

THESSALUS, thes'-sa-lus, a Greek physician, who resided at the court of Archelaus, king of Macedonia. He assisted to establish the sect of Dogmatici, called also the Hippocratic school. Some of the writings which are known under the name of Hippocrates, are supposed to have been written by Thessalus. Flourished about 360 B.C.

THESSALUS, a Greek physician, who was one of the founders of the Methodici school of medicine. His vanity was so excessive, that he styled himself "the conqueror of physicians." Galen accused him of being ignorant of the action of drugs. Flourished in the 1st century.

THESSALY, thes'-sa-ly, one of the S. provinces of European Turkey, bounded on the E. by part of the Ægean, which forms the Gulf of Salonica; W. by high mountains of the Pindus range; N. by Macedonia, and S. by Greece. Area, 5,500 square miles. Desc. It is one of the finest provinces of the country, containing fertile plains, watered by streams descending from the mountains in the west, and flowing into the Ægean Sea. These plains, equally renowned in ancient times for pasture and tillage, continue highly fertile, producing maize, wheat, rice, vines, silk, cotton, and tobacco. Rivers. The most remarkable is the Salympria, or ancient Peneus. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. between 39° and 40° 30′ N. Lon. between 21° 30′ and 23° 25′ E.—On the N. frontier of this province is the Mount Olympus of antiquity, and one of its plains, Pharsalia, is memorable for being the scene of the decisive action between Cæsar and Pompey.

THETFORD, thet'-ford, a market-town of Norfolk, on the Ouse, at its confluence with the Thet, 29 miles from Norwich. It has several churches, — St. Peter's, St. Cuthbert's, and St. Mary the Less. St. Peter's, commonly called the Black church, from its being built chiefly of flint, consists of a chancel, nave, two aisles, and a tower. Of the monastery of St. Sepulchre, which was founded in the year 1139, there are still some remains. The conventual church has been long converted into a barn. The site is called Canons. At the eastern extremity of the town are some considerable remains of fortifications; and it has a guildhall, where the Lent assizes for the county are held, a grammar-school, almshouses, and other charities. The Ouse is navigable up to the town. Pop. 4,100.—This place is supposed to occupy the site of the ancient Sitomagus, and was for a short time the capital of the kingdom of East Anglia. In the 7th century it was the see of the bishopric of Norfolk and Suffolk. It has a station on the Eastern Counties Railway.

THETIS, the'-tis, one of the sea deities, who was courted by Neptune and Jupiter; but, when the gods were informed that the son she should bring forth must become greater than his father, they ceased their solicitations, and Peleus, the son of Æacus, was permitted to gain her hand. Thetis became mother of several children, among them Achilles, whom she rendered invulnerable by plunging him in the waters of the Styx, except that part of the heel by which she held him.

THEUDIS, thu'-dis, king of the Visigoths, who was elected as the successor of Amalaric, in 531. He sustained a war against the Franks, whom, in 542, he drove out of Saragossa; but was repulsed at Ceuta by the Greeks. Although an Arian, he tolerated the orthodox faith. He was the last of the Visigothic kings that resided in Spain. Assassinated at Barcelona, 548.

THÉVENOT, Melchisedeck, taive'-no, a learned French writer, who became librarian to the Royal Library of France. He produced a collection of voyages and travels, including those of Hakluyt and Purchas, which are highly esteemed; a "History of the Academy of Sciences," of which he was one of the founders, and other works. B. 1621; D. 1692.

THÉVENOT, John, a celebrated French traveller, who was nephew of the preceding. He travelled in England, Germany, and Italy; and, having made the acquaintance of the celebrated D'Herbelot at Rome, he, at the latter's suggestion, set out upon a journey of exploration in Asia. After visiting Egypt, Persia, and India, he died on his route from Ispahan to Tabriz. He made a collection of the plants of India and Persia, and wrote an account of his travels, which was published after his death, at Amsterdam. He introduced coffee into France. B. at Paris, 1633; D. 1667.

THIAKI. (See ITHACA.)

TIAN-SHAN, te'-an-shan, the 'Celestial Mountains,' a lofty chain of Chinese Turkestan, forming the N. boundary of the great table-land of Central Asia, and extending between lat. 42° and 43° N., lon. 80° to 90° E.

THIBAUT, tib'-o, fifth count of Champagne, and first king of Navarre. He succeeded to the crown of Navarre at the death of Sancho the Strong, in 1234, and, in 1239, set out upon a crusade in the Holy Land; but after experiencing defeat at Cæsarea, and at Ascalon, he abandoned his army to its fate, and returned to his kingdom. Sixty-six poems are said to have been written by him; on account of which he takes high rank among the Troubadours. B. 1201; D. at Pamplona, 1253.

THIBAUT, Anthony Justus Frederick, an eminent German writer upon jurisprudence, who became a judge of the grand-duchy of Baden, and a knight. His writings, which are highly esteemed, principally are,—"On the Necessity of a Common Code of Laws for Germany;" "Essays on Civil Law;" "On Several Branches of the Theory of Law;" and "On Possession and Prescription." B. at Halmeln, Hanover, 1772; D. 1840.

THIBET. (See TIBET.)

THIEL, or TIEL, teel, a neat town of the Netherlands, near the river Waal, 20 miles from Utrecht. Pop. 5,200

THIELE, teel(r), a river of Switzerland, running through the cantons of Vaud and Bern, and, after a course of 65 miles, joining the Aar, 5 miles from Bienne.

THIELT, teelt, a town of Belgium, in West Flanders, 18 miles from Ghent. Manf. Linen and lace, soap, leather, and hats. Pop. 13,000.

THIERRY, Amedée-Simon-Dominique, tee'-er-re, a French historian, who became master of requests in the council of state. He assisted his brother Augustin in several of the great works produced by the latter, and himself wrote,—"History of Gaul under the Roman Dominion;" "History of Attila;" and "History of the Gauls, from the most remote period until the Conquest of Gaul." B. at Blois, 1797.

THIERRY, Jacques-Nicholas-Augustin, a celebrated French historian, who was at first a teacher in a school; but repairing to Paris in 1814, he, in a few years, attracted attention by his contributions to the liberal journals of that metropolis. In 1820 he was engaged to write a series of letters upon French history for the Courrier Français; but his opinions having been attacked, he quitted that journal, and resolved to entirely devote himself to historical inquiry. After four years of assiduous study, he produced his "History of the Conquest of England by the Normans," a work which, despite its peculiar theories, has become celebrated, not alone in France, but also in England and Germany. For a time his eyesight so far failed him that he was reduced to a condition of total blindness; but in that melancholy period he received material assistance from his brother, the precedingly-named, and his wife, Julia Thierry. Consistent in his principles, refusing political employment, he remained a devoted follower of historical research, finding in that course of life something, as he himself expressed it, "better than property—better than health." His other works were,—"Ten Years of Historical Study;" "Letters on the History of France;" "Collections of Documents relative to the History of France;" and the "Times of the Merovingians." As an historian, he is excelled by neither Michelet nor Guizot, the greatest historical writers of his country. He was a member of the Legion of Honour, and of the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles-Lettres. B. at Blois, 1795; D. 1856.

THIERRY, Julia, a modern French authoress, who was the wife of the preceding. Besides assisting him in his historical works, she herself produced a number of interesting works, the most important of which were,—"Pictures of Manners in the 18th and 19th Centuries;" and some excellent essays for the Revue des Deux Mondes. D. 1844.

THIERS, Louis Adolphe, tee'-er, a celebrated French statesman and historian. It was intended to place him at the Ecole Polytechnique at Paris, in order to qualify him for a military career; but the fall of the empire, and the peace which ensued, leaving only a faint prospect of success to a young military man who possessed no influence, he resolved to adopt the law as a profession, and accordingly entered the college of Aix, where he distinguished himself by his talents for the acquisition of knowledge. He set up in practice as an advocate; but meeting with little success, he resolved to apply himself to literature, and, with that view, repaired to Paris. After acquiring some celebrity as writer of political articles for various French newspapers, he, in 1823, produced the first volume of the "History of the French Revolution." This work, which was not completed until 1830, had but little success at the outset. The revolution of 1830, however, allowed him to take a prominent position. With Armand Carrel, Béranger, and others, he had previously exhibited great energy in denouncing the governmental system of the Bourbons; and when Louis Philippe became the constitutional king of France, Thiers, as one of the chief promoters of the new order of things, was rewarded with a post in the ministry of Finance. He next rose to the highest reputation as a parliamentary orator, and upon the formation of the Soult ministry, in 1832, Thiers became minister of the Interior, an office he exchanged for the ministry of Foreign Affairs, in 1836. As a statesman, he evinced a policy antagonistic to England, and somewhat in favour of war. Opposed by Guizot, he was at length supplanted by the latter; whereupon Thiers returned to authorship, and devoted his leisure to the composition of his "History of the Consulate and the Empire." In politics he was regarded as one of the leaders of the opposition to the measures of the king and his minister Guizot, until the revolution of 1848. At that period he could not succeed in attaining to a prominent position, chiefly distinguishing himself as an orator in the National Assembly, where he denounced some of the pet schemes of the republicans; such, for instance, as rights of labour, the national workshops, and other socialistic theories. As an adherent to the cause of the Orleans family, he was exiled from France at the coup d'état. He took up his residence first at Brussels, and then in London; but subsequently returned to the French capital on declaring his acquiescence with the empire. No statesman of modern times has been more often charged with want of earnestness and of principle. As an historian, his brilliant talents are obscured by his want of truth and candour. "He has unquestionably surpassed all his predecessors," observes an eminent critic, "in the ease and vigour of his style, in his descriptive power, in his delineation of the character of Napoleon, in his view of the organization and inner life of the first empire. . . . It is the picture of the first empire, and the apotheosis of its chief. The representation, indeed, may not always be accurate, and the panegyric not always just. . . . But we complain of this history, not simply for its mis-statements of facts and its false political reasonings, but also its false morality. We have said that it is the aim of this work to vindicate the first empire. In order to attain this end, the author's facts are strained to meet a distorted morality, and his judgment is often strained to meet a distortion of facts." B. at Marseilles, 1797.

THIERS, John Baptist, a learned French divine, who, after being a professor in the University of Paris, obtained the benefice of Champrond, in the diocese of Chartres, where he embroiled himself in disputes with his superiors respecting ecclesiastical dues. He wrote a treatise on "Superstitions respecting the Sacraments," "A History of Perukes," and several other curious works. B. at Chartres, about 1636; D. 1703.

THIERS, a town of France, in the department of the Puy-de-Dôme, 22 miles from Clermont. The buildings in the outskirts of the town have a pleasing appearance, being painted in fresco in the Italian style; but the interior presents nothing but dark, crowded, and winding streets, bordered with gloomy and ill-built houses. Manf. Cutlery, paper, and candles. Pop. 14,000.

THIERSCH, Frederick William, a modern German writer, who distinguished himself as a promoter of the establishment of educational institutions throughout Germany, and by his works upon classical literature. B. near Freiburg, 1784.

THION DE LA CHAUME, Claude Esprit, tee'awn(g)-dla-shome, a celebrated French physician, who, in 1782, became chief physician to the troops engaged at the siege of Gibraltar, and there distinguished himself by his arrangements for the cure of the soldiers attacked by fever. He was the author of several valuable papers on medical subjects; but his death, at an early age, cut short a very promising career. B. at Paris, 1750; D. at Montpellier, 1786.

THIONVILLE, tee'-awn(g)-veel, a fortified town of France, on the Moselle, over which is a fine wooden bridge, 17 miles from Metz. Manf. Gloves, hosiery, and oils. Pop. 8,400.—This place was a residence of the Merovingian and Carlovingian kings, and was repeatedly besieged during the wars between Austria and France.

THIRLBY, Styan, thurl'-be, a learned English critic. He was a doctor of laws of the university of Cambridge, and wrote a tract against Whiston on the Trinity; but he is principally known by his excellent edition of Justin's works. B. about 1692; D. 1753.

THIRLWALL, Dr. Connop, thurl'-wall, a modern English prelate and historical writer, who at first studied for the legal profession, and was called to the bar; but subsequently entered into holy orders, and became bishop of St. David's. He was the author of a "History of Greece," and also assisted in making a translation of Niebuhr's "History of Rome." B. at Stepney, 1797.

THIRSK, thursk, a market-town and borough of Yorkshire, on a brook called Coatbeck, over which are two small but substantial stone bridges, 20 miles from York. In the centre of the town is the market-place, and the church is a handsome Gothic building. The moat and rampart of an ancient castle are still to be seen, but no vestige of the building remains. It has several dissenting chapels and numerous schools. Manf. Coarse linens and sacking. Pop. 4,800.—It has a station on the York and Newcastle Railway.

THISBE. (See PYRAMUS.)

THISTLETON, this'-el-ton, a town of Rutlandshire, 7 miles from Oakham. Pop. 200.

THIVA, or STIBES, tee'-va, a town standing on the site of the ancient Thebes. (See THEBES.)

THOLUCK, Frederick Augustus Gottren, tol'-uk, a celebrated modern German theologian, who became professor of theology at Halle. His most important works, several of which were translated into English, are,—"Translation and Exposition of the Psalms;" "Authenticity of the Evangelical History" (an answer to the "Life of Jesus" of Strauss); "Sermons on the Chief Phases of the Christian Faith and Life;" and "Hours of Devotion." B. at Breslau, 1799.

THOM, James, tom, a Scotch sculptor, who was brought up to the trade of a stonemason; but, having taught himself the art of sculpture, he attracted considerable reputation by his carvings, in sandstone, of Tam O'Shanter, Souter Johnnie, and other figures illustrative of the verses of Burns. In London, the exhibition of his works was at one time very popular; but in time its attractiveness declined, and Thom paid a visit to the United States, where he was so well received, that he resolved to settle there. He subsequently relinquished sculpture, and occupied himself with farming and architecture. His "Tam O'Shanter" and "Souter Johnnie" are placed near the Burns monument on the banks of the Doon. B. in Ayrshire, 1799; D. at New York, 1850.

THOM, William, a Scotch poet, called "the weaver-poet of Inverury." In his tenth year he was apprenticed to the trade of a handloom weaver. In the leisure left from this occupation, he "picked up a little reading and writing;" made an attempt to acquire the Latin language, but was defeated for want of time; and learned to play the German flute. He married, and had a family of four children; but in 1837, in consequence of some commercial failures, he was thrown out of employment, and, in order to obtain work, had to perform a dreary journey in the cold weather, from his residence at Newtyle, near Cupar Angus, in Forfarshire, to Aberdeen. One of his children died on the journey. His first effort as a song-writer was made at this time. He composed some verses to his flute, and, by offering copies of it at the houses on his road, obtained the means of progressing to his destination. He subsequently forwarded some verses to the Aberdeen Herald, which attracting much attention, his other poems were published. Thom was invited to London, where a dinner was given in his honour; but, after his return to Inverury, he fell into great distress. In 1841 he produced a small volume entitled "Rhymes and Recollections of a Handloom Weaver," which contained verses of great melody and sweetness of sentiment, combined with much taste; but they were far from receiving the success to which their merits entitled them. After his death, a subscription, amounting to about £250, was raised for his destitute family. B. at Aberdeen, 1799; D. at Inverury, 1850.

THOMAR, to'-mar, a town of Portugal, in Estremadura, 17 miles from Abrantes. Manf. Cotton, thread, and silk fabrics. Pop. 4,000.

THOMAS, tom'-as, a county of the United States, in S. Georgia. Area, 1,350 square miles. Pop. 10,500.

THOMAS, William, a learned English prelate, who was, in 1677, consecrated bishop of St. David's, whence he was translated to Worcester. He wrote an apology for the Church of England; "Roman Oracles silenced;" and several sermons. B. at Bristol, 1613; D. 1689.

THOMAS, William, an eminent English divine, and grandson of the preceding. An industrious antiquary, he published an improved edition of Dugdale's "History of Warwickshire," and "A Survey of the Cathedral of Worcester." D. 1738.

THOMAS, Elizabeth, an English poetess, who, having given offence to Pope, was, under the name of Corinna, mentioned in no honourable terms in the Dunciad. B. 1675; D. 1730.

THOMAS, Anthony Leonard, an eminent French author, who, at an early age, wrote Reflections, historical and literary, on Voltaire's poem of "Natural Religion," in which he defended Christianity with great energy. In 1759 his Eloge of the Marshal Saxe was crowned by the French Academy. He afterwards celebrated the memories of D'Aguessau, Du Guay-Trouin, Sully, Des Cartes, and Marcus Aurelius. He also wrote an essay on the Character, Manners, and Minds of Females; an essay upon Elogies, and some poems. B. at Clermont, Auvergne, 1732; D. 1785.

THOMAS, Catimpratensis, a French writer, who was a monk, taught theology at Louvain, and was afterwards celebrated as a preacher in France, Germany, and Belgium. He was the author of several lives of the saints, some Latin poems, and a treatise upon morality, entitled, "Bonum universale de Apibus." He is also stated by some authors to have made translations of Aristotle. His biographies are included in the "Acta Sanctorum" of the Bollandists. B. 1201; D. 1270.

THOMAS, St., one of the twelve apostles of Jesus Christ, is presumed to have been a native of Galilee. He is distinguished in the sacred history by his disbelief of the resurrection of his master; on which Jesus vouchsafed to permit him to put his fingers into his wounds, and Thomas exclaimed, "My Lord and my God." He is supposed to have suffered martyrdom in Coromandel, where there are still Christian churches which are called by his name.

THOMAS, St., a Portuguese island in the Gulf of Guinea, off the coast of Africa, just N. of the equator. Area, 145 square miles. Desc. Fertile, but unhealthy in the low lands. In its centre is the peak of Santa Anna, rising to a height of 7,020 feet above the level of the sea. Pro. Maize, dates, manioc, sweet potatoes, cotton, sugar, indigo, cocoa-nuts, and cannella bark. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 0° 5′ to 0° 50′ N. Lon. 6° 25′ E.

THOMAS, St., the principal of the Virgin Islands, in the West Indies, belonging to the Danes, 10 miles from Tortola. Area, 44 square miles. Desc. Hilly and unfertile generally. Pro. Potatoes, millet, manioc, and most sorts of fruits and herbage, especially sugar, cotton, and tobacco. The town, which begins about 50 or 60 paces west of the harbour, consists chiefly of one long street, at the end of which is the Danish factory. Pop. 13,000. Lat. 18° 20′ N. Lon. 64° 55′ W. In March, 1801, it was taken by the British, but was given up at the peace of Amiens; but was again taken in the course of the subsequent war, and was restored to Denmark at the peace of Paris in 1814. The town is the chief station of the packets between Southampton and the West Indies.

THOMAS, ST., the name of several parishes and villages of France, none with a population above 1,600.

THOMAS À BECKET. (See BECKET, Thomas à.)

THOMAS À KEMPIS. (See KEMPIS, Thomas à.)

THOMAS AQUINAS. (See AQUINAS, Thomas.)

THOMASIN, or TOMASIN, tom-as′-in, an old German poet, who produced a poem upon "Courteous Manners," which is lost; but there exists by him a poem entitled "The Italian Guest," which was in reality a philosophical treatise on the physical and spiritual welfare of man. This poem, which is a masterpiece of early German literature, has never been published entire, but fragments of it are contained in the "History of the Poetical Literature of Germany," by Gervinus. Flourished in the 13th century.

THOMASIUS, tho-ma′-si-us, James, a learned German professor, who was the tutor of Leibnitz, and was distinguished for his philosophical talents. His principal works are,—"The Origin of Philosophical and Ecclesiastical History;" and several learned dissertations. B. 1622; D. 1684.

THOMASIUS, Christian, a celebrated German writer, and son of the preceding. He published a German literary journal, for some articles in which he was obliged to quit Leipsic and go to Berlin. The king of Prussia made him professor of law in the university of Halle. He introduced the plan of delivering lectures in German, which, before his time, had always been given in the Latin tongue. A man of great learning and sound sense, he was the determined enemy of old prejudices, pedantry, and antiquated superstitions. Frederick the Great said of him, "He denounced trials for witchcraft so loudly, that persons began to be ashamed of them; and from that time the female sex has been permitted to grow old and die in peace." He wrote voluminously upon jurisprudence, morals, and natural law. B. at Leipsic, 1655; D. at Halle, 1728.

THOMASTOWN, tom′-as-town, a town of Ireland, in Kilkenny, on the Nore, over which is a beautiful bridge, 8 miles from Kilkenny. It was formerly inclosed by walls. Pop. 2,200.

THOMASTOWN, a post township of the United States, in Lincoln county, Maine, on the river St. George, 36 miles from Augusta. Pop. 3,000.

THOMOND, Thomas, tom′-awn(g), a French architect, who, at the Revolution, emigrated to Russia, and became a major in the service of that country. He was subsequently extensively employed as an architect, for which profession he had been educated. He improved, and, in part, reconstructed, the great theatre, and erected the exchange, at St. Petersburg, as also the tomb of the emperor Paul at Paulovska, the theatre at Odessa, &c. B. a Nancy, 1759; D. in Russia, 1813.

THOMPSON, Sir Benjamin. (See RUMFORD, Count.)

THOMPSON, tomp′-sun, the name of numerous townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 5,000.

THOMPSON, Rev. R. Anchor, a modern English divine and writer upon theology. He received his education at the university of Cambridge, and became master of the hospital of St. Mary the Virgin, at Newcastle-upon-Tyne. His principal works were, "Christian Theism," and "Principles of Natural Theology." B. at Durham, 1821.

THOMPSON, Major-General Thomas Perronet, a modern English politician and author, who was educated at Queen's College, Cambridge, where, in 1802, he took the B.A. degree. After serving for a time in the royal navy, he entered upon a military career, was at the attack upon Buenos Ayres in 1807, and subsequently participated in the battles of Nivelle, Nive, Orthes, and Toulouse. In 1819 he was appointed secretary and Arabic interpreter to Sir William Grant Keir, the commander of the expedition dispatched to the Persian Gulf. Subsequently to his return to England in 1821, he was associated with Jeremy Bentham and Dr., afterwards Sir John, Bowring, in the proprietorship of the "Westminster Review." In 1827 he produced his "Corn-Law Catechism," which may be said to have formed the basis of the Anti-Corn Law League which afterwards sprang into existence. Free trade and parliamentary reform were subjects to which his pen was constantly devoted, and in the advocacy of which he wrote articles for the "Westminster Review," pamphlets, and letters to the newspapers. He was also the assiduous supporter of a liberal policy as a speaker in the House of Commons and at public meetings. In 1854 he was promoted to the grade of major-general. He was the author, among other works, of—"Catechism on the Currency;" an "Enharmonic Theory of Music;" and "Geometry without Axioms." A collected edition of his works, political and others, was published in 6 vols. in 1843. B. at Hull, Yorkshire, 1783.

THOMPSON, William, an eminent Irish naturalist, who was educated for a commercial career; but having, while an apprentice to a linendraper, imbibed a taste for natural history, from a perusal of Bewick's "British Birds," he followed it as an amateur during several years, and at length abandoned business for natural science. In 1841 he was permitted to accompany Professor Edward Forbes upon a voyage of observation in the Ægean Sea, in H.M.S. Beacon. He became a member of the Royal Irish Academy, and was elected president of the Natural History and Philosophical Society of Belfast. His most important contributions to science were,—"On some rare Irish Birds;" "On the Natural History of Ireland, with a Description of a New Genus of Fishes;" "Report on the Fauna of Ireland, division Vertebrata;" and numerous papers inserted in the "Annals of Natural History." The Bibliography of the Ray Society enumerates more than seventy papers upon subjects on natural history by him. B. at Belfast, 1805; D. in London, 1852.

THOMPSON, Edward, an English poet, who, in early life, was pressed on board a man-of-war, and rose to the rank of lieutenant in 1757. At the end of the war he retired on half-pay, and occupied himself with literature. His principal works were "The Soldier," a poem; "The Courtezan," "Sailor's Letters;" a ludicrous account of the jubilee at Stratford-upon-Avon, under the title of "Trinculo's Trip to the Jubilee;" "The Fair Quaker," a comedy altered from Shadwell; and an edition of the works of Andrew Marvell. B. at Hull, Yorkshire, about 1720; D. on the coast of Africa, 1786.

THOMS, William, toms, a modern English antiquarian writer, who, early in life, was appointed to a clerkship in the secretary's office at Chelsea Hospital, and subsequently became clerk in the Printed Papers department of the House of Lords. His first efforts in literature consisted of contributions to the "Foreign Quarterly Review." In 1828 he produced a collection of "Early Prose Romances," and, subsequently, "Lays and Legends of Various Nations," "Anecdotes and Traditions," an edition of Stow's "Survey of London," and a translation of Worsaae's "Primeval Antiquities of Denmark." He was secretary of the Camden Society, and in 1849 started "Notes and Queries," a work containing a profusion of valuable and curious articles. B. in London, 1803.

THOMSON, Anthony Todd, tom′-son, a modern Scotch physician and writer upon medicine, who studied at Edinburgh, where he made the acquaintance of Brougham, Lansdowne, Jeffrey, and others, with whom he was associated as a member of the celebrated Speculative Society. In 1800 he established himself in practice in London, and, in the leisure left from his professional pursuits, composed a number of works of great value. The most important of these works were,—"Conspectus Pharmacopiæ," "London Dispensatory," "Lectures on Botany," and some articles to the "Cyclopædia of Practical Medicine." In 1828 he became professor of materia medica and, in 1832, of medical jurisprudence in the London University, now University College. B. at Edinburgh, 1778; D. at Ealing, 1849.

THOMSON, Mrs. Anthony Todd, a modern English authoress, who was the wife of the preceding. She produced Memoirs of the court of Henry VIII.; of Sarah, Duchess of Marlborough; of Viscountess Sandon, mistress of the robes to the consort of George II.; "Recollections of Literary Characters and Celebrated Places," which originally appeared in the pages of "Bentley's Miscellany" and "Fraser's Magazine," under the signature of "A Middle-aged Man;" a title which she took in order, as she says, "by better disguising myself, I might, at that time, express myself the more unreservedly." She was likewise the authoress of some novels and romances, which displayed considerable talent both in description and observation. B. about 1810.

THOMSON, James, an eminent Scotch poet. The son of a clergyman, he was educated at Jedburgh, and afterwards at Edinburgh, with a view to the ministry in the church of Scotland, which profession he declined. Having written his poem of "Winter," he repaired to London, where, according to Dr. Johnson, he wandered about "with the gaping curiosity of a new-comer; his attention upon everything rather than upon his pocket." In consequence, he lost his handkerchief and letters of recommendation. After experiencing many of the sharp stings of poverty, he obtained a publisher for his "Winter," which, however, lay unnoticed for a considerable time. Afterwards, its great merit becoming appreciated, Thomson was brought into notice and popularity. He next produced his "Summer," "Spring," and "Autumn," and a "Poem sacred to the Memory of Sir Isaac Newton." Thomson accompanied the Hon. Mr. Talbot, son of the lord chancellor, on his travels; and, on his return, settled at Richmond, in narrow circumstances. He produced some dramatic pieces of considerable merit; "Liberty," a poem; and the "Castle of Indolence," in the manner of Spenser. But his fame rests upon the poems of "The Seasons," to which even Dr. Johnson has borne the testimony of approbation. In descriptive scenery and pathetic expression, few poets will be found to excel Thomson. "Amidst much that is truly exquisite," says an eminent authority, "both in feeling and expression, he mingles the absurdities of a schoolboy's trite commonplaces and mechanical contrivances to piece out his verse;" but "in spite of these drawbacks, he is a charming poet, and one whose works have always been the delight of all classes." About two years before his death he obtained the place of surveyor-general of the Leeward Islands; an office he paid a deputy to fulfil, but which, nevertheless, yielded the poet about £300 per annum. B. at Ednam, Roxburghshire, 1700; D. 1748.

THOMSON, Thomas, a celebrated Scotch chemist, who studied under Dr. Black, at Edinburgh. He commenced as a lecturer upon chemistry, in 1802, and continued to perform the same functions during the fifty subsequent years. For the "Encyclopædia Britannica" he wrote articles upon chemistry, mineralogy, &c., and also acted as one of the editors of that work. The employment of symbols in chemistry was first suggested by him, and he also distinguished himself by his elucidations of the atomic theory of Dalton. His most important works were,—"System of Chemistry;" "Outlines of Mineralogy, Geology, and Mineral Analysis;" "Brewing and Distillation." He was the projector of the "Annals of Philosophy," a scientific journal, which he edited for several years. In 1818 he was elected professor of chemistry in the university of Glasgow. B. at Crieff, Perthshire, 1773; D. at Glasgow, 1852.—His son, Dr. Thomas Thomson, became superintendent of the East-India Company's botanic gardens at Calcutta.

THONE, or THONEX, tone, a town of Savoy, on the Fier, 9 miles from Annecy. Pop. 3,000.

THONON, ton'-on, a town of Savoy, 20 miles from Geneva. Pop. 4,500.—Near it is the farmhouse, formerly the château of Ripaille, to which Amadeus VIII. of Savoy retired, after having successively renounced the dukedom of Savoy, the papacy, and the bishopric of Geneva.

THOR, or ASA-THOR, thor, one of the principal deities of the Scandinavian mythology, was the eldest son of Odin and Freiya. He reigned over all the aërial regions, in a palace composed of 540 halls; directed the meteors, winds, and storms; launched the thunder and pointed the lightning. To him the Saxons and Danes prayed, when requiring favourable winds, rains, and plentiful seasons. The fifth day of the week, which still bears his name (Thor's-day), was dedicated to him.

THORBURN, Robert, thor'-bern, a celebrated modern miniature-painter, who studied his art in the Scottish Academy at Edinburgh, and, in 1836, repaired to London, where he soon became the favourite miniature-painter with the court and aristocracy. His productions were, for many years, among the chief attractions of the exhibition at the Royal Academy. B. at Dumfries, Scotland, 1818.

THORDA, or THORENBURG, tor'-da, a market-town of Austria, in Transylvania, 16 miles from Klausenburg, near the Aranjos. It has an extensive trade in salt, there being rich mines in the neighbourhood. Pop. 8,000. Not far from this place are the ruins of a Roman fortress, where were stationed the 7th legion, who have left various memorials of their presence, in the form of inscriptions.

THORDO, thor'-do, a celebrated Danish jurist, who made a collection of the civil and constitutional laws of Denmark, from the earliest times to 1377. The work is valuable as affording materials for the social and political history of Denmark. An edition of it was published at Copenhagen in 1508. Thordo was chief judge of the island of Gutta, and flourished in the 14th century.

THORDSON, Sturla, thord'-son, a Danish statesman and historian, who was the nephew of the celebrated Snorro Starlason, whose history of Denmark, Iceland, and Norway he continued. He held the very highest office under the Danish kings Hacon and Magnus. Only a fragment of his history is extant; but an abstract of it is given in the "Historia Rerum Norvegicarum," of Torfæus. Thordson was B. 1218; D. 1288.

THORESBY, Ralph, thore'-sbe, an eminent English topographer and antiquary, who was a fellow of the Royal Society, and wrote the Topography of Leeds. He also formed a museum at Leeds, which was very rich in the departments of manuscripts and coins. B. at Leeds, 1658; D. 1725.

THORILD, Thomas, thor'-ild, a Swedish poet, who visited England, and while there, wrote two pamphlets in English. He was at first a great admirer of England, where, he said, "almost everything of its kind is the best I have seen—the beer, the theatre, the letters, the sermons." He subsequently, however, suffered a material change of opinion. His works, consisting of poems, literary criticisms, and essays, were published at Stockholm in 1824. B. 1759; D. 1808.

THORN, torn, a strongly-fortified town of West Prussia, in the government of Marienwerder, on the Vistula, 92 miles from Dantzic. It was formerly considered a place of great strength, and has a gymnasium and several convents. Manf. Woollens, linen, hats, leather, gloves, starch; and it exports, moreover, corn and wood. Pop. 10,000. It is the birthplace of Copernicus.

THORNBURY, thorn'-ber-re, a market-town and borough of Gloucestershire, near the Severn, on a rivulet that runs into it, 11 miles from Bristol. It has a church, several dissenting chapels, schools, almshouses, and other charities. At the end of the town are the remains of its unfinished castle, begun by Edward Stafford, duke of Buckingham, but stopped by his execution in 1522. Pop. 4,700.

THORNDIKE, Herbert, thorn'-dike, a learned English divine, who, in 1613, became master of Sidney College, of which he was soon afterwards deprived for his adherence to the cause of Charles I. At the Restoration he obtained a prebend in Westminster Abbey. He wrote a folio volume, entitled "Epilogus," in which he defended the Church of England with great learning and ability. He was also the author of a treatise on Weights and Measures; another on Church Censures; and he assisted Walton in the Polyglot. D. 1673.

THORNE, thorn, a market-town of the West Riding of Yorkshire, a quarter of a mile from the river Don, on the borders of Lincolnshire, 7 miles from Goole. The town is tolerably well built, and, besides a neat church, contains several chapels and schools. The quay is about a mile from the town, at the suburb called Hangman Hill, on the banks of the river; and here is a large dockyard, where ships of considerable burden are built. Pop. 3,463.

THORNEYCROFT, Mrs. Mary, thor'-ne-croft, a modern English sculptor, who was the daughter of Mr. John Francis, the sculptor, by whom she was taught modelling in her youth. So great was her progress, that in her 20th year she attracted notice as a talented artist—her "Penelope," and "Ulysses and his Dog," exhibited at the Royal Academy, being much admired. In 1848 she married, and proceeded to Italy. She modelled "Sappho and the Sleeping Child," and, upon the recommendation of Gibson, was selected to execute busts and statues of the royal children. In that commission she acquitted herself so well as to become a favourite sculptor with the court. For her majesty, Mrs. Thorneycroft modelled a statue of the Princess Beatrice floating in the shell of a nautilus, which is admitted to be a work of great beauty. B. in Norfolk, 1814.

THORNHAM, thorn'-ham, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 500.

THORNHILL, thorn'-hill, a village of Scotland, in Dumfriesshire, half a mile to the east of the Nith, and 14 miles from Dumfries. Manf. Stockings and leather. Pop. 1,700.

THORNHILL, a village of Scotland, in Perthshire, 10 miles from Stirling.

THORNHILL, Sir James, an English painter. His uncle, the famous Dr. Sydenham, enabled him to pursue his inclination for painting, in which art he greatly improved himself abroad. The dome of St. Paul's, the hospital at Greenwich, and Hampton-Court Palace, exhibit specimens of his talents as a painter. According to Horace Walpole, he received only forty shillings a square yard for his paintings on the cupola of St. Paul's. He was appointed principal painter to Queen Anne; George I. conferred on him the honour of knighthood. He acquired considerable wealth by his profession, and became a member of the House of Commons. Hogarth married his daughter. B. at Weymouth, 1676; D. 1734.

THORNTON, Bonnel, thorn'-ton, an English poet and miscellaneous writer. In 1754 he engaged with George Colman and others in a periodical work entitled "The Student," and afterwards in another called "The Connoisseur." In 1760 he published, with Colman and Richard Warner, a translation of Plautus, and the year following, a burlesque poem upon the physicians, called "The Battle of the Wigs." B. in London, 1724; D. 1768.

THORNTON, the name of several parishes in England, none of them with a population above 8,300, the largest being 4 miles from Bradford, in the W. Riding of Yorkshire.

THORPE, the name of numerous parishes, townships, and hamlets in England, none of them with a population above 3,000.

THORWALDSEN, Bertel, or Albert, thorr-wauld'-sen, a celebrated Danish sculptor, who was the son of a carver in wood in humble circumstances. Until his 11th year he worked at the same business; but being sent, about this time, to the school of the Academy of Arts at Copenhagen, he made such progress, that, in two years, he became a better carver than his father, and began to be employed upon the figure-heads of ships. At 17 he gained a silver medal for a bas-relief of Cupid reposing, and in his 22nd year he won the gold medal of the Fine Arts Academy, to which was added a travelling studentship for three years, his expenses to be defrayed by the government. In 1796 he set out for Italy on board a Danish frigate, and, in the following year, landed at Palermo. After a short stay at Naples, he proceeded to Rome, where he studied and worked under the auspices of his countryman, Zoëga. An accident prevented his returning home at the expiration of his term, and, having found patrons at Rome, he resolved to settle there. He modelled a statue of Jason, which Canova spoke of as being in "a new and grand style," an opinion which was repeated to Mr. Thomas Hope, who, accordingly, visited the young sculptor's studio, and gave him a commission for a marble copy of the work. This was the first success of Thorwaldsen, who thenceforth rose rapidly into reputation. His bas-reliefs of Summer and Autumn, the "Dance of the Muses on Helicon," "Venus with the Apple," "Cupid and Psyche," the "Triumph of Alexander," for the Quirinal Palace, and other works, brought him fame, and were the principal efforts of his genius during the first sojourn of 21 years at Rome. In 1819 he returned to Copenhagen, where he was received with enthusiasm; but, in a year, he again set out for Italy, passing through Germany on his route. His "St. John in the Wilderness," and the monumental groups to Pius VII., Poniatowski, Maximilian of Bavaria, and Copernicus, were among his greatest productions executed during his second residence in Rome. In 1838 his native government sent a frigate to convey him and his sculptures to Copenhagen, where he remained until 1841, in which year the delicate state of his health caused him to return to Italy. In 1842 he returned to Denmark once more, and continued to reside there until his death. In addition to the works already mentioned, a few others may be cited as those upon which his fame rests: these are,—the busts of the poets Holberg and Ochlenschlager, and the statue of Lord Byron; which latter was intended to be placed in Westminster Abbey; but, the necessary permission of the dean being withheld, it remained in the Custom-House during twelve years, until, at length, it found a place in the library of Trinity College, Cambridge. Thorwaldsen bequeathed almost the whole of his personal estate to the founding of a museum, which was to contain all his works, either originals or in casts, and to bear his name. This museum is one of the finest buildings in Copenhagen, and forms one of the chief attractions of the city. The Crystal Palace at Sydenham contains several casts from his works. B. at Copenhagen, 1770; D. at the same city, 1844.

THOU, James Augustus de, too, or, as he styled himself, in Latin, "Thuanus," a celebrated French historian, was the son of Christopher de Thou, first president of the parliament of Paris. He was designed for the ecclesiastical state, and his uncle, the bishop of Chartres, resigned some of his benefices in his favour; but he subsequently relinquished this intention, and became a counsellor to the parliament, and one of its presidents. Henry III. employed him on an embassy first to Vienna and next to Venice; Henry IV. admitted him into his councils, and engaged him in several important negotiations. His greatest work was the History of his Own Time from 1545 to 1607, which is written in pure Latin, and with great fidelity. The best edition is that of London, 1733. His Latin poems were printed in 1611. B. at Paris, 1553; D. 1617. His son, Francis Augustus de Thou, was librarian to the king; but having been charged with participation in the conspiracy of Cinq-Mars, he was beheaded at Lyons in 1642.

THOUARS, Louis-Marie-Aubert-du-Petit, too'-ar, an eminent French botanist, who came of a rich and noble family, and, at an early age, entered upon a military career; but his love of science and adventure led him to fit out a vessel in which he and his brother intended to go in search of La Perouse, the French navigator. On his road from Paris to Brest, where his ship lay, he was arrested by the Revolutionists as an enemy to France, and thrown into prison at Quimper. In a short time he obtained his release; but his brother having sailed in the interim, he proceeded in search of him to the Isle of France, whence his brother had sailed before his arrival. Aubert remained in the island during ten years, amassing a large body of materials for the scientific works which he published after his return to France in 1802. Four years later he received the appointment of director of the royal nursery-ground at the French capital. His most important works were,—"History of the Vegetation of the Islands of France, Bourbon, and Madagascar;" essay on the Organization of Plants, and miscellanies of Botany and Travel. B. in Anjou, 1756; D. at Paris, 1831.

THOURET, Michel Augustin, too'-rai, a distinguished French physician, who became dean of the Faculty of Medicine at Paris. He proposed a successful plan for the removal of the cemetery of the Holy Innocents at Paris, which, having long been used as the chief burial-ground of the French capital, had become a source of great unhealthiness. He wrote some valuable papers on medicine. B. 1748; D. 1810.

THOUSAND ISLANDS. (See LAKE OF THE THOUSAND ISLANDS.)

THRAPSTON, thrap'-ston; a market-town of Northamptonshire, on the Nen, over which is a handsome bridge of several arches, 19 miles from Northampton. It has a church and various schools. Pop. 1,200.

THRASEA PARTUS, Lucius or Publius, thra'-se-a pe'-tus, a Roman senator, and member of the priestly college, who was the only one in the senate courageous enough to avow his detestation of the murder of Agrippina by her son, the emperor Nero. This, and the popularity of Thrasea with the most honourable men among his contemporaries, caused him to incur the hatred of Nero, who, to get rid of him, incited Cossutianus, the enemy of Thrasea, to charge him with being an enemy to the state and to the emperor. The degraded senate decreed that he should die, but allowed him to choose his mode of death. The decree was conveyed to Thrasea at his villa, and the senator caused the veins of both his arms to be opened. He was the author of a biography of Cato the Younger, which is lost, but is said to have been used by Plutarch in his "Lives." D. 66.

THRASIMENE, or THRASYMENE, thrăs-e-me'-nee, the ancient name of a lake in the central part of Italy, now called the Lake of Perugia. Under the French empire of Napoleon I., it gave name to a department of which Spoleto was the capital.

THRASYBULUS, thrăs-e-bu'-lus, a celebrated Athenian general, who, in the time of the thirty tyrants, took refuge at Thebes. Having gained some followers, he marched against the usurpers and expelled them. In commemoration of this triumph, a yearly festival was instituted at Athens. Thrasybulus wisely procured the passing of a general amnesty, which decreed that no one but the principals should be punished for the atrocities which had been committed. He subsequently displayed great valour in Thrace, and slew the Lacedæmonian general with his own hand. Thrasybulus fell in a battle with the Aspendians, who were the allies of Sparta, 394 B.C.

THREE RIVERS, a town of British North America, Lower Canada, between Montreal and Quebec, on the river St. Maurice, at its confluence with the St. Lawrence. The shops and warehouses are numerous, wherein may be had British goods of all descriptions. Several inns afford to travellers very respectable accommodation. The principal public buildings are the Ursuline convent, the Protestant and Catholic churches, the court-house, gaol, and barracks. Most part of the private dwelling-houses, &c., are built of wood. The trade carried on is chiefly in British manufactured goods; and it formerly had a brisk trade in furs. Pop. 5,000, chiefly of French descent.—The DISTRICT of Three Rivers has an area of 15,810 square miles and a population of 95,000.

THROCMORTON, Sir Nicholas, throk-mor'-ton, an English statesman, who, in early life, became page to the duke of Richmond, natural son of Henry VIII. He subsequently served under the protector Somerset in the Scottish campaign, and was selected, in 1547, to convey to London the news of the victory gained over the Scotch at Musselburgh. He was in favour under Edward VI., who appointed him under-treasurer of the Mint, and bestowed upon him some valuable estates. After the death of Edward VI., he was charged with being implicated in the conspiracy of Sir William Wyatt, and imprisoned in the Tower; but, on being brought to trial, he so ably defended himself, as to gain an acquittal from the jury, despite the threats of the chief justice. He then retired to France, in order to avoid the persecutions to which, as a Protestant, he might be subjected under the reign of Mary. Queen Elizabeth, upon her accession, created Throcmorton chief butler of England and chamberlain of the exchequer; but, in 1569, he was arrested on the charge of being concerned in negotiating a marriage between Mary, queen of Scots, and the duke of Norfolk, and, after a short confinement in the Tower, was released, but lost his places under the crown. His death occurred shortly afterwards. B. about 1513; D. 1571.

THUCYDIDES, thu-cid'-i-dees, a celebrated Greek historian. He was of noble birth, and, on arriving at maturity, took part in the Peloponnesian war; but failing in an expedition with which he had been intrusted, he was banished, and, in his exile, collected materials for his "History of the Peloponnesian War," which he produced after his return from banishment. The best edition of Thucydides is that of Bekker, Berlin. B. 471 B.C.; D. uncertain when.

THUIN, too'-ĭ, a town of Belgium, on the Sambre, 8 miles from Charleroi. Manf. Woollens and linen. Pop. 4,000.

THULDEN, Theodore van, tool'-den, an eminent Dutch painter, who was the pupil and favourite of Rubens. He painted a great number of the works in the gallery of the Luxembourg. His manner so closely resembled that of his master, that a painting of his, "The Martyrdom of St. Andrew," contained in St. Michael's church at Ghent, was long thought to be the work of Rubens. His best works are the "St. Sebastian," in the church of the Bernardines at Mechlin; an "Assumption of the Virgin," in the Jesuits' church at Bruges; and a series illustrative of the life of St. John of Matha, in the ecclesiastical edifice belonging to the Mathurins, at Paris. He also excelled as an etcher, and reproduced forty-two designs by Rubens, commemorating the entrance of the cardinal-infanta Ferdinand into Antwerp. B. at Bois-le-Duc, 1607; D. at the same place, 1676.

THÜMMEL, Moritz August von, tem'-el, a German writer, who was, for a period, privy councillor and minister to Duke Ernest of Saxe-Coburg. He was the author of "Wilhelmine," a comic poem in prose; and "Travels in the Southern Provinces of France," which was highly praised by Schiller. It very much resembles the "Sentimental Journey" of Sterne, and is interspersed with several charming pieces of verse and some pleasing narratives. His complete works were issued in six volumes. B. at Schönfeld, near Leipzig, 1738; D. at Coburg, 1817.

THUN, toon, a lake of Switzerland, traversed by the Aar, from Lake Brienz. Ext. 10 miles long, with a breadth of 2.—The TOWN, situate on its banks, has a church and a town-hall. Manf. Silk stuffs. Pop. 5,000.

THUNBERG, Charles Peter, thoon'-berg, a celebrated Swedish botanist and traveller, who was the disciple of Linnæus. The Dutch East-India Company sent him to their settlements in Japan, where he made great collections. After this he went to Ceylon, and on his return to Europe became professor of botany at Upsal. His principal works were—an account of his travels, a work upon the botany of the Cape of Good Hope, and "Flora Japonica." B. at Jönkoping, Sweden, 1743; D. 1828.

THURGAU, or THURGOVIA, toor'-gow, a canton of Switzerland. Area, 270 square miles. Desc. Undulating and fertile. Rivers. The Thurr, Sitter, and Murg. Manf. Cotton and linen spinning and weaving. Pop. 90,000.

THURINGIA, thoo-rin'-je-a (in Germ. too'-ring-en), the former name of an extensive tract of country in the central part of Germany, in Saxony.

THURINGIA, FOREST OF, a hilly and woody tract in central Germany, extending for 50 miles through several Saxon duchies. It is clothed with pine woods.

THURLES, therlz, a large straggling town of Ireland, in the county of Tipperary, and 20 miles from the town of Tipperary. It is nearly divided into two equal portions by the river Suir, and has a good market-house, a neat modern church, an episcopal palace, a college, and school. Pop. 6,000.

THURLMERE, thurl'-meer, a river of England, in Cumberland, running into the Derwent.

THURLOE, John, thur'-lo, an English political writer, who was educated for the legal profession, and became confidential secretary to Cromwell, afterward holding the same appointment under his son Richard. At the Restoration he was committed into custody, but was soon released. His invaluable state papers have been printed in 7 volumes. B. in Essex, 1616; D. in London, 1668.

THURLOW, Edward Lord, an eminent English lawyer, who was, in 1754, called to the bar, and in the course of a few years rose to a high reputation in his profession. After being appointed king's counsel, he entered parliament, and was there distinguished as a strenuous supporter of Lord North's administration, particularly with respect to the policy pursued towards the Americans. This conduct caused him to gain the favour of George III., who during twenty years evinced considerable personal regard for him. He was appointed solicitor-general in 1770, attorney-general in the following year, and in 1778 he became lord chancellor, being at the same time created Baron Thurlow. He held the great seal during the four subsequent years, which formed the term of the North ministry, and was, according to the king's desire, allowed to retain it in the Rockingham administration, which supplanted that of Thurlow's former colleagues. His opposition to the new cabinet was, however, so energetic and so clearly avowed, that his continuance in office was stoutly opposed by Mr. Fox. On the death of the marquis of Rockingham, Fox assisted Lord North to form a coalition ministry, and Thurlow, although the king desired that he might continue to keep possession of the great seal, was compelled to resign it. He, nevertheless, exercised a large share of influence in the national councils, as a member of that coterie termed by Junius "the king's friends." When Pitt became minister, in 1783, Lord Thurlow was again appointed lord chancellor, and retained the office during the nine succeeding years. At length, however, he, as formerly under the Rockingham ministry, began actually to oppose measures which Pitt had introduced into parliament. Pitt informed the king that either himself or Lord Thurlow must retire; whereupon his majesty intimated to Thurlow that the great seal must pass into other hands. Thurlow, who had relied upon the king's friendship, was astonished at this communication, and was even bold enough to declare that "no man had a right to treat another as the king had treated him." He retired in 1792. Subsequently, on a few occasions, he voted against his former colleagues, and he is understood to have been consulted on legal business by the royal family; but, from this period until his death, he exerted little influence on public affairs. An interesting account of an interview between himself and Sir Samuel Romilly, respecting the charges brought by Lady Douglas against the Princess of Wales, is to be found in the 2nd volume of "Romilly's Memoirs." B. near Stowmarket, Suffolk, 1732; D. at Brighton, 1826.

THURSO, thur'-so, a parish and town of Scotland, at the head of Thurso Bay, 21 miles from Wick. The promontory of Holburnhead, the western boundary of this beautiful and romantic bay, at the distance of about three miles from the town, forms the safe and commodious roadstead or harbour called Scrabster Roads, bordering on the Pentland Firth. The old town is irregularly built, containing no edifices of any note, except the church, which is an old substantial Gothic building, in good repair. But the new town, on a regular plan, is laid out on the west bank of the river, in a pleasant elevated situation. Manf. Linen and woollen goods, rope, leather, straw plait and netting. Pop. of borough, 3,000.

THURZOFALVA, thoortz-o-föl'-vŏ, a town of Hungary, with mineral baths on the borders of Galicia. Pop. 6,600.

TIARINI, Alexander, te-a-re'-ne, a celebrated Italian painter, who was one of the great masters of the Bolognese school. He painted portraits and historical subjects in a fine style. B. at Bologna, 1577; D. 1668.

TIBER, ti'-ber (in Italian, TEVERE, tai'-vai-rā), a celebrated river of Italy, rising in the Apennines, and, after a course of 185 miles, falling into the Mediterranean, about 15 miles below Rome.

TIBERIAS, a large lake in the northern part of Judæa, celebrated in Scripture history under the appellation of the Sea of Galilee, or the Sea of Tiberias. (See TADARIA.)

TIBERIUS, Claudius Nero, ti-be'-ri-us, a Roman emperor, who succeeded Augustus A.D. 14, and was descended from the family of the Claudii. In his early years he commanded popularity by entertaining the people with magnificent shows and fights of gladiators. After distinguishing himself as a general in various parts, he was rewarded with four successive triumphs. At the height of his fame he suddenly retired to the island of Rhodes, where he remained during eight years. Returning to Rome, A.D. 2, he was invested with the command of the Roman armies in Illyricum, Pannonia, and Dalmatia, and seemed to divide the sovereign power with Augustus; at whose death, Tiberius, who was the step-son of Augustus, and had been adopted, assumed the reins of government. The beginning of his reign seemed to promise tranquillity to the empire. Tiberius, however, soon appeared in his real character. His ingratitude to his mother Livia, and his tyrannical oppression and murder of many noble senators, rendered him odious to the people. The armies mutinied in Pannonia and Germany; but the tumults were appeased by the prudence of the generals. He beheld the triumphs of Germanicus with jealousy, indeed, dreaded the power of his general, whose death at Antioch was, as some suppose, accelerated by poison, and the secret resentment of the emperor. Not only his relations and friends, but the great and opulent, were sacrificed to his ambition, cruelty, and avarice; and there was in Rome scarcely a single family that did not reproach Tiberius with the loss of a brother, a father, or a husband. He at length retired to the island of Capreæ, on the coast of Campania, where he gave himself up to infamous pleasures. The care of the empire was intrusted to his favourite Sejanus. Tiberius, on being made acquainted with the tyrannical measures of Sejanus, ordered him to be put to death. (See SEJANUS.) Shortly afterwards he fell into a lethargy, which was mistaken for death, and Caligula, his favourite and the son of Germanicus, was proclaimed emperor. Tiberius, however, recovered; but Macro, the commander of the Prætorian guard, caused him to be suffocated. The character of Tiberius has been examined with particular attention by historians, and his reign is the subject of the most perfect and elegant of all the compositions of Tacitus. Like the rest of the emperors, he received divine honours after death, and even during his life. He was a patron of literature and the arts, and was the author of some Greek poems. B. at Rome, 42 B.C.; D. near Misenum, 37.

TIBERIUS, Constantine, emperor of the East, was a Thracian, and was brought up at the court of Justinian. Justin II., the successor of the latter, took Tiberius into his favour, and elevated him to the first offices in the state. In 574, Justin II. appointed Tiberius his colleague in the empire. On the death of Justin, in 578, he became sole emperor. His armies defeated the Persians, and he reigned with great wisdom and moderation. D. 582.

TIBERIUS, Absimarius, emperor of the East. He dethroned Leontius by the aid of the patrician John, and defeated the Mahometan inhabitants of Syria; but Justinian II., who had been deposed by Leontius, having suddenly appeared before Constantinople, took the city. Tiberius attempted to escape, but was taken and beheaded by Justinian, 705.

TIBERIUS, Alexander, prefect of Egypt, was a Jew, and had adopted heathenism. In quelling an insurrection of the Jews at Alexandria, he is stated to have put to death upwards of 50,000 of them. He was a favourite with the emperor Vespasian and his successor Titus, which latter he accompanied to the siege and capture of Jerusalem. Flourished in the 1st century.

TIBERIUS OF ALEXANDRIA, was a Greek grammarian, who composed a number of rhetorical treatises, only one of which is extant. It is published in the "Rhetores Selecti" of Gale. Flourished in the 4th century.

TIBET, or THIBET, tib'-bet or tib-bet', a country of Asia, and part of Independent Tartary, extending from the source of the Indus to the borders of China, and from Hindostan to the deserts of Cobi, and included in the Chinese empire. Ext. From E. to W. about 1,500 miles: the breadth is unequal, and in many parts not known. Area, 30,200 square miles. Desc. The distinguishing feature of this extensive country is its general elevation, being part of that tract in which arise not only the great rivers of India and China, but those, also, of Siberia and Tartary. Tibet strikes a traveller, at first sight, as one of the least-favoured countries under heaven. It exhibits only low rocky hills, without any visible vegetation, or extensive arid plains, both of the most stern and stubborn aspect, promising as little as they produce; and it is in general extremely bare of trees and the large vegetable products. Climate. The temperature and seasons possess a remarkable uniformity. The same division takes place here as in the more southern region of Bengal: during the spring, a variable atmosphere,—heat, thunderstorms, and occasionally refreshing showers; from June to September, heavy and continued rains; from October to March, a clear and uniform sky. For three months of this season a degree of cold is felt, far greater, perhaps, than is known to prevail in Europe. Its extreme severity is more particularly confined to the southern boundary of Tibet, near the elevated range of mountains which divides it from Assam, Bootan, and Nepaul. The summits of these are covered all the year with snow, and their vicinity is remarkable, at all seasons, for the dryness of the winds. Zoology. Tibet, though barren of vegetable produce, teems with animal life. The variety and abundance of wild fowl, game, and beasts of prey, flocks, droves, and herds, is astonishing. Among the most remarkable animals are the cattle, which are extremely useful to the inhabitants. The bull is known by the name of the yak of Tartary, or bushy-tailed bull of Tibet. He is about the height of an English bull, which he resembles in the general figure of the body, head, and legs; and there is no essential difference, except that he is covered all over with a thick coat of long hair. These cattle afford abundance of rich milk, from which excellent butter is made. The musk-deer also abounds in the coldest parts of the mountains; and the goat, which yields the materials for the manufacture of the finest shawls, is also an inhabitant of these regions. This is the most beautiful of the species of goats. The colours are various: black, white, of a faint bluish tinge, and of a shade something lighter than a fawn. The material used for the manufacture of shawls is of a light fine texture, and clothes the animal next the skin. A coarse covering of long hair grows above this, and preserves the softness of the interior coat. Wild horses are found, and there is also a fine race of dogs. Among the most valuable and useful animals of Tibet is the breed of sheep, which merits a distinguished rank. The flocks of these are numerous, and upon them the inhabitants place their chief reliance for present support, as well as for winter food. Pro. The usual crops are wheat, peasc, and barley; and in many parts these grains never ripen. Minerals. Gold, copper, cinnabar, and lead. In many cases, however, these cannot be worked, for want of fuel to smelt the ores. The dung of animals is the only substitute for firewood, and with that alone it is impossible to excite a degree of heat sufficiently intense for such purposes. Thus situated, the most valuable discovery for them would be that of a coal-mine. In some parts of China bordering on Tibet, coal is found and used as fuel. Tincal is found in Tibet in inexhaustible quantities. It is a fossil, brought to market in the state in which it is dug out of the lake, and afterwards refined into borax in this country. Rock-salt is likewise found in great abundance. Manf. Woollens, sacking, and other woven fabrics. Exp. To China, gold-dust, precious stones, musk, and woollen cloths; the imports are gold and silver brocades, silks, teas, tobacco, quicksilver, China-ware, furs, and some silver bullion. To Bengal, the exports are gold-dust, musk, tincal; the imports thence are broadcloth, trinkets, spices (particularly cloves), pearls, coral, amber, kincobs, Maulda cloths, Rungpoor leather, tobacco, and indigo. The roads and bridges, however, are much inferior to those of China, and greatly impede the progress of commerce. Rel. Buddhism, of which it is the chief seat, and the country abounds with temples. It is said there are about 80,000 lamas, or priests, supported at the expense of government. Race. Mongol. Pop. 6,000,000. Lat. from 78° to 104° E., and extending N. from the Himalaya Mountains to an undefined distance.—Tibet enjoys but the shadow of independence, being ruled by Chinese sovereigns, who obtained their ascendancy over it in 1720, by interfering in the intestine commotions by which the country was then agitated.

TIBULLUS, Albius, ti-bul'-lus, a Roman poet, who was of the equestrian order, and was at one time possessed of large property, a great part of which he appears to have lost under the reign of Augustus. He led a quiet country life until about 27 B.C., when he accompanied his patron, Valerius Messala, to Aquitania. Four books of his Elegies remain, which are distinguished for their elegance. They are usually published with Catullus and Propertius. His poems have been translated into English by Dart. B. about 57 B.C.; D. about the commencement of the 1st century.

TICHFIELD-WITH-CROFTON, titch'-feld, a market-town of Southamptonshire, near the Tichfield river, 3 miles from Fareham. Its church is a spacious fabric, the work of different ages; besides which there is a charity-school. Pop. 4,000.

TICHVIN, tish'-vin, a town of European Russia, on the Tichvinka, 108 miles from Novgorod. Pop. 3,600. —A CANAL of the same name connects Lake Ladoga and the Baltic with the Caspian Sea, from its uniting the Tichvinka and Sias with the Mologa and Volga.

TICINO, te-che'-no, a river of Italy and Switzerland, rising in Mount St. Gothard, and, after a course of 125 miles, falling into the Lago Maggiore.

TICINO, or TESSIN, a district in the south of Switzerland, situate between the central cantons and the frontier of Lombardy. Area, 1,037 square miles. Desc. It was formerly called the Italian bailiwicks, and is a tract of mountainous territory, acquired long since by the Swiss, but inhabited by Italians, and governed by temporary deputies from the respective cantons, until 1815, when it was formed into an independent canton, divided into eight districts. Rivers. The Ticino. Pro. Maize, wheat, rye, chestnuts, wine, and silk. Timber is abundant, and it exports calves, sheep, and wine. Manf. Unimportant. Pop. 120,000; but the inhabitants emigrate annually in large numbers.

TICKELL, Thomas, tick'-ell, an English poet and miscellaneous writer, who became fellow of Queen's College, Oxford. He translated the first book of the Iliad, the earliest portion of which Addison preferred to that of Pope. He also wrote some papers in the "Spectator," and acted as private secretary to Addison when he was secretary of state. Tickell subsequently became secretary to the lords justices of Ireland, an office he retained until his death. He wrote a beautiful poem on the death of Addison, and published a collection of his works. B. at Bridekirk, Cumberland, 1686; D. 1740.

TICKELL, Richard, an English poet and political writer. He published — the "Project," and the "Wreath of Fashion," poems which had some popularity in their day. But his principal effort was a pamphlet, called "Anticipation," in which, in 1779, he imitated the manner and style of the leading members of the House of Commons. He also adapted the "Gentle Shepherd" to the stage, and wrote the "Carnival of Venice," a comic opera. D. 1793.

TICKNOR, George, tick'-nor, an eminent American writer and philologist, who, after completing his education at Dartmouth College, New Hampshire, devoted himself to the study of the law, which, however, he subsequently relinquished to follow a literary career. In order to perfect himself in the modern languages, he spent some years in the cities of Paris, Rome, Madrid, Lisbon, London, and Edinburgh. At the last-mentioned place he made the acquaintance of Sir Walter Scott, who, in a letter to Southey, spoke of him as a "wondrous fellow for romantic lore and antiquarian research, considering his country." In 1819 he returned to his native country, and accepted the professorship of modern languages at Harvard University, the duties of which office he fulfilled during fifteen years. Although his lectures upon European literature were greatly admired, he published nothing until 1849, having, in the meanwhile, paid a second visit to Europe. At the last-named date he produced his "History of Spanish Literature; with Criticisms on the particular Works, and Biographical Notices of Prominent Writers." This work is admitted on all hands as being the best of the kind extant. It has been reproduced in Spain and Germany. B. at Boston, Massachusetts, 1791.

TICONDEROGA, tik-on'-de-ro'-ga, a fort of the United States, built by the French in 1756, in Essex county, New York, 86 miles from Albany. It is famous in the history of the American wars, and is now in ruins. Pop. 2,700.

TICOZZI, Stefano, te-kot'-se, an industrious Italian writer, who held an official appointment under Napoleon's administration of Italy; but, after the fall of the French emperor, he was dismissed from his place, and thenceforth supported himself at Milan, by literary labour. His principal productions were,—"A Dictionary of Painting;" "Historical Tales from the Middle-Age History of Italy;" a continuation of Verri's "History of Milan," and translations of Sismondi's "History of the Italian Republic." B. in the province of Como, 1762; D. 1836.

TIDEMAN, Philip, tee'-dai-man, a German painter, who was the disciple of Lairesse, and painted subjects of fabulous history and allegory. B. 1657; D. 1715.

TIDESWELL, tides'-well, a market-town of Derbyshire, 28 miles from Derby. Its church is a large and handsome structure, and it has a free school. Pop. 3,500.

TIDOR, or TIDORE, tee-dor', one of the Molucca Islands, in the Asiatic archipelago, lying to the west of Gilolo, and 9 miles south of Ternate, from which it is separated by a safe channel. It has a circumference of about 21 miles, and is densely wooded and populous. Lat. 0° 45′ N. Lon. 127° 25′ E.

TIECK, Christian Frederick, teek, an eminent German sculptor, who studied under Schadow, and subsequently under David, at Paris. In 1801 he repaired to Weimar, where he became the intimate friend of Göthe, and was engaged upon the sculptural decorations of the new palace He accompanied his brother Ludwig to Italy in 1805, and, while there, was commissioned by Madame de Staël and Ludwig, crown prince of Bavaria, to execute several busts. In 1819 he established himself at Berlin, became a member of the academy there, and was engaged to execute many of the most important public works in that city. His most celebrated productions were, a bust of Kiss, the sculptor of the "Amazon;" of Lessing, Erasmus, and Wallenstein, for the Walhalla, and the sculptural decorations of the Theatre Royal and the cathedral of Berlin. Several casts from his works are to be found in the Crystal Palace at Sydenham. B. at Berlin, 1776; D. at the same city, 1851.

TIECK, Ludwig, a celebrated German writer, and elder brother of the preceding. He distinguished himself in early life at the universities of Halle, Göttingen, and Erlangen, and, in his 19th year, made his first effort in literature, by producing "Almansur," a prose idyll. Some plays succeeded, and, in 1793, a paraphrase of Ben Jonson's "Volpone." Tales, novels, tragedies and comedies, a translation of "Don Quixote," a collection of "Volksmärchen" (popular legends), and reproductions in German of Ben Jonson's "Epicœne, or the Silent Woman," and the "Tempest" of Shakspere, occupied his pen up to the year 1802. "Love Songs," some tales contributed to Schlegel's "Maren-Almanach," and several translations from old English dramas, mainly occupied him until 1817, when he visited England, for the purpose of studying the literature of the Elizabethan period. Subsequently to his return, he produced translations of Green's "Friar Bacon," Heywood's "Lancashire Witches," and other works of the period preceding Shakspere. He was next employed in assisting Schlegel to produce a translation of the acknowledged plays of Shakspere,—an undertaking which was terminated in 1829, and became the standard text of the great English dramatist in Germany. Meanwhile he had written a picturesque narrative of the insurrection in the Cevennes, and a poem upon the death of Camoens. Several novels followed, and, in 1840, he was invited to Berlin by Frederick William IV., and created a privy councillor. His latest employments were in editing the works of Novalis, the posthumous writings of Kleist and of Linz, and in producing a revised and collected edition of his own works. This edition was published at Berlin, in twenty volumes, between the years 1828—1846. "He died," says an eminent authority, "leaving a name which may rank with the highest in his native country, and which most Englishmen may reverence as that which in Germany is most connected with popularizing the fame of the great dramatic poet of England." B. at Berlin, 1773; D. at the same city, 1853.

TIEDEMANN, Dietrich, tee'-dai-man, a learned German writer, who completed his education at the university of Göttingen, where he was greatly esteemed by professor Heyne. Upon the recommendation of that learned man, he obtained, in 1766, the appointment of professor of the Latin and Greek languages at Cassel, whence he removed, in 1786, to Marburg, where he became professor of philosophy. His principal works were,—"Essay on an Explanation of the Origin of Language;" "System of the Stoic Philosophy;" "The first Philosophers of Greece;" "Spirit of Speculative Philosophy;" "Argumenta Platonis." B. near Bremen, 1748; D. 1803.

TIEDEMANN, Frederick, an eminent German anatomist, who, in 1805, became professor of physiology and anatomy at Landshut. He was the author of "Zoology;" "Anatomy of the Heart of Fishes;" "Anatomy of the Flying Lizard or Dragon;" "Anatomy of Headless Monsters;" "Arteries of the Human Body;" "Plates of the Brain of Monkeys;" and the "Physiology of Man." In 1849 his eldest son, who had held the command of the castle of Rastadt, was executed for having taken part with the revolutionists. This event so deeply affected him, that he was compelled to relinquish the professorship of comparative anatomy and zoology, which he had held with great distinction since the year 1816. B. at Cassel, 1781.

TIEDGE, Christoph August, teej(r), a celebrated German poet, and styled the "Nestor of German poetry." His works consist of elegies, poetical epistles, &c., all of which evince a deeply religious character. In his honour the "Tiedge Institution" was founded at Dresden. B. at Gardelegen, in Altmark, 1752; D. 1841.

TIEN, teen, a prefix to many towns in the S. of China.

TIEN-SIO-DAI-TSIN, teen'-syo-dai-tsin', the patron divinity of Japan, who is held by the inhabitants of that empire to have created the world, and to have reigned during 25,000 years. From him descend all the dynasties which have reigned in Japan. In a celebrated temple erected in his honour, this god is worshipped under the emblem of a mirror.

TIEN-TSIN, teen-tsin', a city of China, in the province of Chili, and the port of Pekin, from which it is nearly 70 miles, at the confluence of the Yuen-ling and the Pekin river. It is a great entrepôt for salt. In 1858 a treaty, favourable to British interests, was signed here by Lord Elgin and the Chinese commissioners. (See CHINA, ELGIN, &c.)

TIETE, te-yai'-te, a river of Paraguay, which, after a course of 500 miles, falls into the Parana.

TIGRANES, ti-grai'-nees, king of Armenia, who became the ally of Mithridates the Great, whose daughter Cleopatra he married, and whom he assisted in maintaining a war against the Romans, but was defeated by Lucullus and Pompey. By a bribe of 60,000 talents, he was allowed to keep possession of his throne. Flourished in the 1st century B.C.

TIGRANES, prince of Armenia, and son of the preceding, against whom he revolted, but was defeated. The Romans, however, made him king of Sophene. He was afterwards sent in chains to Rome by Pompey.

TIGRÉ, tee'-grai, an extensive province of Abyssinia, which has now communicated its name to almost all the north-eastern districts of that great country. Desc. Mountainous. The chief outlet for its produce is Arkiko, on the Red Sea. Lat. between 11° and 17° 30′ N. Lon. between 37° and 41° E.

TIGRE, or PIGUENA, a river of S. America, Ecuador. After a course of 350 miles, it joins the Amazon 40 miles W. of the influx of the Ucayale.

TIGRIS, ti'-gris, a river of Western Asia, flowing along the boundaries of the Turkish and Persian empires, and rising in the mountains of Armenia, about 50 miles to the north of Diarbekir, and 15 to the east of the source of the Euphrates. At Korna it joins the Euphrates; and the united stream falls into the Persian Gulf. This river rises twice in the year, first and most remarkably in April, in consequence of the melting of the snows in the mountains of Armenia; afterwards in November, through the accession of the periodical rains. Its total course is estimated at 1,150 miles.

TILBURG, til'-boorg, a town of the Netherlands, in North Brabant, with a large castle, 14 miles from Breda. Manf. Woollen goods; and it has numerous breweries.

TILBURY, EAST, til'-ber-e, a village and parish of the county of Essex, 14 miles from Romford. On the bank of the Thames, in this parish, opposite Gravesend, is Tilbury Fort, originally built as a kind of blockhouse by Henry VIII., but enlarged into a regular fortification by Charles II. Pop. 400.—At this place the emperor Claudius is supposed to have crossed the Thames in pursuit of the Britons.

TILBURY, WEST, a parish adjoining the above. It appears to have been an episcopal seat of Cedda, bishop of the East Saxons. It is now a small village. Here are some traces of the camp formed by Queen Elizabeth in 1588.

TILL, till, a river of Northumberland, rising in the Cheviot Hills, and after a course of 30 miles, falling into the Tweed, 4 miles from Coldstream.

TILLEMONT, Sebastian Lenain de, teel'-mawn(g), a celebrated French historian and critic, who was educated in the school at Port Royal, and became one of the great ornaments of that society. His "History of the Emperors and other Princes who reigned during the six first Christian Centuries," and Ecclesiastical History, are written with great fidelity and clearness. B. at Paris, 1637; D. 1698.

TILLI, Michael Angelo, til'-lee, an Italian botanist and physician, who became physician to the grand-duke, and was successively professor in the university of Pisa, superintendent of the botanic garden, and fellow of the Royal Society of London. His greatest work is the "Catalogus Horti Pisani." B. at Florence, 1655; D. 1740.

TILLOCH, Alexander, til'-lok, a Scotch philosophical writer and inventor, who, in early life, applied himself to making improvements in the art of printing. With Foulis, the eminent printer of Glasgow, he made some experiments with a view of perfecting the process invented by Ged of Edinburgh, of making casts of pages of type. It was not, however, until thirty years later, that, in consequence of his representations to Earl Stanhope, the process of stereotyping became practically applicable. In 1787 he repaired to London, and there became part-proprietor and editor of a daily evening newspaper called the Star. In 1790 he offered to the English government a plan for preventing the forgery of bank-notes, which not being entertained, he put himself in communication with the French authorities. His negotiations upon this subject were, however, brought to a sudden termination by the passing of the Treasonable Correspondence Bill. In 1797 he started the "Philosophical Magazine," retaining the proprietorship and management of the print until within a few years of his death. He likewise commenced the publication of the "Mechanic's Oracle." Of sincere but peculiar religious opinions, he became an elder or minister of a small congregation who styled themselves Christian Dissenters, and celebrated worship in a private house. In 1823 he produced a work entitled, "Dissertations introductory to the Study and Right Understanding of the Language, Structure, and Contents of the Apocalypse." He was an LL.D., and member of many learned societies; but upon being proposed for election as a fellow of the Royal Society, he was declared unfitted to receive that distinction, on the ground that he was the proprietor of a newspaper. He continued to edit the Star, and the "Philosophical Magazine," until within a short period before his decease. The latter publication, after Tilloch's retirement from it, passed into the hands of Mr. Richard Taylor. Besides the works already mentioned, he produced a series of papers upon theological subjects, under the name of "Biblicus." B. at Glasgow, 1759; D. in London, 1825.

TILLOTSON, John, til'-lot-son, an eminent English prelate, who was the son of a clothier, and received his education at Clare Hall, Cambridge, where he was chosen fellow in 1651. Though bred among the Puritans, he conformed, at the Restoration, to the church of England, and became curate of Cheshunt, in Hertfordshire. In 1664 he was chosen preacher to the society of Lincoln's Inn, and, in the following year, lecturer of St. Lawrence's church, Jewry. In 1666 he took his degree of D.D.; in 1670 he was made prebendary, and, two years afterwards, dean of Canterbury. He attended Lord Russell on the scaffold, and endeavoured to prevail on him to acknowledge the doctrine of non-resistance, a principle which the doctor himself had afterwards occasion to renounce. He was very zealous against popery in the reign of James II., and immediately after the Revolution, he became the confidential friend of William III., who bestowed upon him the archbishopric of Canterbury, after the deprivation of Dr. Sancroft. This drew upon him the hatred of the nonjurors, who put forth many severe animadversions upon him. His sermons, published after his death, are distinguished by their perspicuity and closeness of reasoning. His widow, who was a niece of Oliver Cromwell, was left only what might accrue from the sale of the archbishop's works. These writings were, however, so popular, that the lady obtained, it is stated, the sum of £2,500. William III., to evince his esteem for Dr. Tillotson, granted his widow a pension of £400, and, at a subsequent period, he added a second one amounting to £200, which she continued to receive until her death. Tillotson's works were edited and published by Birch, in 3 vols., in 1752. B. at Sowerby, Yorkshire, 1630; D. 1694.

TILLY, or TILLI, John Tserclas, Count, til'-le, a celebrated general. He was for some time a member of the order of Jesuits, which he quitted for a military life. He displayed great courage and talents in Hungary against the Turks, and, in 1620, held the command of the troops under Duke Maximilian, at the battle of Prague. He displayed superior abilities in numerous actions in the German wars, and was no less distinguished by his humanity. He was at last defeated by Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, and received a mortal wound in defending the passage of the Lech, in 1632. B. at the castle of Tilly, South Brabant, 1559.

TILLYCOULTRY, til-le-kool'-tre, a parish and village of Scotland, in Clackmannanshire, 4 miles from Alloa. Manf. Shawls and plaidings. Pop. of parish, 4,700.

TILOI, te'-lo-e, a town of India, in the district of Salon, territory of Oude, 55 miles from Lucknow. Pop. 10,000.

TILSIT, til'-sit, a town of Prussian Lithuania, on the Tilse and the Niemen, 58 miles from Königsberg. Manf. Woollens, hosiery, arms, leather, and hardware. Pop. 14,000.—Its chief title to historical notice is from the treaty of peace concluded here on July 1, 1807, between France on the one hand and Prussia on the other.

TIMÆUS OF LOCRI, ti-me'-us, a Greek philosopher, who was a disciple of Pythagoras. He held that there was a universal motion throughout nature. A short treatise by him, on the "Nature of the Soul and of the World," is extant, and is stated to have given to Plato the ideas which are elaborated under the head of Timæus, in the "Dialogues" of that philosopher. Flourished about 340 B.C.

TIMAGENES, ti-măj'-e-nees, an historian, who was a native of Alexandria, and became a slave, at Rome, to the son of Sylla. His master gave him his liberty, on account of his abilities. He was afterwards in the service of Augustus; but lost his favour; on which he burnt the history of the reign of that emperor, which he had written. Flourished about the close of the last century B.C.

TIMAN MOUNTAINS. (See OURAL.)

TIMANTHES, ti-măn'-thees, a painter of Sicyon, whose greatest work was "The Sacrifice of Iphigenia." He obtained the prize in a contest wherein the celebrated Parrhasius was a competitor. This was for painting an Ajax, with all the fury which his disappointments could occasion, when deprived of the arms of Achilles. Flourished about 400 B.C.

TIMBS, John, timz, a modern English littérateur, who commenced his career under the auspices of Sir Richard Phillips, the publisher, whose amanuensis he became. From 1827 to 1838 he continued editor of "The Mirror," and shortly after the establishment of "The Illustrated London News," in 1842, he was appointed one of the editors of that journal. He produced more than a hundred volumes, either original or compiled; the best known of which were,—"Curiosities of London;" "Things not generally known familiarly Explained;" "The Year-Book of Facts," and "Curiosities of History." B. in London, 1801.

TIMOLEON, ti-mo'-le-on, a celebrated Corinthian general and statesman. His elder brother Timophanes, aiming at the sovereign power, was slain by Timoleon, assisted by his brother Satyrus. He went afterwards to relieve the Syracusans from the tyranny of Dionysius, whom he compelled to fly. Timoleon spent the rest of his life at Syracuse, whose laws he amended, and whose popular liberties he established. D. 337 B.C.

TIMON, ti'-mon, styled the Misanthrope, was a native of Colyttas, in Attica. In consequence of being deceived in the friendships he had formed, he declared himself the enemy of the human race, and lived secluded from mankind. He formed a subject of ridicule in the comedies of Aristophanes and Antiphanes, and his name has been rendered immortal by Shakspere. He lived during the Peloponnesian war.

TIMOR, ti'-mor, the southernmost and largest of the Molucca islands, in the Malay archipelago, separated from N.W. Australia by the Timor Sea. Area. Estimated at 8,800 square miles. Desc. Mountainous in the interior; whilst the shores on the south-east side are represented to be exceedingly low, and overrun with mangroves. Pro. Chiefly sandal-wood, wax, maize, sago, cattle, and horses. Minerals. Gold, copper, and rocksalt. Sandal-wood, biche-de-mer, beeswax, honey, and slaves are exported; and rice, arrack, sugar, tea, coffee, betel-nut, and the manufactures of China, with some from India and Europe, received in return. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 10° 22′ S. Lon. of the extreme south-west point of Timor, 123° 29′ E.

TIMOR LAUT, lau, an island of the Malay archipelago, 260 miles E. of Timor. Ext. 90 miles long. Lat. between 7° 10′ and 8° 30′ S. Lon. between 131° and 131° 40′ E.

TIMOTHEUS, ti-mo'-the-us, a poet and musician of Miletus. He was the friend of Euripides, and received an immense sum from the Ephesians for a poem in honour of Diana. Only a few fragments of his works have been preserved. D. 357 B.C.

TIMOTHEUS, a celebrated Athenian general, who was the son of Conon and the disciple of Isocrates. Placed in command of the Athenian fleet in 375 B.C., he, in order to avert an invasion of Thebes by the Lacedæmonians, took Corcyra, Cephalonia, and Arcania. He was a second time nominated admiral of a fleet of sixty ships; but his enemies having been able to produce a strong feeling against him at Athens, he was recalled. He was brought to trial; and although his innocence of the charges urged against him was well established, he was only liberated through the interference of Alcetas the Molassian, and Jason of Pheræ. In 361 B.C. he again held a naval command, and, proceeding to the Hellespont, he captured several towns. A reconciliation took place between him and his rival Iphicrates, in 357 B.C. The two commanders sailed to reduce Samos and the other rebellious allies of Athens; but the expedition proving unsuccessful, the Athenians were compelled to conclude a peace, which brought to a termination the Social War. Timotheus and his colleagues were subsequently accused of having taken bribes from the Chians and Rhodians. He was fined 100 talents, which sum being unable to pay, he retired to Chalcis, in Eubœa, where he died, B.C. 354. His countrymen afterwards acknowledged the injustice with which they had acted towards him, and nine-tenths of the penalty was remitted.

TIMOTHY, tim'-o-the, the disciple of St. Paul, was a native of Lystra, in Asia Minor. His father was a pagan, but his mother a Jewess. He became bishop of Ephesus, where, it is believed, he was stoned to death, in 97.

TIMUR, Sultan, or TAMERLANE, ti'-moor, a celebrated Tartarian conqueror, who was of Mongol origin, and was a descendant of Genghis Khan. He became a soldier in his twelfth year, and, at that early age, evinced unusual courage and an enterprising disposition. Having become chief of the tribe of the Berlas in 1361, he made himself master of Balk, the capital of Khorasan, after which he made an easy conquest of the province of Candahar. In this war he was wounded in the thigh, and became lame for life, being called, in consequence, Timur-lenk, 'lame Timur,' which term has been corrupted by the Europeans into Tamerlane. He next subdued the whole of ancient Persia, and then took Bagdad. Flushed with his success, he marched into India, where he took Delhi, the capital, and thus gained possession of immense treasures. But while he was engaged in this expedition, Bagdad revolted; on which he hastened back, delivered the city up to pillage, and put to death 90,000 persons. He also invaded Syria, and took Damascus. During this splendid career the Greek emperor and some inferior princes implored his assistance against Bajazet, emperor of the Turks. Tamerlane sent to him to withdraw from before Constantinople, and to replace the princes whom he had deposed. Bajazet returned a fierce answer; on which Tamerlane marched against him, and, after a battle of three days, the Turkish emperor was defeated and taken prisoner. Different and very irreconcilable accounts are given of the conqueror's treatment of his captive. Some assert that he was confined in an iron cage, and exposed to scorn and contempt; while others relate that Tamerlane behaved to him and his family with the greatest liberality. The last account appears to be the best founded. Tamerlane fixed the seat of his vast empire at Samarcand, where he received the homage of numerous sovereigns, and, among the rest, the ambassadors of the emperor Manuel Palæologus and Henry III., king of Castile. Having resolved to make the conquest of China, he set out with his army; but died on the march. For an account of the extraordinary career of this conqueror, see Gibbon's "Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire." B. at Sebz, near Samarcand, 1335; D. at Otrar, on the Jaxartes, 1405.

TINCHEBRAY, teench'-brai, a town of France, in the department of the Orne, 13 miles from Domfront. Manf. Paper and jewellery. Pop. 4,200. Here Robert of Normandy was finally defeated by his brother, Henry I. of England, in 1106.

TINDAL, Matthew, tin'-dal, an English deistical writer, who was educated at Oxford, where he became fellow of All-Souls College, and took his degree of doctor of laws. He embraced the Roman Catholic faith in the reign of James II., but professed himself a Protestant, and took the oaths at the Revolution. His works are,—"The Rights of the Christian Church;" the design of which work was to show the inutility of the clergy; "Christianity as Old as the Creation," in which he endeavoured to undermine revelation. It was answered by several able writers, particularly Conybeare, Leland, and Foster. His writings have been characterized as contemptible by his opponents, while, on the other hand, his admirers claims for them learning and great logical power. B. at Beer-Ferres, Devonshire, about 1657; D. in London, 1733.

TINDAL, Rev. Nicholas, an English historian, who was nephew of the preceding. He received his education at Exeter College, Oxford, and became fellow of Trinity College, rector of Colbourne, in the Isle of Wight, and chaplain to Greenwich hospital. His most important works were, a translation and continuation of Rapin's "History of England," and an abridgment of Spence's "Polymetis." B. 1687; D. at Greenwich hospital, 1774.

TINDALE-WARD, tin'-del-ward, the largest of the six wards of the county of Northumberland, having an area of 514,660 acres and a population of 45,000.

TING-HAE, ting'-hai, the capital city of the island of Chusan, off the E. coast of China, 70 miles from Ningpo. Pop. Unascertained. It was taken by the British in 1840.

TINIAN, te-ne-an', one of the Marianne Islands, in the Pacific Ocean.

TINNEVELLY, tin-ne-vel'-ly, a maritime district of the south of India, in the presidency of Madras. Area, 5,700 square miles. Desc. It occupies the south-east extremity of the peninsula, and is separated from Ceylon by the Gulf of Manaar. Generally speaking, it may be called an open and level country, although it contains some woods and several hills. The climate on the seacoast is arid and hot, and an extensive system of irrigation is carried on. Pro. Rice and cotton in the lowlands, and dry grains on the hills. Manf. Muslin, silks, cotton, and iron. Pop. 1,270,000. Lat. between 8° 9′ and 9° 56′ N. Lon. between 77° 15′ and 78° 28′ E.

TINNEVELLY, the capital of the above, is surrounded by extensive rice-fields, and, on the west, by rocky ground. It is unhealthy for Europeans. Pop. 20,000. Lat. 8° 48′ N. Lon. 71° 1′ E.

TINOS, te'-nos, an island of the Grecian archipelago, 10 miles from Syra. Area, 87 square miles. Desc. Well watered and fertile; producing silk, barley, fruits, honey, and wine. Pop. 16,000.

TINTORETTO, James Robusti, surnamed, tin'-to-ret'-to, a famous Italian painter. He was a disciple of Titian, who, fearing that he would become a powerful rival, dismissed him. He was called the furious Tintoretto, from the bold manner of his painting and the rapidity of his genius. He was a great but very unequal painter; his countrymen saying of him, that he possessed three pencils—one of gold, one of silver, and one of iron; alluding to the inequality of his efforts. He was the son of a dyer: whence his agnomen. B. at Venice, 1512; D. at the same city, 1594.

TIOGA, te-o'-ga, a county of the United States, on the north side of Pennsylvania. Area, 1,056 square miles. Pop. 24,000.—Another in New York. Area, 456 square miles. Pop. 25,000.

TIOGA, a river of the United States, running through Pennsylvania and New York, and, after a course of 90 miles, joining the Susquehannah, 10 miles from Torranda.

TIPERA, or TIPERAH, tip'-er-a, called by the Mahometans, "Roshenabad," a district of British India, in the Bengal presidency. Area, 4,850 square miles. Desc. It is situate on the eastern side of the Brahmapootra, and produces cotton, rice, betel-nut, and salt. A superior breed of elephants are said to roam in the forests. Manf. Coarse cotton goods. Pop. 1,407,000.

TIPPAH, tip'-pa, a county of the United States, in Mississippi. Area, 1,037 square miles. Pop. 22,000.

TIPPERARY, tip-pe-rai'-re, a county of Ireland, in Munster, extending in a very irregular form between the King's and Queen's counties on the north, the latter county and that of Kilkenny on the east, the counties of Waterford and Cork on the south, and those of Limerick, Clare, and Galway, on the west. From the two latter counties the river Shannon forms a natural boundary, as the river Suir does from Waterford for about 15 miles on the south. Area, 1,659 square miles. Desc. The lands of Tipperary have been always ranked amongst the most productive in Ireland. It has, however, been always a great grazing county. It has also extensive tracts of bog and mountain. To the south of a range of bog, and situate between the town of Killenaule and the county of Kilkenny, is the coal district. To the south of this, and in the south-eastern angle of the county, is Sliebh-na-man mountain. On the borders of the county of Waterford, over the town of Cloghen, are the Knockmele-down mountains. Nearly parallel to these, and north of them, are the lofty Galtese. Between these and the town of Tipperary is the lower range, called Sliebh-na-muck; but the greatest extent of mountain crosses the county from south-west to north-east, running from the county of Limerick to the Queen's county, and completely separating the two Ormonds from the rest of the county. The high hills adjoining Limerick are called, from the highest of them, the Keepe mountains. Rivers. The Suir, and its tributary streams. The western division has the Shannon for its boundary, and is well watered by numerous streams. Pro. Butter, and other dairy kinds of industry, and cattle. Minerals. Lead and copper mines; and some parts of it afford fine millstones. Manf. Unimportant. Pop. 332,000. This county is intersected by the Great South and Western Railway, with its branches.

TIPPERARY, a market-town of Ireland, capital of the above county, 87 miles from Dublin. It is beautifully situate in a fertile tract, and is well built and thriving. Pop. 8,400. It has a station on the Limerick and Waterford Railway.

TIPPOO-SAIB, tip'-poo-sa'-eeb, sultan of Mysore, was the son of Hyder Aly, whom he succeeded in the government of his kingdom, which he defended with success against the Great Mogul. In 1790 he engaged in a war with the English, and was defeated in a number of actions. In 1792 Lord Cornwallis obliged him to sue for peace, when Tippoo delivered his two sons as hostages. The war was resumed in 1799, and terminated with the entire conquest of Mysore and the death of Tippoo, who fell bravely fighting on the ramparts of his capital. His library was stored with valuable MSS., which are now in the College of Calcutta.

TIPTON, tip'-ton, a parish of Staffordshire, 8 miles from Birmingham. Pop. 25,000, engaged in coal and iron mines, forges, mills, and red-lead factories.

TIPTON, a county of the United States, in Tennessee. Area, 682 square miles. Pop. 9,000.

TIRABOSCHI, Giralamo, te-ra-bos'-ke, a celebrated Italian writer, who was a member of the society of Jesuits, and professor of rhetoric at Milan; but, upon the suppression of the order, the duke of Modena appointed him his librarian, and he was enrolled among the nobility of that city. His principal works are,—"Memoirs on the Ancient Order of Homilies;" "History of the Writers of Modena;" "History of Italian Literature, from the age of Augustus." B. at Bergamo, 1731; D. at Modena, 1794.

TIRANO, te-ra'-no, a town of Italy, in the Valteline, on the Adda, 12 miles from Kroya. Its vicinity produces corn, wine, and olives. Pop. 10,000.

TIRAQUEAU, or TIRAQUELLUS, Andrew, te-ra-ko', an eminent French lawyer, who became a counsellor in the parliament of Paris, and laboured much to drive chicanery from the bar. He was employed by Francis I. and Henry II. in affairs of consequence, and evinced himself a man of singular integrity. He wrote extensively upon jurisprudence. D. 1574.

TIRASPOL, te-ras'-pol, a town of European Russia, on the Dniester, 8 miles from Bender. Pop. 5,200. About half a mile from this town is a fort commanding the passage of the river.

TIREE, tir-ee', one of the Hebrides, on the coast of Scotland, and in the county of Argyle, 20 miles from Iona. Ext. 12 miles long, with a breadth varying up to 6. Desc. It contains numerous pasture-lands, and produces oats, barley, and potatoes. Pop. 4,000, many of them engaged in fishing and cattle-rearing.

TIREHBOLI, tir'-e-bol-i, a maritime town of Asiatic Turkey, 50 miles from Trebizond. It has several mosques and a Greek church. Pop. Unascertained.

TIRHOOT, ter-hoot', a district of British India, situate principally between lat. 27° and 28° N. Area. Estimated at 7,400 square miles. Desc. Fertile, richly wooded, and producing rice, maize, wheat, millet, oats, barley, sugar-cane, hemp, cotton, aromatic plants, and fruits. Manf. Cotton cloths, combs, rope, sacking, woollen fabrics, and earthenware. Pop. about 1,500,000.

TIRIDATES I., tir-i-dai'-tees, king of Armenia, was the brother of Vologesses, king of the Parthians, by whom he had been placed upon the throne. The Romans would not permit Armenia to become a possession of the Parthians, and Corbulo, the general of Nero, marched against Tiridates and Vologesses, and defeated them in several engagements. Subsequently, Tiridates consented to become a vassal king of the Roman emperor, and, in 66, he made a journey to Rome, in order to receive his crown from the emperor Nero. Flourished in the 1st century.

TIRIDATES II., surnamed the Great, became king of Armenia in 259. His youth had been passed at Rome, whither he had been taken in 232, upon the assassination of his father. The Romans placed him upon the throne; but the Parthians having invaded his kingdom while he was absent at Rome, he returned immediately, and subsequently totally defeated them. He was at first strongly opposed to Christianity, but was afterwards converted. D. 314.

TIRLEMONT, teerl'-mawn(g), a town of Belgium, in Brabant, on the Geete, 25 miles from Brussels. Manf. Woollens, hosiery, oil, soap, and paper. Pop. 9,000.—The fortifications of this place were dismantled in 1804.

TIRNOVA. (See TERNOVA.)

TISBURY, tis'-ber-e, a village and parish of England, in Wilts. The church is a spacious building, of great antiquity. Pop. 2,122.

TISCHBEIN, tish'-bine, John Henry, a celebrated German painter, who excelled in historical and mythological subjects. His best works are contained in the churches of his native country. B. 1722; D. 1789.

TISCHBEIN, John Henry William, an eminent German painter, who was the nephew of the preceding. He studied historical painting under his uncle, and acquired a knowledge of landscape from the tuition of John Jacob, at Hamburg. On visiting Italy, he became very popular there, and was appointed director of the academy at Naples. Returning to Germany, he resided chiefly at Hamburg and in the environs of Lubeck. His most remarkable paintings were an "Ajax" and "Cassandra," and an altarpiece painted for the church of St. Angari at Bremen. While at Naples, he made the acquaintance of Sir William Hamilton, the English ambassador and art-patron, for whom he made drawings of the ancient vases in his collection. He excelled in drawing animals, and produced a very fine work, entitled "Heads of Various Animals, drawn from Nature, to serve as a correct Indication of their Character." The portraits of Heyne, Blucher, and Klopstock were painted by him, and he likewise produced a fine collection of drawings illustrative of Homer (the text for which was written by Heyne), and a number of etchings after Paul Potter, Rembrandt, Roos, and Rosa di Tivoli. There were other members of his family who became celebrated as painters and designers. Tischbein was B. at Hayna, 1751; D. 1829.

TISHEMINGO, tish'-e-min'-go, a county of the United States, in Mississippi. Area, 1,149 square miles. Pop. 16,000.

TISIPHONE, ti-sif'-o-ne, one of the Furies, daughter of Nox and Acheron, was the minister of the vengeance of the gods upon mankind, and punished the wicked in Tartarus. She was represented with a whip in her hand; serpents hung from her head, and were wreathed round her arms.

TISSOT, Simon Andrew, tis'-so, an eminent Swiss physician, who distinguished himself in advocating inoculation, and also in recommending an experimental practice of physic. His medical works, particularly his "Advice to People concerning their Health," are excellent. B. at Lausanne, 1728; D. 1797.

TITAN, or TITANUS, ti'-tan, a son of Cœlus and Terra, brother to Saturn and Hyperion. He was the eldest of the children of Cœlus; but he gave Saturn the kingdom of the world, provided he begot no male children. When the birth of Jupiter was concealed, Titan made war against Saturn, and imprisoned him till he was replaced on his throne by his son Jupiter.

TITANS, THE, or TITANES, a name given to the sons of Cœlus and Terra. They were forty-five in number, according to the Egyptians. The most celebrated of the Titans are Saturn, Hyperion, Oceanus, Japetus, Cottus, and Briareus. They were all of a gigantic stature, and with proportionable strength. They were confined in the bowels of the earth by Cœlus, till Terra, sympathizing with their misfortunes, armed them against their father. The wars of the Titans against the gods are very celebrated in mythology. They are often confounded with that of the giants; but it is to be observed, that the war of the Titans was against Saturn, and that of the giants against Jupiter.

TITCHFIELD. (See TICHFIELD-WITH-CROFTON.)

TITIAN, Tiziano Vecelli commonly called, tish'-yan, a celebrated Italian painter, whose first master was Giovanni Bellini, in his time the greatest painter of Venice. Titian adopted his style; but, on becoming acquainted with the works of Giorgione, he altered his manner, and contracted an intimacy with that great artist. The reputation of Titian rose rapidly, and the emperor Charles V. conferred on him the honour of knighthood and a pension. He painted history, portraits, and landscape in a superb style. A "Last Suppor," in the Escurial in Spain, and one at Milan, representing "Christ crowned with Thorns," are among his finest works; but Venice and Madrid contain many remarkable efforts of his genius. His patron, Charles V., held him in the highest regard; and, upon one occasion, Titian happening to let his brush fall upon the ground, the emperor instantly picked it up, and restored it to the great painter, saying, "Titiano è degno essere servito da Cesare" (Titian is worthy of being served by Cæsar). B. at Capo del Cadore, in the Venetian states, 1477; D. at Venice, 1576.

TITE, William, tite, a modern English architect, who was selected to make the designs for the new Royal Exchange, which was commenced in 1841, and finished in three years, being opened in state by her majesty Queen Victoria in 1844. The building was erected at a cost of £150,000. After the successful execution of this work, he became one of the most extensively-employed architects of his day; his principal designs being for the Blackwall terminus of the London and Blackwall Railway, several stations upon the Southampton line of railway; the terminus at Southampton, and the old terminus at Vauxhall. B. in London, towards the close of the last century.

TITICACA, tit-e-ka'-ka, the most elevated, and one of the largest lakes of S. America, forming part of the boundary between S. Peru and Bolivia. It is situate in the plains that lie between the two Cordilleras, in the north-western part of the province of Los Charcas. (See AMERICA, SOUTH.)

TITIRIBI, te-ter'-e-be, a town of S. America, in New Granada, 40 miles from Antioquia, nearly 4,000 feet above the level of the sea. Pop. Unascertained.

TITSINGH, Isaac, tit'-sing, an eminent traveller, who was employed in the service of the Dutch East-India Company. He resided in Japan, Batavia, and China during thirty-one years. The government in Batavia appointed him, in 1794, as chief of the embassy dispatched to Pekin, a mission which he prosecuted with complete success. He published nothing during his life, but supplied Marsden, De Guignes, and other writers, with valuable information. After his death, his museum and MSS. were, unfortunately, dispersed; but M. Nepven and M. Abel Rémusat succeeded in obtaining some of his notes, from which some valuable works were published. The titles of these were, "The Marriage, Funeral, and other Ceremonies practised in Japan," and "Memoirs and Anecdotes of the Reigning Dynasty of Japan; with an Appendix upon the Poetry of the Japanese, and upon their Mode of Dividing the Year." Both these works were translated into English in 1822. In the "Annales des Voyages" there is an account of the island of Yesso, translated from the Japanese by Titsingh. One of the greatest treasures of the Bibliothèque du Roi,—the "Japanese Encyclopædia,"—was procured from Titsingh. B. at Amsterdam, 1740; D. 1812.

TITTERI, tit-ter-e', a marshy lake of Algeria, N. Africa, 80 miles from Algiers. It gave name to a province which is now comprised in Algiers.

TITTLIS, tit'-lis, one of the Swiss Alps, 18 miles from Wetterhorn. Height, 10,612 feet.

TITTMANN, John Augustus Henry, tit'-man, a German theologian and writer, who became first professor of theology in the university of Leipzig. He advocated the plan of uniting the German Protestant communities, and granting to them an ecclesiastical constitution at the congress of Vienna; and also distinguished himself in the chamber of the Saxon deputies as the mouthpiece of the university of Leipzig. He wrote extensively, in German and Latin, upon theology, edited the Greek text of the New Testament, and produced a History of the Protestant Church in Germany, which, however, was left incomplete at his death. B. at Langensalza, 1773; D. 1831.

TITUS, ti'-tus, a disciple of St. Paul, was a Greek and a Gentile; but, on his conversion, he became amanuensis to the apostle, who consecrated him bishop of Crete, where, according to an ancient tradition, he died at an advanced age.

TITUS LIVIUS. (See LIVY.)

TITUS, Flavius Vespasianus, a Roman emperor, was the son of the emperor Vespasianus. He served under his father, and distinguished himself at the siege of Jerusalem. He obtained the imperial dignity in 79. In his youth he was somewhat dissipated and extravagant, which gave room to fear that he would prove another Tiberius or Nero, but his subsequent conduct showed that these apprehensions were groundless. He became the pattern of virtue and the father of his people; reformed the courts of law, severely punished false accusers, and forgave those who had conspired against his own life. During his reign, Agricola restored peace to Britain; and, after marching as far north as the Frith of Tay, erected a wall to serve as a defence against the incursions of the Caledonians. Titus was so much beloved by his subjects as to be named by them "the delight of the human race." B. 40; D. 81.

TIUMEN, or TOUMEN, te-oo'-men, a town of Siberia, 120 miles from Tobolsk. It has regular streets, and numerous churches and schools. Manf. Russian leather, of which there are upwards of a hundred factories, woollen fabrics, and soap. It is a depôt for the commerce between Russia and China. Pop. 12,000.

TIVERTON, tiv'-er-ton, a market-town and borough of Devonshire, at the confluence of the Exe and Loman, 14 miles from Exeter. It consists of four principal streets, which form a quadrangle. The principal public buildings are the church and the free grammar-school. The church is a very handsome structure, dedicated to St. Peter, and is the work of different and distant ages, but is, notwithstanding, pretty uniform in its architecture. The south side is ornamented with much curious sculpture, particularly the porch and the adjoining chapel. The town contains, besides, several meeting-houses for dissenters; also a charity-school, a free English school, various almshouses, a town-house, divided into various apartments; an hospital, assembly-rooms, reading-room, theatre, and a corn-market. Manf. Lace and woollens. Pop. 11,200.

TIVERTON, a post-township of the United States, in Rhode Island, 12 miles from Newport. Pop. 5,000, mostly employed in fisheries.

TIVOLI, tiv'-o-le, a town of central Italy, 18 miles from Rome. It is delightfully situate on an eminence covered with olives and fruit-trees; but its greatest attraction now, as in former ages, consists in the falls of the Teverone (the ancient Anio), which glides gently through the town, till reaching the brink of a rock, over which it precipitates itself nearly 80 feet. On the summit of the steep bank stands a beautiful temple of the Corinthian order, built in the Augustan age. Near it are the remains of another ancient temple. It has, also, a cathedral and several churches. Pop. 6,000.

TIVY, or TOWEY, tiv'-y, a river of Wales, in the county of Caermarthen, falling into Caermarthen Bay, in a large estuary.

TLASCALLA, tlas-cal'-a, a former government of Mexico, in the intendancy of Puebla de los Angeles.

TLAXCALLA, or TLASCALLA, tlax'-kal-a, the capital of the above, on a small river, 64 miles from Mexico. When the Spaniards first arrived here, it is said to have contained 300,000 inhabitants; it is now much reduced. Pop. 4,000.

TLEMSEN, or TREMECEN, tlem'-sen, the most westerly of the three provinces into which the kingdom of Algiers is divided.

TLEMSEN, or TREMECEN, capital of the above province, 50 miles from Oran. It was once an important place; but, having revolted, Hassan, then dey of Algiers, laid it in ruins. Pop. 15,000. In its vicinity are some ancient remains.—The GULF is an inlet of the Mediterranean, opposite Cape Gata (Andalusia). It has, at its entrance, a width of 35 miles.

TMUTARAKAN, mu-tar'-a-kan, a fortified maritime town of S. Russia, on the Strait of Yenikale, 13 miles from Yenikale. It has an active trade in wool, skins, salt, wax, and honey. Pop. Unascertained.

TOBAGO, to-bai'-go, one of the British islands, in the West Indies, belonging to the Windward group, 24 miles from Trinidad. Ext. About 25 miles long, and 12 at its greatest width. Desc. Mountainous, with a soil of different kinds; but in general the mould is rich and black, and proper for producing, in the greatest plenty, whatever is raised in other parts of the West Indies. The abundance of springs contributes to the healthfulness of the island, and its bays and creeks are so disposed as to be very commodious for all kinds of shipping. Zoology. Peccaries, resembling swine, armadilloes, guanoes, Indian rabbits, and badgers. Horses, cows, asses, sheep, deer, goats, and rabbits, were probably introduced by the Dutch, and have multiplied exceedingly. The feathered tribes are in great variety. Pro. Tobago possesses almost every kind of plant that grows in the Antilles, besides the greater part of those which are peculiar to Spanish Guiana and Cape de Paria. It also abounds in figs, pineapples, pomegranates, oranges, lemons, limes, plantains, bananas, grapes, guavas, tamarinds, prickly pears, papas, muskmelons, water-melons, gourds, cucumbers, pompions. Pop. 13,000. Lat. 11° 25′ N. Lon. 60° 32′ W.—This island was first settled by the Dutch, who were expelled by the Spaniards. It was then settled by the English, to whom it was finally ceded by the peace of 1763. In 1781 it was taken by the French, and, in 1793, was retaken by the British, by whom it was retained at the peace of Amiens, and in whose possession it still remains.

TOBERMORY, to-ber-mor'-e, a seaport-town of Scotland, in the island of Mull, in Argyleshire, built by the British Society for the Encouragement of Fisheries, as a fishing-station and seaport. It has a custom-house and a good well-sheltered harbour. Pop. 1,600.—It has steam communication with the Clyde, Inverness, Skye, and Lewis.

TOBIN, John, to'-bin, an English dramatist, who exercised the profession of a solicitor in London, but devoted his leisure to the composition of plays, which he offered to the different London theatres, without success. At length his assiduous efforts, undermining a naturally weak constitution, led to his desth. His comedy of "The Honeymoon" was produced a few weeks after this event, and met with a very great success. It is written in imitation of the Shaksperian drama, and still keeps the stage. Other works of his were subsequently brought out, but they did not become popular. His unacted plays, together with a memoir of his life, were published in 1820. B. at Salisbury, 1770; D. 1804.

TOBOL, to-bol', a river of Asiatic Russia, rising in the S. part of the Oural Mountains, and, after a course of 450 miles, joining the Irtish, near Tobolsk.

TOBOLSK, to-bolsk', the most W. government of Siberia, embracing all its width, from the Arctic Ocean to the Kirghiz territory. On the W. the chain of the Ourals separates this government from that of European Russia; on the N. it is bounded by a vast extent of the Northern Ocean, broken into many deep bays, and extending from the mouth of the Obi to that of the Olenek; on the S., a frontier, consisting partly of mountains, partly of desert plains, separates it from Chinese and Independent Tartary; while, on the E., a varying line divides it from Irkutsk. Area. Estimated at 500,000 square miles. Desc. This government includes the vast tracts watered by the Obi, the Irtisch, and the Yenisei; and within its bounds is contained most of the cultivated part of Asiatic Russia. From the banks of the Frozen Ocean as far as lat. 58° N., the surface presents an aspect of the most dismal sterility. A great portion, on the other hand, of the most southerly districts consists of steppes covered with saline lakes and marshes. The steppe of Barabinski, on the contrary, which, in the eastern part, occupies the middle between these two districts, is covered with the most luxuriant pasturage, and would be capable of high cultivation, if the country were the seat of industry and population. Pro. Rye, barley, oats, and buckwheat. Minerals. The Ourals, through a great part of their line, produce iron and copper most abundantly; and in other parts there is an inexhaustible supply of various minerals, including no inconsiderable quantity of gold and silver. The widely-extended forests and wastes of this region afford, also, ample opportunities of hunting. Manf. Soap, leather, and woollen goods; but Tobolsk labours under the want of a water communication, by which its surplus produce could be disposed of. Pop. 690,000.

TOBOLSK, a large city, capital of the government of the same name, and of Siberia in general, on the river Irtisch. It is composed of two parts, the high and the low town. The former is built on an elevated ridge, running parallel to the Irtisch, at a little distance; while the latter fills the level space between it and the river. The high town contains the residence of the governor, the tribunals, public offices, and the magazine of foreign merchandise. These, with numerous churches, a cathedral with five cupolas, and a monument to Yermak, the founder of Russian influence in Siberia, form the principal objects of public attraction. The buildings being white and the cupolas gilded, cause them, in this high situation, to make a very fine appearance from a distance. The low town may be considered as a sort of suburb, and, with the exception of a convent, is built entirely of wood. Connected with it is a large suburb, inhabited by the Tartars. The other residents are in a great measure descended from exiles sent here by the Russian government. The largest colony ever transported hither consisted of the Swedish officers made prisoners at the battle of Pultava. Tobolsk is a great thoroughfare for that limited trade which the situation of Siberia admits of. The most important portion is carried on, by an immense extent of land and river carriage, between European Russia and the frontier of China. The merchants from Europe arrive in spring, with their commodities destined for that distant market; and at the end of summer, the boats appear returning with their cargoes to be transported to Moscow and Petersburg. Its society is said to be of a superior kind. Pop. 18,000. Lat. 58° 12′ N. Lon. 68° 15′ E.—Tobolsk was founded in 1587.

Tobooai-Manu, to-boo'-yai ma-noo', one of the Society Islands, in the Pacific Ocean.

Tocantines, to-kan-teens', a river, which rises, by many heads, near Goyaz, in the interior of Brazil, and, after a course of upwards of 1,000 miles, joins the Atlantic E. of the Amazon. Near lat. 2° S. it assumes the name of Rio Para.

Tocat, or Tokat, to-kat', a commercial city in the interior of Asia Minor, 56 miles from Sivas. It rises in the form of an amphitheatre, in a deep valley on the banks of the Yeshil-Irmak, the ancient Iris. Manf. Copper kettles, candlesticks, with blue morocco and silk stuffs. Tocat is the centre of a very extensive inland trade to and from all parts of Asia Minor. Pop. about 7,000 families, of whom the greater number are Turkish. Lat. 39° 35′ N. Lon. 36° 30′ E.

Toce, Toccia, or Tosa, to'-che, a river of Sardinian Piedmont, rising in the Alps, near Simplon, and after a course of 50 miles entering Lake Maggiore on its left side.

Tocqueville, Henry Alexis, Count de, tŏk'-veel, a celebrated French historical writer, who, after completing his education, was, in 1831, dispatched with M. De Beaumont to the United States of America for the purpose of making researches upon the working of democratic institutions. The results of this mission appeared in his valuable work entitled, "De la Démocratie en Amérique," produced in 1835. Four years later he became a member of the Chamber of Deputies. After the revolution of 1848 he was nominated vice-president of the Assembly, and was soon afterwards created one of the ministry under the presidentship of Louis Napoleon. He was one of those who were divested of power by the coup d'état. Devoting the remaining years of his life to philosophical researches into history, he produced—"Philosophical History of the Reign of Louis XV.;" "A Glance at the Reign of Louis XVI.;" and "L'Ancien Régime et la Révolution," which was translated into English under the title of "On the State of Society in France before the Revolution of 1788, and on the Causes which led to that Event." He was a member of the French Academy. B. 1805; D. 1859.

Tocuyo, to-kŭ'-o, a town of South America, in the Caraccas, province of Venezuela, 34 miles from Truxillo. It stands in a valley, and has a well-built parish church, on which depends one chapel of ease. Manf. Woollen fabrics and leather. Pop. 10,000.

Tocuyo, a river of South America, rising in the vicinity of Lake Maracaibo, and, after a course of 200 miles, entering the Caribbean Sea N. of the Gulf of Triste.

Tod, Lieut.-Colonel James, tod, an English writer, who, after spending many years in the military service of the East-India Company, produced two valuable works upon India, which are entitled, respectively, "The Annals of Rajast'han," containing the geography, antiquities, and history of Rajpootana; and "Travels in Western India." He was distinguished by his ability while political agent in Rajpootana, one of whose towns, Bulwharra, which had been laid in ruins by the Mahrattas, was restored by him. One of the merchants of the renovated city said, "it ought to be called Todgunge; but there is no need, for we shall never forget him." B. 1782; D. 1835.

Tod, a county of the United States, in Kentucky. Area, 362 square miles. Pop. 13,000.

Todd, Rev. Henry John, an English writer, who became archdeacon of Cleveland, chaplain in ordinary to her Majesty, and produced, among other important works, "The Poems of Edmund Spenser, with Notes and a Life;" "Illustrations of the Lives and Writings of John Gower and Geoffrey Chaucer;" "A Vindication of our Authorized Translation of the Bible." B. 1763; D. 1845.

Todd, Robert Bentley, an eminent modern physician and writer, who became physician to King's College Hospital on its establishment. In 1836 he commenced the publication of his important work entitled "Cyclopædia of Anatomy and Physiology," in which he was assisted by the most eminent of the scientific men of the time. He was also the author of "The Physiological Anatomy and Physiology of Man;" "On the Anatomy of the Brain, Spinal Chord, and Ganglions;" and "On Gout and Rheumatic Fever." B. in Ireland.

Toddington, tod'-ing-ton, a market-town of Bedfordshire, 5 miles from Dunstable. Manf. Straw-plait. Pop. 2,500.

Todleben, Francis Edward, tot-lai'-ben, a celebrated Russian general of engineers, who, while serving with the Russian army in Sebastopol, was selected to place the southern side of that fortress in a state of defence against the attacks of the allied English and French forces. In this undertaking, Todleben evinced the highest talents as a military engineer. Earthworks and enormous ramparts sprang up, under his direction, at every point that was about to be attacked. For a considerable period his extraordinary works kept the allies in check, and it was owing to the strength and completeness of his Malakhoff, Redan, and Flagstaff batteries, that the siege was so long protracted. Todleben's genius was rapidly acknowledged: he was only second captain of engineers when he went to the Crimea, but at the fall of Sebastopol he had risen to the rank of general. In the last days of the siege he was wounded in the leg. B. at Mitau, in Courland, 1818.

Todmorden-with-Wafsden, tod-mor'-den, a market-town of Lancashire, 8 miles from Rochdale. Manf. Cotton goods. Pop. 8,000. It has a station on the Manchester and Leeds Railway.

Todos Santos, to'-dos sănt'-tos, a convenient bay on the coast of Brazil, and province of Bahia. Ext. 37 miles long from north to south; its greatest width from east to west is 27. The eastern part of the bay lies in lat. 12° 42′ S., lon. 38° 42′ W.

Tograi, to'-grai, an eminent Arabic poet, who became vizier to Mahomet, sultan of Mosul. He was taken prisoner at the battle of Esterabad, near Hamadan, in 1120, by Mahmoud, the Seljukian sultan of Persia, who subsequently put the poet to death. Besides his poems, he wrote a work upon alchemy. One of his works was translated into Latin by Pococke, and published at Oxford in 1661. Another poem was translated into English by Leon Chappilow, and produced at Cambridge in 1758. Flourished in the 11th century.

Tokay, to-kai', a town in the north-east of Hungary, at the confluence of the rivers Bodrog and Theiss, 42 miles from Debreczin. It contains various churches and monasteries, and has well-frequented yearly fairs. This town, though small, has attained great celebrity for its wine, which is among the finest and most expensive wines in Europe. Pop. 6,000.

Toland, John, to'-land, a Deistical writer, who was educated in Ireland, in the Roman Catholic faith, but, at the age of 15, became Protestant, and afterwards went to the university of Glasgow, whence he removed to Edinburgh. After visiting Leyden and Oxford, he returned to Ireland, which country he was obliged to leave to avoid the persecutions to which he was subjected for writing a work called "Christianity not Mysterious." In 1698 he published the "Life of Milton," which was followed by a Deistical work, entitled "Nazarenus," and several other books of a like tendency. His posthumous works were printed in 1726. B. in Ireland, either 1669 or 1670; D. at Putney, 1722.

TOLEDO, Don Pedro de, to-lai'-do, an eminent Spanish general, who distinguished himself in the expedition against Jean D'Albret, king of Navarre, in 1512. In 1532 he was created, by Charles V., viceroy of Naples; in which office he displayed considerable talent, and inaugurated many useful measures; he evinced, however, great intolerance towards the Jews, whom he drove from the kingdom; and also attempted to establish the Inquisition; but a terrible insurrection ensuing, the emperor abolished the hated tribunal in the following year (1548). The prince of Sanseverino, the patron of the father of Torquato Tasso, was one of the leaders of this insurrection, and was, in consequence, compelled to retire to France. (See TASSO, Torquato.) In 1552 a Turkish fleet entered the Bay of Naples, intending to await the arrival of a French squadron with the exiled Neapolitan princes on board, and afterwards to attack the city; but Toledo succeeded, by means of a large bribe, in inducing the Mahometans to retire before the junction with the French. Soon afterwards he prepared to march against the French, who had entered Sienna; but his death occurred before he could reach the place. B. near Salamanca, 1484; D. at Florence, 1553.

TOLEDO, a province in the central part of Spain, in New Castile, situate chiefly to the south of the Tagus. Area, about 9,000 square miles. Desc. Mountainous in general, and watered by the Alberche, the Algodar, the Tagus, and the Guadiana. Its pasturage is good, at least in particular situations; the flocks of sheep are numerous, and the wool of the best quality. Pro. Vines, silk, honey, wax, and fruits. Pop. about 370,000.

TOLEDO, an ancient city in the interior of Spain, in New Castile, and the chief town of the preceding province, 41 miles from Madrid. It is situate on the sides and top of a steep hill washed by the Tagus. The vicinity of the hills, by concentrating the sun's rays, renders the heat in summer excessive; whilst the houses are crowded, and the streets narrow and steep; and though there are several public walks, they are at a distance from the centre of the town. The principal attraction in Toledo are its public edifices. The Alcazar, or palace, is a large structure at the top of a hill, built with solidity, and decorated with statues. The cathedral is of great antiquity, and is the metropolitan church of Spain. The original structure was founded in 587, and served as a mosque to the Moors. Besides these, there are a large number of churches, hospitals, monasteries, and convents. The hospital of St. Cruz is an elegant building of the 15th century; that of St. John, built in the 16th, is equally rich, and in a better situation. Of Roman monuments there are here only the remains of a circus, an aqueduct, and a road. The walls, though ruinous, are of less remote date, having been erected by the Moors or the kings of Castile. The university still exists, and there are four colleges, a town-hall, and a mint. Manf. Woollens, linen, and silks; and the Toledo swords, so noted throughout Spain, are now made in a large building on the banks of the Tagus. The secret of tempering them is said to have been recovered, and they fetch a very high price. Pop. 14,000. Toledo is a place of great antiquity, and was successively the seat of government under the Goths, the Moors, and the kings of Castile. Between the 5th and 9th centuries it was the seat of several general ecclesiastical councils.

TOLENTINO, to-len-te'-no, a town of Italy, in the States of the Church, 12 miles from Macerata. Pop. 10,000. Here, in February, 1797, the Pope ceded, by treaty, the Romagna to the French republic; and in May, 1815, Murat retired with his troops before the Austrians.

TOLLAND, tol'-land, a county of the United States, in Connecticut. Area, 337 square miles. Pop. 21,000.

TOLLIUS, Jacob, tol'-li-us, a learned Dutch physician, who became professor of eloquence and Greek at Brandenburg. He published, among other works, editions of Ausonius and Longinus, with notes. B. at Utrecht, about 1630; D. 1696.

TOLLIUS, Cornelius, brother of the preceding, became amanuensis to Isaac Vossius, and afterwards professor of Greek and rhetoric at Harderwyck. He published, among other works, one entitled "De Infelicitate Literatorum." B. at Utrecht, about 1620; D. about 1652.

TOLMEZZO, tol-met'-so, a town of Austrian Italy, 25 miles from Udine. It stands on the Tagliamento, 1,000 feet above the level of the sea. Pop. 3,500.

TOLNA, or TOLNAU, tol'-na, a market-town in the south-west of Hungary, to the W. of the Danube, 12 miles from Koloesa. Manf. Tobacco and potash. Pop. 6,000.

TOLOAR, to'-lōre, the largest of the Salibabo Islands, in the Malay Archipelago, between Gilolo and Mindanao. It has a circuit of about 80 miles. Desc. Diversified and well cultivated. Pop. Unascertained, but considerable. Lat. 4° 28′ N. Lon. 126° 55′ E.

TOLOMEI, Claudio, to'-lo-mai-e, an Italian poet and orator, who became bishop of Corsola, and wrote several esteemed works, the principal of which is a speech delivered before Pope Clement VII. on the peace with the emperor Charles V. in 1529. B. at Sienna, 1492; D. at Rome, 1554.

TOLOSA, to-lo'-sa, a town of Spain, in Biscay, at the confluence of the rivers Orio and Araxes, 32 miles from Bilboa. It stands in a narrow defile, and is inclosed by a wall, entered by several gates. Manf. Earthenware, woollens, hats, and leather. Pop. 7,300.

TOLU, to-loo', a seaport of South America, in Carthagena, 55 miles from Carthagena. It has a good harbour, and stands in a vicinity which produces the balsam of Tolu. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 9° 32′ N. Lon. 75° 30′ W.

TOMASZOW, tom-as'-zo, a town of Russian Poland, 20 miles from Rana. Manf. Woollen, linen, and cotton fabrics. Pop. 5,000.

TOMBIGBEE, or TOMBECKBEE, tom-big'-be, a river of the United States, in the Alabama territory. After a course of 300 miles, it joins the Alabama, 45 miles above the head of Mobile Bay.

TOMBUCTOO, or TIMBUCTOO, tom-book'-too, a city of Central Africa, which has, for several centuries, been the grand resort of the interior trade of that continent. According to the accounts of Leo Africanus, the city contained many shops of artisans and merchants, and particularly numerous manufactures of cotton cloth. There were in it many persons of great opulence, especially its foreign merchants; two of whom were reckoned so considerable by their wealth, that the king had given them his daughters in marriage. The king possessed an ample treasure, and held a very splendid and well-regulated court. The houses of the ordinary inhabitants appear to have been built in a somewhat humble style, and were in the form of bells; the walls composed of stakes or hurdles, and the roofs of interwoven reeds. Stone, however, had been used in the construction of the principal mosque and of the royal palace, the latter of which was designed by an artist from Granada. Its importance is now derived from its being the entrepôt for the trade between Guinea, Senegambia, and N. Africa. Caravans from Morocco and other Barbary states here exchange European manufactures, tobacco, pepper, firearms, and coral, for gold-dust, ostrich feathers, gums, palm-oil, salt, and slaves. It is now governed by a native chieftain. Pop. Perhaps 20,000. Lat. 18° 3′ N. Lon. 1° 45′ W.

TOMINA, to-me'-na, a town of South America, on the Guapez, 55 miles from Chuquisaca. Pop. Unascertained.

TOMLINE, Dr. George, tom'-lin, an English prelate, who was educated at Pembroke Hall, Cambridge, of which college he was, in 1773, elected fellow. In 1782 he became private secretary to Mr. Pitt, at that time appointed chancellor of the Exchequer. Tomline occupied the same post under Pitt when the latter became first lord of the Treasury. After receiving some preferment in the church, he was, in 1787, advanced to the bishopric of Lincoln, which see he continued to hold during more than 32 years, refusing, in the interim, the bishopric of London. In 1820 he became bishop of Winchester. In addition to a large number of sermons, he was the author of "The Elements of Christian Theology;" "A Refutation of Calvinism;" and "Memoirs of Mr. Pitt." His original name was Pretyman, which he changed to that of Tomline on succeeding to the estates of Marmaduke Tomline, Esq., of Rigby Grove, Lincolnshire. D. at Bury St. Edmunds, Suffolk, 1750; D. 1827.

TOMPKINS, tom'-kins, a county of the United States, in New York, formed in 1817, from a part of the counties of Seneca and Cayuga. Area, 580 square miles. Pop. 40,000.

TOMSK, tomsk, a considerable city of Asiatic Russia, capital of an extensive district, on the Tom, 25 miles from its junction with the Obi, or Obe. It was originally a mere wooden fort. The most considerable part of the town is built at the foot of a mountain, in the most irregular manner. Within its circuit are the cathedral church, the tribunals, the treasury, with the magazines of furs collected as tribute. The other principal edifice is the church of the Resurrection; and there are a convent and a monastery. It is the centre of the trade in brandy, or rather whisky; and habits of drunkenness are general. Besides Russians, the place contains a great number of Tartar, Bucharian, and Kalmuck merchants. Pop. 11,000. Lat. 56° 30′ N. Lon. 84° 10′ E.—The DISTRICT is watered by the Obi and the Ishim, and has a population estimated at 400,000. Lat. between 49° and 61° N. Lon. between 75° and 90° E.

TONBRIDGE. (See TUNBRIDGE.)

TONDERN, tön'-dern, a town of Denmark, in the duchy of Sleswick, 37 miles from Sleswick. Manf. Woollens, lace, and linen fabrics. Pop. 6,500.

TONDRAY, ton'-drai, one of the Shetland Islands.

TONE, tone, a river of England, rising in Somersetshire, and, after a course of 30 miles, falling into the Parret, between Bridgewater and Langport.

TONE, Theobald Wolfe, the founder of the society of United Irishmen. Compelled to fly from Ireland, he repaired to France, and induced the Directory to dispatch an expedition to Ireland, of which he was appointed adjutant-general. He was taken prisoner, and D. in prison in 1798.

TONG, tung, a prefix to the names of several cities in China.

TONGA ISLANDS, tong'-a, a group in the Pacific Ocean, composing a section of the Friendly Islands.

TONGATABOO ISLAND, tong'-ga-ta-boo', one of the Friendly Islands, in the South Pacific Ocean, first discovered by Tasman, who called it Amsterdam. It is the residence of the sovereign of the Tonga Islands. Ext. It has a circuit of sixty miles. Desc. Fruitful, and there are numerous plantations. Zoology. The only quadrupeds, besides hogs, are a few rats, and some dogs, which are not natives, but produced from some left by Captain Cook. Fowls, which are of a large breed, are domesticated here; and birds, in general, are in great variety and beauty. The only noxious animals of the reptile or insect tribe are sea-snakes, scorpions, and centipedes. Pro. The principal are plantains, of which they have a large number of different sorts or varieties; bread-fruit, plums, sugar-cane, bananas, fine timber, and a vast number of shaddocks, which, however, are found as often in a natural state as planted. The sea abounds with fish, though the variety is less than might be expected. The inhabitants usually go unarmed, but they have weapons of a very formidable nature. The manners of the lower classes are licentious in the extreme. Pop. 8,000. Lat. 21° 4′ S. Lon. 175° 28′ W. This island was discovered, in 1643, by Abel Jansan Tasman; and was visited in 1773 by Cook, in 1777 by Perouse, in 1787 by Captain Edwards, in 1791 by Messrs. D'Entrecasteaux and Huon, the French sloops La Recherche and L'Espérance in 1793, and by the missionary ship Duff in 1797.

TONGERN, or TONGRES, tong'-hern, tognr, a town of Belgium, on the Jaar, 9 miles from Liege. Manf. Hats and chicory. Pop. 6,300.

TONNEINS, ton'-nain(g)s, a town of France, in the department of the Lot-and-Garonne, on the Garonne, 55 miles from Bordeaux. Manf. Woollens, cordage, and woods. Pop. 7,600. It has a station on the railway from Bordeaux to Cette.

TONNERRE, ton-nair', a town of France, in the department of the Yonne, on the Armençon, 20 miles from Auxerre. Manf. Glass, pottery, and hats. Pop. 4,700.

TONQUIN, ton'-ken, the most N. province of Anam, in S.E. Asia, bounded N. by China, W. by the Laos country, S. Cochin China, and E. by the Gulf of Tonquin. Area. Unascertained. Desc. Fertile near the sea, and well watered. Pro. Rice, sugar, cotton, spices, tea, indigo, silk, saffron, gums, and varnishes. It also produces the precious metals. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. between 19° and 23° N. Lon. between 102° and 108° 30′ E. The GULF is an inlet of the China Sea, and has a length of 300 miles and a breadth of 150.

TONSTALL, or TUNSTALL, Cuthbert, ton'-stall, a learned English prelate, who studied at Oxford, Cambridge, and Padua, and was accounted the best mathematician of his time. He was consecrated bishop of London in 1522; in the following year made lord privy seal; and in 1530 translated to Durham, of which he was deprived in the reign of Elizabeth, for refusing to take the oath of supremacy. He wrote, among other works,—"A Treatise on Arithmetic;" "A Defence of Transubstantiation;" and an abridgement of Aristotle's "Ethics." B. in Yorkshire, 1474 or 1475; D. at Lambeth, 1559.

TONTI, Lorenzo, ton'-te, an Italian banker, who was established in Paris, and there introduced a species of life annuity in 1653, which was called after his name. The scheme was also introduced into England, but was not continued after 1769, the date of the last tontine.

TOOBOUAI ISLAND, to-boo'-ai, one of the Society Islands, in the South Pacific Ocean. Lat. 23° 25′ S. Lon. 210° 37′ E. This island was discovered by Cook in 1777, and was resorted to by the mutineers of the Bounty in 1789.

TOOKE, Andrew, took, an English divine, who became successively usher and master of the Charterhouse school, and also professor of geometry at Gresham College. He published the Abbé Pomey's "Pantheon" in English, without acknowledging the real author. B. in London, 1673; D. 1731.

TOOKE, John Horne, an English politician and philologer, who received his education at Westminster and Eton, and afterwards at St. John's College, Cambridge. In compliance with the wishes of his father, he entered into holy orders, although he himself strongly disliked the ecclesiastical profession. After travelling upon the continent as tutor to the sons of several gentlemen, he, in 1773, relinquished his clerical engagements, and commenced the study of the law. He had already taken an active part in political discussion, and had exerted himself to procure the return of his friend Wilkes as member for Middlesex, in 1768. While a student of the law, he gave great assistance to Mr. William Tooke upon the question of an inclosure bill; in gratitude for which service the latter gentleman made him his heir. This was the origin of his adding to his original name of John Horne, that of Tooke. After quarrelling with Wilkes, with whom, as well as Junius, he carried on a spirited controversy, he, upon the outbreak of the American war, attacked the English ministry, and made a proposal for a subscription for the widows and orphans of those Americans who had been "murdered by the king's troops at Lexington and Concord." For this proceeding, he was brought to trial upon a charge of libel, found guilty, and sentenced to pay a fine of £200, and to be imprisoned for twelve months. After regaining his liberty, he applied to be admitted to practise at the bar; but was rejected, on the ground of his having previously taken holy orders. Retiring into Huntingdonshire, he, for a time, occupied himself with literary studies, and composed a short work in favour of parliamentary reform. In 1786 he produced the first volume of his celebrated "Diversions of Purley." In 1794 he was arrested upon a charge of high treason, and after a trial of six days, during which he displayed considerable intrepidity, he was acquitted. Having twice previously sought the suffrages of the citizens of Westminster with almost entire success, he became a member for the borough of Old Sarum, in 1801. He retained his seat less than a year; for, after the dissolution in 1802, he could not regain it, in consequence of the passing of an act which disqualified any one holding priests' orders from representing a constituency in the House of Commons. Thereupon he retired into private life. A good edition of his "Diversions" was produced by Mr. Richard Taylor in 1810. B. in London, 1736; D. at Wimbledon, 1812.

TOOKE, Rev. William, an English divine and writer, who became chaplain to the factory of the Russian Company at St. Petersburg. He was the author of "Life of Catherine II.," "A View of the Russian Empire," and other works. B. 1744; D. in London, 1820.

TOOKE, Thomas, a modern English writer upon political economy, who was the son of the preceding. His most important works were "A History of Prices and the State of the Circulation," and "Brief Sketch of the State of the Corn-trade in the last Two Centuries." B. about the commencement of the present century.

TOOKE, William, younger brother of the preceding, produced an edition of the works of Churchill, which was subsequently included in the collection of English authors called the "Aldine Poets." He also wrote "The Monarchy of France; its Rise, Progress, and Fall;" and upon the establishment of the Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge, in promoting which he took an active part, he was appointed treasurer. He was a fellow of the Royal Society. B. at St. Petersburg, 1777.

TÖPFFER, Charles, te(r)p'-fer, a modern German author, who, after concluding his scholastic education, embraced a dramatic career, and, during a number of years, played upon the stages of Strelitz, Breslau, and Vienna. Abandoning the drama in 1832, he took up his residence at Hamburg, where he turned his attention to literature. He produced several comedies, which were favourites upon the German stage, and some novels, which have been translated into English. B. at Berlin, 1792.

TOPHAM, Thomas, top'-ham, an Englishman of great muscular strength. He kept a public-house at Islington, and used to perform surprising feats; such as breaking a broomstick of the largest size by striking it against his bare arm; lifting two hogsheads of water; heaving his horse over the turnpike-gate; carrying the beam of a house as a soldier would his firelock. He could also roll up a pewter dish of seven pounds as a man rolls up a sheet of paper; squeeze a pewter quart pot together at arm's length; and lift two hundredweight with his little finger, over his head. At Derby he broke a rope fastened to the floor, that would sustain twenty hundredweight; and lifted an oak table, six feet long, with his teeth, though half a hundredweight was hung at the extremity. He raised a man who weighed twenty-seven stone, with one hand. He stabbed himself, after quarrelling with and wounding his wife, in 1749.

TOPHANE, to-fa'-ne, 'an arsenal,' a suburb of Constantinople.

TÖPLITZ. (See TEPLITZ.)

TOPSHAM, top'-sam, a market-town and seaport of Devonshire, at the confluence of the Clist and Exe, 4 miles from Exeter. It consists chiefly of one long street, of irregular breadth. The church stands near the centre of the town, on a high cliff, which gives it a commanding prospect. The quay is spacious and commodious. Manf. Ropes and chain-cables; shipbuilding is also carried on. Pop. 3,400. Steamers ply regularly to London from this place.

TOPSHAM, a township of the United States, in Orange county, Vermont. Pop. 1,700.—Another in Lincoln county, in the state of Maine. Pop. 2,200.

TORBAY, tor-bai', a fine and commodious bay of the English Channel, on the coast of Devonshire, 5 miles from Dartmouth, and formed by two capes, called Berry Point or Head, and Bob's Nose. It forms the general rendezvous of the British navy, and was the place where William III. landed when he arrived in England, on the 5th November, 1688.

TORCELLO, tor-chel'-lo, a town of Austrian Italy, in the marshy district called the Lagunes, 7 miles from Venice. It has an old Byzantine church, but the climate is extremely unhealthy. Pop. Unascertained.

TORDA, tor'-da, a market-town of Austria, Transylvania, 20 miles from Klausenburg. Pop. 7,000.

TORDENSKIOLD, tor'-dens-kyold, a celebrated Danish admiral, who was at first a barber's apprentice; but his love for a seafaring life induced him to abandon this employment, and to enter the navy as a sailor. His conduct was so good that his captain got him appointed midshipman in the royal navy. After distinguishing himself as captain of a privateer, he was appointed to the command of a frigate, in which, during the war with Sweden, he performed prodigies of valour and seamanship. In 1715 he destroyed several Swedish vessels, and captured a large frigate; for which he was created a commodore, and placed in command of a squadron in the Baltic. In 1716 he engaged the Swedish fleet of more than double the number of his own, and, in an hour, captured three ships of the line and two frigates. Charles XII. of Sweden, expecting to witness the defeat of the Danes, had taken up a position in the island of Rugen, but had to behold the discomfiture of his own navy. In the same year, Tordenskiold also gained the battles of Dyneskiln and Stroemstadt, for which he was ennobled under the name of Tordenskiold (shield against thunder), his original name having been Peter Wessel. In 1717 he took Marstrond, a strong fortress belonging to the Swedes, in the Cattegat. Peace being proclaimed in 1720, he solicited permission to travel, which being reluctantly granted by his sovereign, he proceeded to Hamburg, where his companion, a wealthy native of Copenhagen, lost considerable sums to one Colonel De Stahl, a Swede. Tordenskiold afterwards encountered the gambler at Hanover, where the admiral had gone in order to be presented to George II. At a dinner-party in this city, he met De Stahl, and expressing his intention not to sit at table with him, a quarrel ensued. A hostile meeting was arranged for the next day. The admiral went without a second, and armed only with a light sword; his opponent being provided with a very heavy weapon. At the commencement of the duel, Tordenskiold's blade was broken by De Stahl, who immediately ran him through the heart. In Denmark it was said that he had been subjected to foul play at the instance of a high personage. B. at Trondheim, Norway, 1691; killed 1720.

TORDESILLAS, tor-de-sil'-us, a town of Spain, on the Douro, over which is a very fine bridge, 25 miles from Valladolid. Pop. 4,000.

TORELLI, Giuseppe, to-rail'-le, a celebrated Italian mathematician, who produced an edition, in Greek and Latin, of the whole of the works of Archimedes. His death taking place immediately after he had concluded this undertaking, the work remained in manuscript, and being purchased by the university of Oxford, was printed there under the direction of Dr. Robertson in 1792. B. at Verona, 1721; D. 1781.

TORELLI, Laelio, or TAURELLIUS, an eminent Italian jurist, who was employed in various high employments by Pope Clement VIII. until about 1528, when, having become involved in a dispute with the Malatesti family, he took refuge under the protection of the Medici at Florence. In 1546 he rose to be chief secretary to the grand-duke. He produced, among other learned works, an edition of the Pandects of Justinian. B. at Fano, 1489; D. at Florence, 1576.

TORFÆUS, or TORMODUS, the literary names of Thormond Thorveson, a native of Iceland, who, in 1682, became historiographer to Christian V., king of Denmark. He wrote the history of Norway, containing also the annals of the northern parts of Scotland, from the year 850 to 1206. D. 1719.

TORGAU, tor-gow', a town of Prussian Saxony, on the Elbe, 46 miles from Dresden. Pop. 9,000. It has been the scene of several sanguinary conflicts, the most remarkable of which was the victory obtained here on the 11th November, 1760, over the Austrians, by Frederick II. of Prussia.

TORMES, tor'-mes, a river of Spain, rising among the mountains in the province of Salamanca, and, after a course of 150 miles, falling into the Douro on the borders of Portugal. Its banks were the scene of many conflicts between the French and Spaniards during the Peninsular war, from 1808 to 1814.

TOR-MOHAM, tor'-mo-mam, a parish of Devonshire, 8 miles from Totness. Pop. 11,500.

TORNEA, tor'-ne-a, a small but remarkable town in the north of Finland, at the north extremity of the Gulf of Bothnia. It stands on a small island in the river Tornea; and having been built by order of government (in 1620), is regular in its streets. It is a central spot for the exports and imports into a wild and very thinly-peopled country. The exports consist of timber, fish, rein-deer, hides, furs, and tar; the imports, of salt, snuff, tobacco, groceries, and spirits. Pop. 700. Lat. 65° 50′ 50″ N. Lon. 24° 6′ 15″ E. Here, in 1736, the French academicians made measurements to ascertain the figure of the earth.

TORNEA, or TORNEO, a river of Scandinavia, separating the Swedish and Russian dominions. After a course of 230 miles, it enters the Gulf of Bothnia at Tornea.

TORNEA LAPPMARK, lap'-mark, the most northern of the provinces of Swedish Lapland, lying between the river Torneo, Lulea Lappmark, and Norwegian Lapland.

TORO, tor'-o, a town of Italy, in Naples, 7 miles from Campobasso. Pop. 2,400.

TORO, a small island in the Mediterranean, off the S.W. coast of the island of Sardinia.

TORO, the name of three districts, all situate in the north of Spain.

TORO, a river of Mongolia, E. Asia, joining the Nouni on the frontier of Manchooria, after a course of 250 miles.

TORO, a city of Spain, in the province of Leon, on the Douro, over which it has a bridge of 22 arches, 17 miles from Zamora. It is regularly built, with wide but dirty streets, and contains several churches and convents. Manf. Coarse linens, woollens, brandy, and leather. Pop. 7,000. Here are the remains of an ancient Moorish castle, forming a square of 133 feet, with a round tower at each angle.

TOROK-BETSE, or TURKISH BETSCHE, tor-ok-bets, a market-town of Hungary, on the Theiss, 28 miles from Peterwardein. Pop. 5,000.—Also the name of other two towns with small populations.

TORONTO, tor-on'-to (formerly YORK), the capital city of Upper Canada, on the north shore of Lake Ontario, 30 miles from the mouth of Niagara river. It is regularly laid out, and has a college, government offices, Osgood Hall, St. George's Church, a gaol, banks, hospitals, and a lunatic asylum. The harbour is protected by a battery and other works. Its trade is chiefly with Buffalo. Pop. about 50,000. This was the seat of the government till the union of the Upper and Lower provinces in 1811.

TOROPEZ, tor-o-pez', a town of European Russia, on the Toropa, 50 miles from Cholm. It has a cathedral, numerous parish churches, monasteries, and several schools. Pop. 8,000.

TORPHICHEN, tor-pich'-en, a parish and town of Scotland, in Linlithgowshire, 4 miles from Linlithgow. The parish has an area of 16 square miles, but is mostly hilly. Pop. 1,400.

TORQUAY, tor'-ke, a market-town of Devonshire, 18½ miles from Exeter. It has a news-room, library, superior schools, and a mechanics' institute. Pop. 8,000. This place has regular steam communication with Portsmouth and Plymouth, and has a station on the South Devon Railway.

TORQUEMADA, tor-que-ma'-da, a town of Spain, in Leon, 12 miles from Palencia. Manf. Brandy and wine-skins. Pop. 2,700. Here Torquemada, the first of the great Spanish inquisitors, was born, in 1420.

TORRALLA DE CALATRAVA, tor-al'-a de kal-a-tra'-va, a town of Spain, 13 miles from Ciudad-Real. Manf. Blonde and thread-lace. Pop. 3,200.

TORRE, tor, a town of Sardinia, Piedmont, 7 miles from Pinerolo. Manf. Cotton and woollen goods. Pop. 3,400. This is the principal seat of the Waldensian Protestants.

TORRE, the prefix to the name of many towns in Spain and Portugal, none of them with a population above 3,500.

TORRE DEL GRECO, tor del grai'-ko, a town of Italy, at the foot of Vesuvius, 7 miles from Naples. This place was destroyed by an eruption of Mount Vesuvius in 1794, and still presents, in its scattered houses, half-buried churches, and streets almost choked up with lava, a striking picture of the ravages of the volcano. It has a collegiate church, convents, and an hospital. Its vicinity is famous for wine and fruits. Pop. 13,000.

TORRE DELLA NUNCIATA, noon-che-a'-ta, a town of Italy, near the foot of Vesuvius, 12 miles from Naples. It is fortified, and has a barrack. Manf. Paper and woollen fabrics. Pop. 10,000, many of whom engage in the fisheries.

TORRE DE LAS SALINAS, las sa-le'-nas, a town of Spain, province of Valencia, 20 miles from Orihuela.

TORRE DON GIMENO, je-mai'-no, a town of Spain, on the Solado, 12 miles from Jena. Manf. Linen; and it has a trade in oil, wine, and salt. Pop. 6,000.

TORRE VELHA, vel'-a, a fort in Portugal, at the mouth of the Tagus, 3 miles from Lisbon.

TORRENO, Don José, Count de, tor-rai'-no, a Spanish statesman and writer, who, in 1808, was sent to England to request assistance against Napoleon I. After residing for a short time in England, he returned to Madrid, and took his seat in the Cortes, where he became a prominent advocate for the constitution of 1812. His political views gave umbrage to the despotic Ferdinand; and when the Cortes was dissolved, and many of its members thrown into prison, Torreno narrowly escaped sharing a similar fate. After reaching Portugal, he subsequently made his way to England once more. His estates were confiscated during his absence, and a formal sentence of death passed upon him. After the revolution of 1820 he was permitted to return to Madrid, and was offered the post of prime minister by the king, but refused the place. The second French invasion having restored Ferdinand as an absolute monarch, Torreno was sent into exile, and spent ten years in England, Germany, and France. Allowed to return to his native country, in consequence of the amnesty of 1832, he remained a private citizen till 1834, when he was appointed minister of finance by Queen Christina. In the following year he was driven to resign, and, in the course of the following eight years, he was twice sent into exile. His "History of the Insurrection, War, and Revolution of Spain," was composed in Paris and London, and is considered the best work upon the subject in the Spanish language. B. at Oviedo, 1786; D. at Paris, 1843.

TORRENS, LAKE, tor'-ens, a salt lake or marsh of South Australia, bending in a semicircular form round an arid and mountainous peninsula. It has been traced for 400 miles, and is found to abound with quicksands. Lat. between 28° and 32° S. Lon. between 136° 30′ and 140° 30′ E.

TORRENTE, tor-ent'-e, a town of Spain, 5 miles from Valencia. Pop. 5,000.

TORRENTIUS, John, tor-ren'-shi-us, a Dutch painter, who founded a sect of Adamites; for which he was sent to prison, and confined during some time. His pictures are well painted, but are very obscene. B. 1589; D. 1640.

TORRES, L. da Motta, tor'-es, a celebrated Portuguese navigator, who was engaged in the war against France, and, in 1797-8, commanded the floating batteries which were intrusted with the defence of the mouth of the Tagus. He afterwards became governor of Brazil; fought against the French in 1808, and was, during the interval 1816-20, captain-general of Angola, in Africa. Returning to Lisbon in 1821, he became an energetic opponent of the revolution of the Cortes. B. at Lisbon, 1769; D. 1822.

TORRES NOVAS, no'-vas, a walled town of Portugal, 15 miles from Santarem. It is defended by a castle. Pop. 4,300.

TORRES STRAIT, strate, is in the S. Pacific Ocean, between Cape York and the island of Papua and the N. extremity of Australia. It has a width of about 80 miles, and has several islands, the principal of which are Prince of Wales, Mulgrave, and Banks' Islands. It was discovered by Torres in 1606, and was sailed through by Cook in 1770.

TORRES VEDRAS, ve'-dras, a very old town of Portuguese Estremadura, 25 miles from Lisbon. Pop. 2,300. —It is celebrated for the lines of defence established by the duke of Wellington in 1810, to repel the approach of the French.

TORRICELLA, tor'-re-chel'-la, a town of Naples, in Abruzzo Citra, 20 miles from Chieti. Pop. 3,500.

TORRICELLI, Evangeliste, tor'-re-chel'-le, a celebrated Italian mathematician and philosopher, who, after receiving his education at the Jesuits' school at Faenza, repaired to Rome, where he greatly improved himself under Castelli. In Rome he wrote two small works upon mechanics, which being read by Galileo, that distinguished philosopher pressed him to join him at Florence. After some time, Torricelli repaired thither, and lived in the most intimate friendship with Galileo during the last days of the philosopher, whom he succeeded in the professorship of mathematics at the academy of Florence. He is celebrated as the discoverer of the barometer, and for his improvements in microscopes and telescopes. He made the discovery of the principle of the barometer while experimenting with columns of mercury contained in tubes, as to the pressure of the atmosphere. By these experiments he also proved that the opinion long maintained, that "Nature abhors a vacuum," was unfounded. B. 1608; D. at Florence, 1647.

TORRIGIANO, Pietro, tor-id-je-a'-no, a celebrated Italian sculptor, who, while pursuing his studies with Michael Angelo in the Garden of Antiquities at Florence, becoming jealous of his great rival, struck him so violent a blow upon the nose as to disfigure it for ever. For this disgraceful act he was compelled to leave Florence, and, after executing some commissions for Pope Alexander VI., he entered the army as a common soldier, and rose to the grade of ensign; but having modelled several small bronze figures for some Florentine merchants, they requested him to visit England with them. In England he was employed by Henry VIII., who gave him the commission to execute the tomb of Henry VII. in Westminster Abbey, for which he received £1,000. In 1519 he went to Spain, where he was employed in carving statues for convents. Of one of these, a Virgin and Child, he was requested to make a copy for the duke of Arcos, in reward of which task he received a heap of maravedis, which on discovering to be worth no more than thirty ducats, he was so enraged at the smallness of the sum, that he broke the figure into fragments. For this he was arrested by the Inquisition as a sacrilegious heretic, and was condemned. In order to avoid death at the hands of that sanguinary tribunal, he refused to take food, and so perished. B. about 1474; D. 1522.

TORRINGTON, tor'-ing-ton, the name of several parishes of England, none with a population above 1,200.

TORRINGTON, GREAT, a market-town of Devonshire, situate on an eminence, which forms the eastern bank of the river Torridge, over which is a stone bridge of four arches, 10 miles from Barnstaple. On the south side of the town are some slight vestiges of an ancient castle, the origin of which is unknown. It has two parish churches, almshouses, and a charity school. Manf. Gloves. Pop. 3,400.

TORSHOK, or TORJOK, tor-shok', a town of European Russia, in the government of Tver, on the Tverza, which divides it into two parts, 35 miles from Tver. It has a cathedral, numerous churches, two convents, a government school, and orphan asylum. Manf. Coloured Russian leather shoes and gloves. Pop. 16,000. This place has a holy spring, which is much visited by pilgrims.

TORSVAR, or TORZBURG, tors'-var, a town of Transylvania, with a castle, 20 miles from Kronstadt. Pop. 7,000.

TORTO-KAN, or TURTUKAI, tor'-to-kan', a town of European Turkey, on the Danube, 28 miles from Silistria. Pop. 3,500. Here the Turks defeated the Russians in May, 1854.

TORTOLA, tor-to'-la, one of the Virgin Islands, in the West Indies, belonging to Great Britain. Ext. 12 miles long, with a breadth of 4. Desc. Hilly, and unhealthy to Europeans. Pop. 8,600. Lat. 18° 24' N. Lon. 64° 32' W. This island came into the possession of the British in 1666.

TORTONA, tor-to'-na, a town of Italy, in the Sardinian states, on the Scrivia, 14 miles from Alessandria. Manf. Silk and other fabrics. Pop. 11,000.

TORTOSA, tor-to'-sa, a town of Spain, in Catalonia, on the Ebro, 42 miles from Tarragona. It is divided into the old and new towns, both surrounded with walls, entered by seven gates. It has a cathedral, bishop's palace, town-hall, hospital, public granary, and college. Manf. Paper, glass, and earthenware. Pop. 21,000.

TORTOSA, a seaport of Syria, formerly called Orthosia, supposed to be built about the 5th or 6th century, 30 miles from Tripoli. It was at one time a place of great strength, of which the vestiges of the ancient walls still bear testimony. Nothing now remains of it, except a church, which bears marks of great magnificence.

TORTSBURG. (See TORSVAR.)

TORTUGA, tor-too'-ga, two islands in the West Indies, one in the Caribbean Sea, and the other off the coast of Hayti. The former has a length of 15 miles and a breadth of 8; the latter, a length of 22 miles and a breadth of 5. Pop. Uncertain.

TOSCANA. (See TUSCANY.)

TOSCANELLA, Paul, tos'-ka-nel'-la, a celebrated Italian astronomer, who erected, in the cathedral of Florence, the famous solstitial gnomon, which was accounted the greatest of the kind in Europe. Toscanella is likewise said to have had some ideas of the passage to the East Indies by the Cape of Good Hope, and to have communicated them to Alphonso V. of Portugal, and afterwards to Columbus. B. at Florence, 1397; D. 1482.

TOTANA, to-ta'-na, a town of Spain, in Murcia, 12 miles from Lorca. Manf. Linen, wax candles, earthenware, brandy, and saltpetre. Pop. 8,600.

TOTILA, to'-te-la, king of the Ostrogoths, who conquered the kingdom of Italy from Justinian. In 545-47 he was defeated in several engagements by Belisarius; but after the departure of that general he regained possession of all the countries he had formerly taken. Slain in battle, 552.

TOTNESS, tot'-nes, a market-town of Devonshire, on the Dart, 22 miles from Exeter. It has a handsome church, having a well-proportioned tower at the west end, adorned with pinnacles; a town-hall, assembly-rooms, theatre, and schools. Pop. 4,500. It has a station on the South Devon Railway.

TOTT, Francis, Baron de, tot, a general and diplomatist in the service of France, who was the son of an Hungarian nobleman living in exile. After serving as an officer in a regiment of hussars, he accompanied his father to Constantinople, and subsequently received an appointment in the French embassy there, and, in 1767, was nominated consul in the Crimea. About 1770 he entered the Turkish service, reformed the artillery, defended the Dardanelles against the Russian fleet under Orloff, and fortified the mouth of the Bosphorus. Considering that his services were ill requited, he left Turkey, and, returning to France, was employed by the government to make a tour of inspection of the Mediterranean ports. In 1787 he was created governor of Douay, and held the post until 1790, when, having declared himself as opposed to the revolutionists, he was obliged to fly. He was the author of a work upon the Turks and Tartars. B. at Ferte-sous-Jarre, 1733; D. in Hungary, 1793.

TOTTENHAM, tot'-ten-am, a parish of Middlesex, 6 miles from St. Paul's Cathedral, London. It is intersected by the Eastern Counties Railway. Pop. 9,300.

TOTTINGTON, LOWER, tot'-ing-ton, a chapelry of Lancashire, 3 miles from Bury. Manf. Cotton goods. Pop. 11,000.

TOUL, tool, a town of France, in the department of the Meurthe, on the Moselle, 12 miles from Nancy. It has a Gothic cathedral, cavalry and infantry barracks, and an arsenal. Manf. Lace, calicoes, and hardwares. Pop. 8,600.

TOULON-SUR-MER, too'-lawng-soor-mair, a seaport in the S.E. of France, in the department of the Var, on a bay of the Mediterranean, 40 miles from Draguignan. It stands at the foot of a ridge of lofty, and in general arid mountains, which shelter it from the north; and is surrounded with ramparts, ditches, and bastions, defended by a fine citadel and a number of forts and batteries, distributed over the neighbouring eminences. The French consider it impregnable. The town is divided into two parts—the Old and the New. The former is ill-built; but the New is in a better style, containing the public structures erected by Louis XIV., several straight streets, and a square, or rather oblong, called the Champ de Cataille, and used for exercising the garrison. There is no river in the vicinity; but several streams descending from the neighbouring mountains, supply a number of fountains, constructed in different parts of the town. The principal public buildings are the town-hall, the hôtel de l'intendance, and the churches and hospitals. Toulon has long been one of the chief stations of the French navy, being on the Mediterranean what Brest is on the Atlantic. It has two ports, called commonly Old and New. The old port is a basin, not large, but commodious, surrounded with a handsome quay. The new port is one of the finest in Europe, and is said to be capable of containing 200 sail of the line. The roadstead is spacious, and communicates with the outer port by a narrow passage. The passage by which the two ports communicate with each other is also narrow. The arsenal, situate along the side of the new port, is a very large edifice, well filled with arms, naval stores, and every requisite for the equipment of vessels. Here are docks for shipbuilding; storehouses for timber; manufactures of canvas, cordage, ship-anchors &c. The dry dock, for the repairing of ships of war, is a very interesting object; and the Bagne, or convict prison, is occupied by 4,000 or 5,000 culprits. Manf. Soap, glass, hats, and caps. The tunny fishery is extensive, and there is some trade in wine, oil, silk, and fruit. Pop. 70,000. Lat. 43° 7′ 5″ N. Lon. 5° 56′ E. Toulon was originally a Roman colony, and was occupied by the British in 1793. It was afterwards taken by the republicans, and during its siege Napoleon I. commenced his military career before it.

TOULONGEON, Francis Emmanuel, Viscount de, too-lawng'-e-awng, a French historian, who entered the army, and rose to the command of a regiment; but relinquished a military career some time previously to the outbreak of the Revolution. Although a noble, he embraced the popular cause, and was one of the deputies to the States-general. He was subsequently a member of the legislative body, and was created a commander of the Legion of Honour. His principal works were—a translation of Cæsar's Commentaries, with notes; "History of France from the Revolution of 1789;" "Reflections upon Revolution;" and a treatise upon the paintings of the ancient masters. He wrote, also, verses; but they possess little merit. B. in La Franche-Comté, 1748; D. at Paris, 1812.

TOULOUSE, too'-looze', a city of France, in the department of the Upper Garonne, on the right bank of the Garonne, 130 miles from Bordeaux. It is surrounded by old ramparts, flanked with towers. Of the streets, a few are tolerably broad; others are winding and irregular. The squares are very small, so that the chief embellishments of the place consist in the public promenades, the river, the quays, and a fine bridge over the Garonne. It has a number of public edifices, a cathedral, churches, among which that of the Cordeliers is noted for its cavern, that of St. Saturnin for its relics. The town-hall is large, and its façade forms the side of the square called Place Royale. In one of its halls are the busts of all the eminent natives of Toulouse since the days of the Romans. The other buildings are, the residence of the archbishop, the hospital, the mint, the exchange, the theatre, and the Capitol, said to have been founded in the time of Galba. In antiquities Toulouse presents only the remains of an amphitheatre and some traces of an aqueduct. It contains a museum, a public library, a botanical garden, and an observatory. Manf. Silks, woollens, leather, linen, pottery, brandy; and there are copper-works and a cannon-foundry. Pop. 95,000. Lat. 43° 36′ 47″ N. Lon. 1° 27′ 57″ E.—It is noted for an obstinate battle fought 10th April, 1814, between the British under Lord Wellington and the French under Soult.

TOUMEN. (See TIUMEN.)

TOUP, Jonathan, toop, a learned English divine and critic, who, after entering into orders, obtained a prebend in Exeter Cathedral, and the vicarage of St. Merryn, in Cornwall. He published — "Emendations of Suidas," an excellent edition of Longinus, and a volume of learned annotations upon the Greek writers. B. at St. Ives, Cornwall, 1713; D. at Exeter, 1785.

TOUR, toor, the name of several parishes and market-towns in France, none of them with a population above 2,600.

TOURAINE, too-rain', an old province of France, watered by the Cher, the Loire, and the Vienne, and now forming part of the department Indre-et-Loire.

TOURGOING, toor-go'-ĭ, a parish and town of France, in the department of the North, 8 miles from Lille. It has a town-hall and a college. Manf. Cotton and worsted thread, camlets, plushes, and muslins. Pop. 28,000. —It has a station on the railway to Lille.

TOURLAVILLE, toor'-la-veel, a parish of France, in the department Manche. Manf. Glass, and it has stone-quarries. Pop. 5,000.

TOURNAY, toor'-nai, a fortified town of Belgium, in the province of Hainault, 28 miles from Mons. It is traversed by the Scheldt, on one side of which is a broad and handsome quay, almost the only embellishment of the town, which, in general, is ill-built and gloomy. The public buildings are, a cathedral with five towers, the abbey of St. Martin, and an hospital; an academy of the fine arts, an episcopal seminary, exchange, a public library, and museum of natural history. Manf. Carpets, stockings, caps, with woollen and cotton stuffs generally. Pop. 32,000.—This place was formerly strongly fortified, and had one of the finest citadels in Europe, which was levelled by the French in the middle of the 18th century.

TOURNEFORT, Joseph Pitton de, toor'-ne-for, a celebrated French botanist, who, from his earliest years, evinced a strong predilection for the observation of nature. In 1677 he explored the mountains of Dauphiny and Savoy, and the year following went to Montpellier, where he studied physic; after which he travelled over the Pyrenees and into Catalonia, undergoing great difficulties and danger in searching for plants. In 1688 he travelled in England, Spain, Holland, and Portugal, cultivating his favourite science and winning the esteem of the learned men in each of those countries. He had previously been nominated assistant professor of botany in the Jardin du Roi, at Paris. In 1692 he was admitted a member of the Academy of Sciences, and in 1700 he was sent to the East to collect plants. After two years' absence, he returned to his duties at the Jardin du Roi, and devoted the rest of his life to arranging his collections and writing an account of his travels and observations. His principal works are—"Elements of Botany;" "Travels in the Levant:" "History of the Plants round Paris;" "Treatise on the Materia Medica." B. at Aix, Provence, 1656; D. at Paris, 1708.

TOURNEMINE, toor'-ne-meen, René Joseph, a learned French writer, who entered the society of the Jesuits, and was, during twenty years, engaged in teaching in the various colleges of his order. He subsequently became librarian and historiographer of the society. His principal works were—Scriptural Commentaries; a new edition of Prideaux's "History of the Jews;" "Reflections upon Atheism;" an introduction to Fénélon upon the "Existence of God;" and a letter to Voltaire, upon the "Immortality of the Soul." B. at Rennes, 1661; D. at Paris, 1739.

TOURNEUR, Pierre le. (See LETOURNEUR.)

TOURNON, toor'-nawng, a town of France, in the department of the Ardèche, near the Rhone, 60 miles from Lyons. Manf. Woollen and silk fabrics; and there is a brisk trade in Hermitage wines. Pop. 5,000.

TOURNUS, toor'-noos, a town of France, in the department of the Saone-and-Loire, on the Saone, 17 miles from Mâcon. Manf. Hats, silks, and beet-root sugar. Pop. 5,400. It has a station on the railway from Paris to Lyons.

TOURRETTE, Mark Antony Louis Claret de la, toor-ret', an eminent French botanist, who became member and secretary of the Academy of Sciences at Lyons. His principal works were, an elementary treatise upon botany, and some memoirs upon the same science in various journals and Transactions of learned French societies. B. at Lyons, 1729; D. at the same city, 1793.

TOURS, toors, a city of France, the capital of the department of the Indre-and-Loire, on the Loire and the Cher, 65 miles from Orleans. The city is of an oblong form, and lies parallel to the course of the Loire. In one part the houses are low in structure; another part is very different, having been rebuilt in a beautiful manner. This part includes the Rue Neuve, or Rue Royale, a street of great elegance: the houses in it are built of stone, and on a uniform plan, which, in a continental town, is rare. The smaller streets, to the right and left of the Rue Neuve, are narrow and gloomy. Its metropolitan church is remarkable for its lofty spires, its ingenious clock, and its library: it was built by Henry V. of England. It has, besides, an episcopal palace, hôtel-de-ville, exchange, prefecture, and numerous schools and learned societies. Manf. Silk stuffs, woollens, hosiery, and leather. Pop. 34,000. Tours was the scene of the repulse of the Saracens by Charles Martel, in 732; and, in subsequent ages, its castle, built on a rock, served more than once as a place of refuge for the royal family in times of commotion. It is the termini of railways from Paris, Bordeaux, and Nantes.

TOURVES, toorv', a market-town of France, in the department Var, 20 miles from Toulon. Pop. 2,700.

TOURVILLE, Anne-Hilarion de Contentin, Count de, toor'-veel, a celebrated French naval commander, who became captain in 1667, and distinguished himself under D'Estrées and Duquesne at the battles of Southbay and Augusta. In 1682-88 he participated in the expeditions to Tripoli and Algiers, and became vice-admiral in the Levant in 1689. In the following year he held a command, under D'Estrées, in the flotilla dispatched to Ireland to aid the cause of James II. In 1692 he was totally defeated by the English fleet at La Hague; but he subsequently inflicted considerable damage upon British shipping in Portugal. B. in Normandy, 1642; D. 1701.

TOUSSAINT L'OUVERTURE. (See L'OUVERTURE, Toussaint.)

TOWCESTER, tow'-ter, a handsome market-town of Northamptonshire, situate on two streams, over which are three bridges, 8 miles from Northampton. It consists chiefly of one long and very broad street. Manf. Lace and silk. Pop. 2,700.

TOWER HAMLETS, tow'-er hăm-lets, a borough in Middlesex, in the E. part of London, and consisting of the parishes of Shoreditch, Spitalfields, Bethnal-green, Limehouse, Poplar, Hackney, &c. It contains the London and St. Katherine docks, the Mint, Trinity-house, London Hospital, and numerous charitable institutions. Pop. 740,000. The termini of the Eastern and North-Eastern Counties Railways are here.

TOWERS, Joseph, an eminent English dissenting divine and writer, who was brought up to the printing business, after which he settled in London as a bookseller; but having experienced losses in trade, he became pastor to a congregation of dissenters. In 1779 he received his degree of LL.D. from Edinburgh. His principal productions were,—"British Biography;" "Observations on Hume's History of England;" "The Life and Reign of Frederick III. of Prussia;" "A Vindication of Locke;" several sermons, and political tracts. He was also a coadjutor with Dr. Kippis in compiling the new edition of the "Biographia Britannica." D. in London, 1737; D. in the same city, 1799.

TOWNLEY, Rev. James, town'-le, an English divine, who, in 1759, became head master of Merchant Taylors' School. He published some sermons; but is best known as having assisted Hogarth in writing "The Analysis of Beauty," and as the author of the farce entitled "High Life below Stairs." He was the friend of Garrick, who presented him to a living at Hendon. Another farce by him, called "The False Concord," was used as the source for both dialogue and character of "The Clandestine Marriage," by Colman and Garrick. B. in London, 1715; D. 1778.

TOWNLEY, Charles, an eminent English antiquary and collector. Enjoying an ample fortune, he devoted himself to the forming of a museum of antique statues, marbles, coins, and manuscripts. His house in Park Street, Westminster, was almost entirely filled with fragments of Egyptian architecture, intermixed with some of the most beautiful specimens of Greek and Roman art. His collection of ancient medals was extremely valuable, and among his manuscripts was one of Homer. His Etruscan Antiquities were described in a work by D'Hancarville. He was a fellow of the Royal and Antiquarian societies, and a trustee of the British Museum, in which institution his collection was placed. B. 1737; D. in London, 1805.

TOWNSHEND, Charles, Viscount, towns'-hend, an English statesman, who, in the reign of Queen Anne, was appointed, with the duke of Marlborough, to negotiate the peace of Gertruydenberg, and, soon afterwards, ambassador to the States-general of the United Provinces. Upon the accession of George I., in 1714, he became prime minister; but, in the course of the subsequent years, his influence with the king rapidly declined, principally through his having resisted the avaricious designs of the monarch's German favourites and mistresses. He was removed from the premiership; but, after some time, consented to accept the lord-lieutenancy of Ireland, a post he retained for but a short period. He held various offices during the seven subsequent years; but was being continually involved in disputes with the German coterie, and, indeed, with his brother ministers. When George II. became king, in 1727, Townshend's power was eclipsed by Sir Robert Walpole, who had acquired great influence with the new monarch. Before his triumphant rival, he retired from office, and, repairing to his estate at Rainham, in Norfolk, spent the remaining years of his life in agricultural pursuits. "He left office," says Lord Mahon, "with a most unblemished character, and, what is still less common, a most patriotic moderation." B. 1676; D. 1738.

TOWNSHEND, Charles, an English statesman, who was the grandson of the preceding. He commenced public life in 1747, as a member of the House of Commons, and, after distinguishing himself as a debater, was, in 1754, appointed a lord of the Admiralty. He subsequently acted in succession as secretary-at-war, first lord of trade and of plantations, paymaster of the forces, and, under the administration of Chatham, chancellor of the Exchequer, in which office he, during the illness of his great chief, who was opposed to American taxation, imposed duties upon glass, tea, and other articles, which caused the colonists to rise in rebellion, and led ultimately to the separation of America from the mother country. He was on the point of attaining to the premiership of a new ministry, when he was carried off by a fever. Burke, in his celebrated speech upon American taxation, spoke of Townshend as "the delight and ornament of this house, and the charm of every private society which he honoured with his presence. Perhaps there never arose in this country, nor in any country, a man of a more pointed and finished wit, and, when his passions were not concerned, of a more refined, exquisite, and penetrating judgment." B. 1725; D. 1767.

TOWNSON, Thomas, town'-son, a learned English divine, who obtained a fellowship at Magdalen College, and subsequently became archdeacon of Richmond, in Yorkshire. His most important works were—"Discourses on the Four Gospels," and a "Discourse on the Evangelical History." B. in Essex, 1715; D. 1792.

TOWTON, tow'-ton, a village of England, in Yorkshire, 3 miles from Tadcaster. Pop. 130.—Here, in 1461, a great battle was fought between the houses of York and Lancaster.

TOYNTON, toin'-ton, the name of several parishes in Lincolnshire, none of them with a population above 550.

TOZZETTI, John Targioni, tot-set'-te, an Italian botanist, who became keeper of the botanical garden at Florence. He wrote several works in Latin and some in Italian. His first was a thesis upon the "Utility of Plants in the Practice of Physic;" the others were chiefly connected with his profession. B. at Florence, 1712; D. at the same city, 1783.

TRADESCANT, John, trād'-es-kant, an eminent naturalist, who is supposed to have been a Dutchman. He settled in England about the beginning of the reign of James I. Both himself and his son were great travellers, and the father is said to have gone through Europe, Turkey, Greece, Egypt, and Barbary. His son, also named John, collected a cabinet of curiosities, of which an account was printed, called "Museum Tradescantium." In 1629 he was appointed gardener to Charles I., and had a very large garden at Lambeth, well stocked with rare plants. D. 1638. His son died 1662.

TRAFALGAR, tra-făl'-gar or tra-fal-gar', a cape of Spain, on the coast of Andalusia, at the entrance of the Straits of Gibraltar, noted for a great naval victory, gained 21st October, 1805, by Lord Nelson, who fell in the action, over the combined fleets of France and Spain. Lat. 36° 10′ N. Lon. 6° 1′ W.

TRAGETTO, tra-jet'-to, a town of Naples, 8 miles from Gaeta. It has several churches and a convent. Pop. 6,000.

TRAINA, trī'-na, a town of the island of Sicily, in the Val di Demona, on the Traina, 30 miles from Catania. It has the oldest monastery on the island. Pop. 7,500.

TRAJAN, M. Ulpinus Crinitus, trā'-jăn, a Roman emperor. In early life he served under Vespasian and Titus against the Jews; and in 97 was adopted by Nerva, and named as his successor in the empire. He became sovereign of the Roman empire in the following year. His reign was popular, and he gained splendid victories over the Dacians, Persians, and other powers; but he disgraced his great qualities by a rigorous persecution of the Christians. By his directions, Apollodorus, the architect, erected the famous pillar at Rome still called by his name. B. near Seville, Spain, about 52; D. at Selinus, in Cilicia, 117.

TRAJANOPOLI, trā'-ja-no'-po-le, a town of European Turkey, in Romania, on the Maritza, 35 miles from Adrianople. It is the see of a Greek archbishop. Pop. Unascertained.

TRALEE, tra-le', a town of Ireland, in the county of Kerry, near a small river which discharges itself into the Bay of Tralee, 60 miles from Cork. It has a church, Roman Catholic chapels, a nunnery, court-house, a fever-hospital, lunatic asylum, union workhouse, club-house, barracks, custom-house and market-house. It is the seat of the county assizes and the head of a poor-law union. Pop. 13,000.—This town was destroyed in the rebellion of 1641.

TRALLIANUS, Alexander, trăl'-li-ai'-nus, a medical writer. He was a native of Tralles, in Lydia, and is said to have been the first who practised phlebotomy and used cantharides as a blister for the gout. His works have been printed at Basil, Paris, and London. Flourished about 550.

TRAMORE, tra-mor', a neat, regular, well-built town of Ireland, in the county of Waterford, on a broad, open, and dangerous bay in St. George's Channel, 6 miles from Waterford. It is much resorted to as a bathing quarter, and has a neat assembly-room for the amusement of its numerous fashionable visitors. Pop. 2,000.

TRAMUTOLA, tra-moo-to'-la, a town of Italy, in Naples, 28 miles from Policastro. Pop. 4,000.

TRANENT, tra-nent', a parish and town of Scotland, in Haddingtonshire, 10 miles from Edinburgh. It is a straggling town, built on no regular plan, near the Firth of Forth. Pop. 2,100.

TRANI, trā'-ne, a town of Italy, in Naples, on the Adriatic, 25 miles from Bari. The principal public edifice is the cathedral, a building adorned with marble pillars, a magnificent tower, and a variety of paintings. The principal square is handsome, and the castle has a claim to the notice of the traveller. It is an archbishop's see, and the seat of a superior civil court. Pop. 14,000.

TRANMERE, trăn'-meer, a township of Cheshire, 7 miles from Great Neston. Pop. 7,000.

TRANQUEBAR, tran-que-bar', a fortified seaport-town of India, in the Carnatic, at one of the mouths of the Cauvery, 140 miles from Madras. It was originally a settlement of the Danes, who built a fort, the protection of which, and their own correct conduct, soon attracted population and commerce. The fort is kept in very neat order. It has a governor's residence and a lighthouse. Pop. 24,000.—In 1846 this town, with 25 square miles of territory, came into the possession of Great Britain by purchase.

TRANSCAUCASIA, trans'-kaw-kai'-se-a, a country of Asiatic Russia, S. of the Caucasus, bounded on the E. and W. by the Caspian and Black seas, and on the S. by Turkish and Persian Armenia. Area. Estimated at 67,000 square miles. It consists of two divisions, and the government is entirely military. The whole of the population is generally at enmity with the Russians, and the country groans under a most oppressive system of administration. Pop. 1,625,000. Lat. between 38° and 43° N. Lon. between 41° 40′ and 49° 40′ E.

TRANSPADANE REPUBLIC, trăns'-pa-dain, a state of Italy, constituted by Napoleon I., in 1796. It originally formed part of Lombardy and Venetia; but, in 1797, was incorporated with the Cisalpine Republic.

TRANSYLVANIA, tran-sil-vai'-ni-a, a large province of the Austrian empire, bounded N. and W. by Hungary, and E. and S. by European Turkey. Area, 21,160 square miles. Desc. The Carpathian Mountains surround it on the east, the south, and partly on the north; and as lateral chains, branching off from this, range across the country in every direction, the greatest part of it consists of alternate mountains and valleys, with few extensive plains. Rivers. The principal are the Maros, the Samos, and the Aluta: the Aranyos, the Lapos, the Sajo, and the two Kokels, are of inferior size. The banks of these rivers are densely wooded; and from this circumstance the province derives its name, which signifies a forest region. Pro. Wheat, oats, barley, buckwheat, rye, pulse, potatoes, fruits, tobacco, flax, hemp, saffron, and wine. The rearing of horses and live stock occupies a large share of attention, and buffaloes are employed for field labour. In the woods great numbers of swine are fed, and game is abundant. Minerals. In the mountains are found marble, jasper, porphyry, slate, limestone, coal, sulphur, and petroleum. Rock-salt is found in many spots. There are, besides, mines of iron, copper, lead, silver, and even gold. In the mountains are also dug up precious stones; such as topazes, chrysolites, garnets, opals, &c. Mineral springs are abundant. Manf. Woollen and cotton stuffs. The exports are timber, salt, metals, and a few manufactures. The imports are wool, cotton, skins, and a variety of manufactured articles from Vienna. The trade is mostly in the hands of Greeks and Armenians. The roads are almost impassable. Rel. The followers of the Greek church, comprising the Wallachians, Greeks, and Bulgarians, are by far the most numerous; next come the Catholics, among whom are ranked the Hungarians and most of the Szeklers. Education has, as yet, made little progress in the country. There has been established, at Klausenburg, an academy, on a plan somewhat similar to the German universities. Pop. 2,100,000. Lat. between 45° 30′ and 47° 40′ N. Lon. between 22° 15′ and 26° E. In 1699 this country was annexed to the Austrian empire by Joseph II.

TRAPANI, tra-pa'-ne, the ancient Drepanum, a fortified town of Sicily, in the Val di Mazzara, situate on a tongue of land projecting into the sea, 45 miles from Palermo. It is of importance, both as a naval, military, and commercial position, and is, in general, better built than most towns of the island. Its streets are regular; its numerous churches, convents, and other public buildings, are in a style of considerable elegance. The harbour is good. It is one of the most commercial towns in Sicily, and exports salt, soda, coral, and alabaster. Pop. 24,000.

TRAPP, Joseph, trap, an eminent divine, became rector of Harlington, in Middlesex, and lecturer of Christchurch, and St. Lawrence Jewry, London. He produced—"Prælectiones Poeticæ;" a Latin translation of the "Paradise Lost;" four volumes of Sermons; a treatise on being Righteous Overmuch; a translation of Virgil into blank verse, &c. B. at Cherrington, Gloucestershire, 1679; D. 1747.

TRAS-OS-MONTES, tras-os-mont'-tais, a province of Portugal, having Spain on its N. and E., on its W. the province of Minho, and on its S. Beira. Area, 4,028 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, but fertile in the valleys. Cattle-rearing is an important branch of industry. Manf. Silk and woollen fabrics, and thread. Pop. 312,000.

TRAU, trou, a town of Austrian Dalmatia, with a harbour, on the coast of the Adriatic, 10 miles from Spalato. It stands on an islet, having on the one side the mainland, with which it is connected by a bridge, and on the other, the island of Bua. It is celebrated for its marble. Pop. 4,000.

TRAUN, troun, a river of Upper Austria, rising in Styria, and, after a course of 100 miles, joining the Danube, 4 miles from Ling.

TRAVANCORE, trav-an-kor', a state situate at the south-west extremity of India, tributary to the British, and bounded on its S. and W. sides by the Indian Ocean, and on its other sides by other states. Area, 4,722 square miles. Desc. Mountainous in the E., but elsewhere diversified by hill and dale, and well watered. Only two-thirds of it, however, are capable of cultivation. Pro. Grain, sago, sugar, salt, pepper, cardamums, cocoa-nuts, cassia, frankincense, and other aromatic drugs. Its forests are also a valuable source of revenue. Pop. 1,012,000. Lat. between 8° 4′ and 10° 21′ N. Lon. between 76° 14′ and 77° 38′ E.

TRAVANCORE, the ancient capital of the above state, but much decayed. Lat. 8° 25′ N. Lon. 77° 22′ E.

TRAVE, trav, a river of Germany, entering the Gulf of Lubeck, after a course of 50 miles through Holstein and the territory of Lubeck.

TRAVEMUNDE, tra'-ve(r)-moon'-de(r), a fortified town of Germany, at the mouth of the Trave, belonging to the city of Lubeck, to which it serves as a port, 8 miles from Lubeck. Pop. 1,500.

TRAVERSARI, tra-vair-sa'-re, Ambrogio, a learned Italian monk. He acted as interpreter between the Italians and Greeks, when the emperor Palæologus and the patriarch of Constantinople visited Italy. His translation of Diogenes Laertius, inscribed to Cosmo de' Medici, has been several times printed. B. near Forli, 1386; D. at Florence, 1439.

TRAVNIK, trav'-neek, a town of European Turkey, in Bosnia, 74 miles from Spalatro. Manf. Sword-blades. Pop. 8,500.

TREBIA, trai'-be-a, a river of Italy, rising on the N. side of the Apennines, 10 miles from Genoa, and, after a course of 55 miles, joining the Po, 3 miles from Piacenza. The plain near Piacenza is noted as the scene of Hannibal's second victory over the Romans, and also as the scene of Suwarrow's victory over the French in 1799.

TREBIGNE, or TREBINGE, tre-bing'-e(r), a fortified town of European Turkey, 52 miles from Mossar. It is the see of a Roman Catholic bishop. Pop. 10,000.

TREBIZONDE, treb'-i-zond', a fortified city of Asia Minor, on the coast of the Black Sea, 120 miles from Erzeroum. It is very ancient, and was known under the appellation of Trapezus. The houses are mean in their outward appearance and comfortless within. There are numerous large mosques, khans, baths, and small Greek churches. The Besestein is a huge square structure, with two small windows on each face, probably erected by the Genoese as a powder-magazine. The principal exports are silk and cotton stuffs, fruit, and wine. The imports are sugar, coffee, and woollen cloths, from Constantinople; corn, salt, and iron, from the Crimea and Mingrelia. Pop. between 20,000 and 30,000. Lat. 41° 1′ N. Lon. 39° 46′ E. At this city, Xenophon, in his memorable retreat with the 10,000 Greeks, reached the sea.—The PASHALIC of Trebizonde is a mountainous subdivision of Turkish Armenia. It extends along the coast of the Black Sea. Lat. between 40° 30′ and 41° 30′ N. Lon. between 38° and 42° E.

TREDEGAR, tred'-e-gar, a market-town of Monmouthshire, 16 miles from Newport, famous for its iron-works and coal-mines. Pop. 9,000.—Its district is intersected by numerous branches of the Sirhowy Railway.

TREDGOLD, Thomas, tred'-gold, an industrious English writer upon mechanics. He was born in humble circumstances, was brought up to the trade of a cabinet-maker, and worked at it until about his 25th year, when he repaired to London, and was taken into the office of his uncle, an architect. After diligently pursuing his studies in architecture and engineering, he commenced writing articles for the scientific publications, and for the "Encyclopædia Britannica." He produced his important work, "The Elementary Principles of Carpentry," in 1820. The account of the invention and progressive improvement of the Steam-engine was published in 1827. A practical treatise on Railroads and Carriages, and other valuable works, likewise emanated from him. B. near Durham, 1788; D. 1829.

TREDIAKOVSKY, Vassili Kirilowitch, tred'-i-a-kov'-ske, an eminent Russian poet, who visited France and England, and, upon his return to St. Petersburg, was created secretary of the Academy of Sciences and professor of eloquence. He composed tragedies, fables, and epics, and produced a paraphrase of Fénélon's "Telemachus;" but the work was so dull, that Catherine II. was in the habit of causing those who transgressed the rules laid down for the regulation of her private retreat, the Hermitage, to get a hundred lines of the poem by heart, as a penalty. He was an example of the greatest literary industry. Once, having made a translation of Rollin's "Ancient History," in twenty-six volumes, the MS. was destroyed by fire; upon which Trediakovsky set to work, and again went through the whole task. B. 1703; D. 1769.

TREIGNAC, train'-yak, a town of France, in the department of the Corrèze, 18 miles from Tulle. Manf. Firearms. Pop. 3,500.

TREJA, trai'-ya, a town of Central Italy, 8 miles from Macerata. Pop. 8,000.

TRELTOW, trel'-tou, two towns of Prussian Pomerania, neither with a population above 5,400.

TRENCH, Rev. Richard Chenevix, trench, a modern English philologer, who, after completing his studies at the university of Cambridge, entered into orders, and was created a country curate. His earliest efforts in literature were as a poet, who imitated the chaste style of Wordsworth. After obtaining some preferment in the church, he became, in 1846, a select preacher at the university of Cambridge, and, in the following year, theological professor and examiner at King's College, London. After the death of Dr. Buckland, he was created dean of Westminster. His most important works were,—"Notes on the Miracles," "Lessons in Proverbs," "Synonyms of the New Testament," and "The Study of Words." B. 1807.

TRENCHARD, Sir John, trench'-ard, an English statesman, who, after completing his education at Oxford, studied the law, and was called to the bar. He was elected a member of the third parliament of Charles II., in 1679, and distinguished himself as an energetic opponent to the measures of the court party. In 1683 he was arrested on the charge of complicity in the plot for which Sydney and Lord Russell were executed; but ultimately obtained his discharge, for want of witnesses against him. He was party to the invasion of the duke of Monmouth, and, in consequence, was obliged to seek safety by a flight to France, where he remained until after the revolution of 1688. After the accession of William III., he was knighted, created chief justice of Chester, and finally became secretary of state. Wood describes him as "a man of turbulent and aspiring spirit." B. 1650; D. 1695.

TRENCHARD, John, an English political writer, who was educated for the law, which he never followed, but became member of parliament for Taunton. He wrote, in conjunction with Gordon, "Cato's Letters," "The Independent Whig," "A Natural History of Superstition," "Reflections on the Old Whig," and other works. B. 1662; D. 1723.

TRENCK, Baron Franz von, trenk, was the son of a general in the service of Austria, by whose side he fought at the battle of Melazio, when only in his eleventh year. Of great physical strength and violence of temper, he murdered a farmer, for which he was sent to Russia, where he displayed great courage in war, but also the most brutal ferocity. He afterwards entered the service of Maria Theresa of Austria, and was engaged against the troops of Frederick the Great. His insubordinate conduct, however, caused his being brought to trial by court-martial. Sentenced to be imprisoned, he was confined at Vienna during a year; at the end of which time he contrived to effect his escape in a most extraordinary manner; but was retaken in the Netherlands, and soon afterwards put an end to his life by taking poison. The Memoirs of Baron Trenck were produced at Paris in 1717. B. at Reggio, Calabria, 1711; D. 1747.

TRENCK, Francis, Baron von, a Prussian officer, and cousin of the preceding, against whom he served. Having given offence to the government of his country, he was sent to prison, where he endured great hardships for a long time. He at last effected his escape, and was in France at the time of the Revolution, where he was arrested and condemned to the scaffold by the revolutionary tribunal, in 1794. He wrote his own memoirs.

TRENT, trent, a river of England, in Staffordshire, rising from three springs to the west of Leek, and flowing past Trentham, to which it gives name, and thence to Burton, in Derbyshire, where it first becomes navigable. It winds round the town of Nottingham, giving fertility to an immense range of meadows, bounded by villas, villages, and comfortable farms. After a course of about 180 miles, it joins the Ouse, to form the estuary of the Humber. It is connected by canals with all the rivers of central England.

TRENT, or TRIENT, a city of Austria, in the Tyrol, on the Adige, not far from the borders of Italy, 12 miles from Roveredo. It stands in a small but delightful valley among the Alps, and is inclosed by high walls. Its public buildings are, the palace of the archbishop, and the cathedral, a Gothic structure, not remarkable for its size or beauty. Manf. Silks, leather, glass, and tobacco. Pop. 13,000. The great feature in the history of Trent is the assemblage of Catholic prelates, which took place in it from all parts of Europe, in 1545.

TRENTON, tren'-ton, a city of the United States, and the capital of the state of New Jersey, on the Delaware, 27 miles from Philadelphia. It contains a state-house, a gaol, banks, an academy, public library, and various schools. Manf. Cotton goods, leather, paper, rope, and earthenware. Pop. 7,000. It has communication by railroad with Philadelphia.—The battle of Trenton was gained by Washington and his troops over the united forces of the British and Hessians, in December, 1776.

TRESCAW, or TRESCO, tres'-ko, one of the Scilly Islands, situate to the west of Annet Island. It is extremely fertile, and has an area of about 800 acres. Pop. 420.

TREUEN, tri'-en, a town of Saxony, 9 miles from Plauen. Manf. Weaving and cotton-spinning. Pop. 5,000.

TREURNBRIETZEN, tri'-en-breet'-sen, a town of Prussia, 22 miles from Potsdam. Manf. Linen, woollen, and cotton fabrics. Pop. 5,000.

TREVES, or TRIERS, traiv, the most ancient, and one of the most celebrated cities in Germany, in the centre of a large valley lying along the Moselle, 60 miles from Coblentz. The streets are tolerably wide. The chief buildings are the elector's palace, now turned into barracks, and the church of Notre Dame, built about the year 1240, and affording a fine specimen of Gothic architecture. The cathedral is remarkable only for its altars, its marble gallery, and the uncommon size of the stones with which it is built. The environs of the town abound with gardens, and present prospects not unworthy of a comparison with Switzerland. Its baths are of Roman construction, and, beyond its walls, are the ruins of an amphitheatre. Its other buildings are a gymnasium, museum, seminary, a library, hospitals, and a theatre. Manf. Woollens, cotton, and leather. One branch of industry is the building of boats for the navigation of the Moselle. There is also some export of Moselle wine. Pop. 20,000. This was anciently a Roman town, and few towns are richer in Roman antiquities: coins, medals, and inscriptions, are frequently dug up. The piers of the bridge on the Moselle are the work of either the Romans or Gauls.

TREVETHIN, tre'-ve-thin, a parish of Monmouthshire, 7 miles from Usk. It has extensive coal and iron mines. Pop. 17,000.

TREVIGLIO, trai-veel'-yo, a town of Austria, Lombardy, 20 miles from Milan. It has a trade in raw silk, collected in the surrounding districts. Pop. 6,500.

TREVISI, Jerome, trai-ve'-se, an Italian painter of history and portraits, who became painter to Henry VIII. of England, who appointed him engineer at the siege of Boulogne, where he was killed in 1544.

TREVISO, tre-ve'-so, a town of Austrian Italy, on the Sile, 16 miles from Venice. It is surrounded by a rampart, and is tolerably well built. The streets, though irregularly laid out, are wide and well paved, and most of the houses have colonnades or piazzas in front. It has a large public square, a great number of churches, monasteries, and convents, four hospitals, a castle, and a theatre. It was formerly the seat of a university, afterwards transferred to Padua. Manf. Silk and cotton stuffs; also cutlery. Pop. 18,000. This place, under Napoleon I., was the capital of the department Tagliamento.

TREVISO, Edward Adolph Mortier, duke of, marshal of France. He entered the army of the French republic as a volunteer in 1791, and served with distinction in the subsequent battles. He took Hanover in 1803, and was created marshal of the empire in the following year. In 1806 he entered Hamburg, and subsequently passed into the army of Spain, where he maintained his reputation as a brave and skilful general. In the expedition to Russia, he exerted himself to save the remnants of the grand army; and in 1814 was the coadjutor of Marmont in the command of Paris. At the first restoration he became an adherent of the Bourbons, and was created a peer of France; but after the return of Napoleon from Elba he rejoined his standard. In 1815 he refused to sit in judgment upon Marshal Ney, and was, in consequence, degraded from his rank as a peer. He was a member of the Chamber of Deputies during the interval 1816-19, and was restored to his titles at the latter date. In 1834 he was appointed minister of war, and held office until his death, in the following year. He was killed by the king's side by the explosion of Fieschi's infernal machine in 1835. B. at Cateau, 1768.

TREVOR, Sir John, trev'-or, an English statesman, who was knighted and created secretary of state by Charles II., a post he retained until his death. He would appear to have been an honest man; it is certain that he was opposed to the French policy of the king. B. 1626; D. 1672.

TRÉVOUX, trai-voo', a town of France, department of the Ain, on the Saone, 14 miles from Lyons. It has a mint and an hospital, and a palace formerly belonging to the parliament established by Francis I. Manf. Woollen goods. Pop. 3,000.

TRICALA, or TRIKHALA, tre'-ka-la, anciently Tricca, a town of European Turkey, in Thessaly, 38 miles from Larissa. It has several Greek churches and Jews' synagogues. Manf. Coarse woollen and cotton stuffs. Pop. About 12,000, principally Turks.—TRICALA is also the name of a province of Thessaly, and the TRICALA river is a small affluent of the Salympria.

TRICHINOPOLY, trich'-i-nop'-o-le, a city and fortress of the south of India, capital of a district, on the Cauvery, opposite the island of Seringam, famous for its magnificent Hindoo temples. It is situate on a rock about 350 feet high, and was esteemed impregnable by the natives. It has a palace, a mosque, and temples, a powder-magazine, and an arsenal containing many thousand stands of arms. Manf. Cotton cloths, house furniture, and jewellery. Pop. about 40,000, garrison inclusive. Lat. 10° 50′ N. Lon. 78° 50′ E. From the year 1751 to 1755, Trichinopoly was several times besieged by the French and their allies, but was saved by the assistance of the British under Lawrence and other gallant officers.

TRICOUPI, Spiridion, tre-koo'-pe, a modern Greek historian and statesman, who was three times ambassador from Greece to England. He produced, in 1824, a celebrated oration upon the death of Lord Byron. His greatest literary effort was, "The History of the Greek Insurrection," the publication of which was commenced in London in 1853. B. 1791.

TRIEL, treel, a town of France, 20 miles from Paris. Pop. 1,900. It has a station on the Havre Railway.

TRIENT. (See TRENT.)

TRIER. (See TREVES.)

TRIESCH, triesh, a town of Moravia, 6 miles from Iglau. Manf. Woollen and linen fabrics. Pop. 5,200.

TRIESTE, tre-est' or tre-es'-tai, a large seaport of the Austrian dominions, the capital of a district in the Illyrian territory, near the N.W. extremity of the Adriatic Sea, and 72 miles from Venice. It consists of an old town standing on a hill, with a castle on the top; the new town is on level ground, intersected by the Maria Theresa canal, and built with neatness and regularity. Trieste has good streets, and a number of commodious buildings, but few that are large or striking, except the cathedral, the church which formerly belonged to the Jesuits, and the theatre: the cathedral is an ancient, the theatre a modern building. Among the public institutions are an episcopal chapter, a school, a society of arts and sciences, a public library, a large hospital, a lazaretto for performing quarantine, a public fountain in one of the principal squares, and the column and statue of the emperor Charles VI. It has also several squares, Roman Catholic, Greek, and Protestant churches, several theatres, a barracks, and a casino with a terrace ornamented with statues. It is the principal seaport city of the Austrian empire, is a free port, and the great emporium for the trade of the Austrian empire by the Adriatic. Exp. These comprise the produce of the mines of Idria, and even of Hungary; linen, tobacco, woollens from different parts of the empire; also printed cottons, wax, wine, and hemp. Imp. These consist of cotton, wool, hides, raisins, silks, rice, oil from the Levant; wheat chiefly from Odessa; sugar, coffee, and other tropical products from the West Indies and Brazil. The trade of the Adriatic is conducted in barks of 20, 30, or 40 tons; these and much larger vessels enter with ease the inlet, in the form of a canal, which leads from the sea into the town, and has on each side quays for vessels to load and unload. Each of the trading nations of Europe has a consul here, and shipbuilding is carried on with activity. Manf. Sugar-refining, the making of white lead, soap, leather, paper, and wax. At some distance from the town are salt-works. Pop. 65,000, exclusive of the military. Lat. 45° 38′ N. Lon. 13° 46′ 5″ E. Trieste is built on or near the site of the Roman colony of Tergeste; and there are some remains of the aqueduct which brought water to it from a distance of six miles. In 1797, and in 1805, it was taken by the French. —The DISTRICT and GOVERNMENT of Trieste forms the S. and W. parts of Illyria, comprising the peninsula of Istria, the islands Veglio, Cherso, Lossini, &c., in the Adriatic, with the valley of the Isongo. Area, 2,900 square miles. Pop. 523,000.—The GULF forms the head of the Adriatic, and, at its entrance, has a length and breadth of 20 miles. It contains the islands of Grado, and receives the Isonzo, Stella, and other rivers.

TRIESTE.

TRIGG, trig, a county of the United States, in the S. of Kentucky. Area, 356 square miles. Pop. 10,200.

TRIGNO, treen'-yo, a river of Naples, rising in the Apennines, 10 miles from Campobasso, and, after a course of 50 miles, entering the Adriatic Sea, 5 miles from Il Vasto.

TRIKERI, tre-ke-re', a town of European Turkey, in Thessaly, at the extremity of a peninsula in the Gulf of Volo. Pop. 5,000.

TRIKHALA. (See TRICALA.)

TRIM, trim, the chief town of the county of East-meath, Ireland, on the Boyne, 20 miles from Drogheda. It was formerly walled, and defended by a strong castle. There were also many religious foundations, and it still exhibits the ruins of different friaries and of a large castle. There is a charter-school for 40 children, and a barrack built on the site of its old abbey. It has, besides, a county-court-house, a gaol, union workhouse, and a pillar to the duke of Wellington. Pop. of town, 2,000.—In 1649 Cromwell took this place; and about three miles from it is the demesne of Dangan, where the late duke of Wellington was born. According to some, however, he was born at sea.

TRIMBLE, trim'-bel, a county of the United States, in the N. of Kentucky. Area, 127 square miles. Pop. 6,000.

TRINCOMALEE, trin-co-ma-le', a town, fortress, and excellent harbour of Ceylon, on the north-east side of the island. The fort is strong, and commands the principal bays, particularly the entrance to the harbour. It has, also, a citadel, called Fort Ostenburgh, erected on a cliff which projects into the sea. The harbour, from its convenient situation, is of great consequence to a maritime power, and was pronounced by Lord Nelson "the finest harbour in the world." The town has a barracks for European troops, but the station is unhealthy. Pop. of town, small. Lat. 8° 33′ 6″ N. Lon. 81° 14′ 6″ E. The first settlers of this place were the Portuguese. It was taken from them by the Dutch, with whom it remained till 1782, when it was captured by the British; but a very inadequate garrison having been left to defend it, it was taken with great ease by the French under Admiral Suffrein, who restored it to the Dutch. In 1795 it was taken by the British, after a siege of three weeks, and has ever since remained in their possession.

TRING, tring, a neat market-town of Hertfordshire, 32 miles from London. It has a Gothic church, a market-house, and various schools. Manf. Silk, canvas, and straw plait. Pop. 4,800.—It has a station on the London and North-Western Railway.

TRINGANA, trin'-ga-na', a town on the Gulf of Siam, on the E. side of the Malay peninsula. It is the residence of a rajah and the capital of a state of the same name. Pop. 60,000.

TRINIDAD, trin'-i-dad, the most S. of the British W. India islands, opposite the coast of S. America, from which it is separated by the Gulf of Paria. At its southern and northern extremities it approaches to within 10 or 12 miles of the American coast. Area. Estimated at about 2,000 square miles. Desc. Of an irregular square form, having two points stretching to the west from its north and south corners. It is the largest, most fertile, and most beautiful of all the Windward group, and abounding in the finest woods. Its north side is a continued ridge of mountains, from which abundance of the purest and clearest streams issue on both sides. Another ridge runs along a portion of the E. side, and, continuing in a S.W. direction, receives the name of the Monserrat Hills. The rivers or streams from these are distinguished by a yellow clayish colour. The soil is extremely fertile, and, whilst the W. coast has numerous bays, the N. and E. are destitute of harbours. Climate. During spring, the thermometer is usually, in the daytime, at 80° of Fahrenheit, and during the night it falls to 60°, and, sometimes, even to 50°, in tolerably elevated spots. There are several active mud volcanoes, which occasionally emit flames. Rivers. Unimportant. Zoology.

Trinidad

The island having extensive wild savannahs, large numbers of cattle, horses, and mules are fed in common, but might be extended to exportation. The woods abound with game of different sorts; amongst which are the deer, the lap, or laba, the euenca, a species of wild hog of exquisite flavour, and a variety of others of the same description. Among the feathered tribes are the wild turkey, the ramier, and the parrot, with which the markets are daily supplied. Various sorts of shell-fish are found on the coasts, including the finest lobsters and crabs, as well as shrimps and prawns. The whale-fishery might likewise be carried on with safety to great advantage at certain times of the year. Pro. Cacao is the principal crop; but sugar, cotton, coffee, and asphalt are produced. This last is taken from a pitch-lake situate on a peninsula N.E. of Creapo Bay. Tobacco and indigo are also raised, with all the fruits or vegetables congenial to the tropics, and even some European ones. Exp. Sugar, cacao, molasses, coffee, cotton, and hides. Pop. 65,000. Lat. of N.E. point, 10° 51′ N. Lon. 60° 53′ W. —This island was discovered by Columbus in 1493, but was not taken possession of by the Spaniards till 1538, when their establishment on it was followed by the almost total destruction of the Indians. The importance of this colony, however, was not appreciated till 1783, when an edict was issued inviting all traders and navigators of the nations which were at peace with Spain, to frequent the island, placing but a few restrictions on its commerce, which could easily be eluded. In consequence of this policy, new colonists crowded from Europe. There arose, in the short space of four years, a town, regularly built, which became one of the most commercial in the New World, justly meriting the name of Port Spain, from the mother country. In 1797 the island capitulated, without resistance, to a British force under the command of Sir Ralph Abercrombie. Since this period, it has remained in the hands of the British.

Trinidad, a city on the south side of the island of Cuba, and on the shore of a river of the same name, with a port, at which is carried on a traffic in sugar and tobacco, both of excellent quality. Pop. 13,560. Lat. 21° 42′ N. Lon. 80° 6′ W.

Trinidad, an island in the Atlantic Ocean, belonging to Brazil. It lies about 16° E. of Brazil, in lat. 20° 30′ S., and lon. 29° 15′ W.

Trinidad, a city of Guatimala, in the province of Costa Rica, 82 miles from Guatimala. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 13° 46′ N. Lon. 90° 1′ W.

Trinidad, a town of Guatimala, in the province of Samsonate, 162 miles from Guatimala. Pop. Unascertained.—Also the name of various rivers and settlements in South America.

Trinidade, trin-i-da′-dai, a market-town of Brazil, 20 miles from Rio-de-Janeiro. Pop. 4,200.

Trinity, or La Trinité, trin′-i-te, a seaport-town of the island of Martinique, with a good harbour. It belongs to the Windward group, in the Caribbean Sea, and is distant 15 miles from St. Pierre. Pop. 6,000. Lat. 14° 53′ N. Lon. 61° 8′ W.

Trino, tre′-no, a town of Sardinia, on the Po, 28 miles from Turin. Its only buildings worthy of notice are its churches. Pop. 8,300. The trade of this place mostly consists of cattle.

Tripole, trip′-o-lai, a market-town of Russia, on the Dnieper, 28 miles from Kiev. Pop. 2,000.

Tripoli, trip′-o-le, a state of the Ottoman empire, on the northern coast of Africa, the most easterly of the Barbary states. Its interior boundaries are, on the east the desert of Barca; on the south Fezzan and the Libyan desert; on the west Tunis, and part of the Bled el Jereede, or country of dates. Area. The whole dominion is estimated at 200,000 square miles; but Tripoli proper, with Sert inclusive, comprises not more than 100,000 square miles. Desc. Tripoli consists chiefly of a line of coast, extending about 800 miles in length, from Cape Razatin to Port Bomba, and the habitable portion principally lies along the coast, which, for a few miles inland, is almost throughout of luxuriant fertility. Beyond this limit, however, the productive qualities of the soil entirely disappear, and the interior is occupied either by deserts of sand, or with the mountainous districts of Gurian and Mesulata. The Tripolitan territory includes the country colonized by the Greeks, and celebrated by them under the name of Cyrene. Rivers. None properly so called; only torrents. Climate. Salubrious in general; but the sirocco wind, which in autumn blows often for three days together, is a painful visitant to the inhabitants. Pro. The tract along the coast produces, in the utmost luxuriance, every article peculiar to the finest tropical climates. Corn is grown in great abundance, with cotton, silk, tobacco, saffron, castor-oil, and madder. The date-tree forms the staple of all the interior and sandy tracts. In the same districts are found the lotus and the cassob, both of which are indigenous. Almonds, figs, apples, pears, plums, peaches, nectarines, grapes, and melons, are abundant, and of exquisite flavour; whilst the vegetables are very fine, and similar to those of Europe. Wine of superior quality might be produced, and rock-salt forms an important article of export. Manf. Carpets and cloaks, with other articles of clothing. Besides these, morocco leather, earthenware, potash, and sacking. Rel. Mahometanism. Gov. Since 1835, exercised by a pasha, a vassal of the Porte. Pop. 650,000. Lat. between 28° and 33° 30′ N. Lon. between 10° 30′ and 25° E.—This country formed the eastern boundary of the Carthaginian dominions, and under the last Ptolemy, surnamed Apion, was changed into a Roman province; but was early subjected to the power of the Saracens, and shared the vicissitudes experienced by their dynasties on the Barbary coast. It was governed by the Turks till 1713, when it was erected into an independent state, and is now held to be the most civilized of the Barbary states.

Tripoli, a fortified city of N. Africa, built in a low situation, on a neck of land projecting a short distance into the sea. It is of great extent, though a large portion of the space inclosed within its walls is unoccupied. The caravanserais, mosques, houses of the foreign consuls, and of the higher ranks of the natives, are mostly built of stone, and regularly whitewashed twice a year. The lower ranks construct their houses of earth, small stones, and mortar: the height never exceeds one story. The roofs are flat, and serve at once as an agreeable promenade and as a receptacle for rain-water. Bazars or market-places occupy a considerable portion of the city, and are kept in excellent order. There is one very elegant mosque. The public baths and the caravanserais are both spacious and convenient. The chief monument of antiquity is a superb triumphal arch, built of fine marble, and ornamented with several bas-reliefs, inscriptions, and other designs. It was erected in 164, in honour of Aurelius Antoninus and Verres. In point of tranquillity and cleanliness, Tripoli might be a model even for European towns. The harbour is formed by a reef of rocks, running in an eastern direction from the northern extremity of the town. Inhabitants. These mostly consist of Moors; but their general character is not entitled to praise. Revenge, avarice, treachery, and deceit, are described as predominant vices. They do not even possess the Mussulman virtue of sobriety; winehouses being public, and intoxication as common as in Britain. Trade. Chiefly confined to Malta, Tunis, and the Levant. The vessels employed in it are mostly Maltese and Ottoman, with only a few belonging to Tripoli. Exp. Wool of excellent quality, senna and several other drugs, madder roots, barilla, hides, goat and sheep skins dressed, salt, sal natron, ostrich feathers, gold-dust, ivory, gum, dried fruit and dates, lotus-berries, cassob, saffron, bullocks, sheep, and poultry. Imp. Cloths of every quality and colour, sugar, tea, coffee, spices of all sorts, woollen and Manchester goods, damasks, silks of various colours and descriptions, gold and silver tissues, laces and threads, cochineal, indigo, iron, hardware of all kinds, small wines, spirits, capillaire, gunpowder, cannon, muskets, pistols, sword-blades, naval stores of every description, planks and beams for building ships and houses; common looking-glasses, toys, cotton threads, and Tunisian caps. Tripoli is also the centre of a considerable portion of that trade which is characteristic of Africa. Caravans, generally twice a year, bring all the commodities of interior Africa, to be exchanged for coarse European cloths, a few silks, baracans, or cloaks of the country, Tunisian caps, powder, muskets, pistols, scimitars, hardware, glass beads, toys, and Venetian looking-glasses. Pop. Estimated at 15,000. Lat. 32° 54′ N. Lon. 13° 18′ E.

TRIPOLI, or TARABLUS, a seaport of Syria, the capital of a pashalic of the same name, traversed by the small river Kadisha, 46 miles from Beyrout. It stands at the foot of the branches of Mount Lebanon, and along the edge of a small triangular plain, which extends between them and the sea, and terminates in a flat promontory, on which is the place of anchorage. The only fortification consists of the citadel, an old Saracen building, in a wretched state. The plain is entirely covered with trees, chiefly of the mulberry, planted in regular order, and serving for the production of silk, which forms the staple of Tripoli. It is, however, very unhealthy. Silk is largely exported, both in a raw and manufactured state. Soap is also made for exportation; to which may be added a few sponges, collected on the shore between Tripoli and Beyrout; some cotton, tobacco, galls, and cochineal. Lat. 34° 26′ N. Lon. 35° 44′ E. Pop. about 15,000. Tripoli was, in the beginning of the 12th century, taken by the Crusaders, and is a Greek bishop's see, and the residence of several European consuls.

TRIPOLIZZA, or TREPOLITZA, tre-po-lit'-sa, a town of Greece, in the Morea, in a narrow valley, at the foot of Mount Mænalus, 22 miles from Argos. It is irregularly built, and the houses are mostly composed of large unburnt bricks. The best buildings are the former residence of the pasha, the khan, or place of accommodation for travellers, and the bazar or market-place. There are, besides, several mosques and churches for the Greeks. Pop. Unascertained. In 1821 this place was taken by the Greek insurgents, and, in 1828, was razed to the ground by the troops of Ibrahim Pasha. Since then it has been rebuilt.

TRIPTOLEMUS, trip-tol'-e-mus, the son of Celeus, king of Attica, by Neæra. The goddess Ceres wished to make him immortal, but was prevented through the meddling curiosity of his mother. She, however, taught him agriculture, and rendered him serviceable to mankind, by instructing him how to sow corn and make bread. She also gave him her chariot, drawn by two dragons, in which he travelled over the earth, and distributed corn to all the inhabitants of the world.

TRISSINO, George, tris-se'-no, an Italian poet, who was employed by Leo X. upon various missions to Denmark, Venice, and Germany, and afterwards by Clement VII. He was the author of a poem entitled "Italy delivered from the Goths;" a tragedy called "Sophonisba;" a comedy, and a large number of smaller pieces. Voltaire borrowed from and imitated him. B. 1478; D. 1550.

TRISTAN D'ACUNHA, tris-tan' da-koon'-ya, the largest of three islands in the South Atlantic Ocean, about 1,500 miles from any land either to the west or north. It has a circuit of 15 miles. Desc. Mountainous; one peak attaining an elevation of upwards of 8,000 feet above the level of the sea. Pop. 100. These islands are claimed by Great Britain. Lat. 37° S. Lon. 15° 40′ W.

TRISTE, tris'-te, an island on the coast of America, near the boundary of the provinces of Vera Cruz and Merida, in the lake or gulf of Terminos. Ext. 18 miles in circumference. Lat. 18° 20′ N.

TRITON, tri'-ton, a sea deity, son of Neptune, by Amphitrite, who could calm the sea and abate storms at pleasure. He is generally represented as blowing a shell; his body above the waist is like that of a man, and below, a dolphin. Many of the sea deities are called Tritons.

TRIVENTO, tre-ven'-to, a town of Italy, 60 miles from Naples. Manf. Woollen cloths. Pop. 4,000.

TROAD, tro'-ad, the plain around ancient Troy.

TROGUS POMPEIUS, tro'-gus, a Roman historian, who wrote a Universal History, from the reign of Ninus, king of Assyria, to the time of Augustus, which was greatly admired for its purity and elegance. It was epitomized by Justin; but the original work has been lost. Flourished in the last century B.C.

TROLLOPE, Mrs. Frances, trol'-lup, a modern English novelist, who was the wife of Anthony Trollope, Esq., barrister-at-law, with whom she resided upon the continent. After the death of her husband, she visited the United States, and resided there during three years. She commenced her career as an authoress by producing a work entitled "Domestic Life of the Americans," which appeared in 1832. This work, which excited an extraordinary amount of criticism upon both sides of the Atlantic, was followed by—"Belgium and Western Germany;" "Paris and the Parisians;" "The Vicar of Wrexhill;" "Vienna and the Austrians, with some account of a Journey through Swabia, Bavaria, the Tyrol, and the Saltzbourg;" "The Widow Barnaby;" "The Blue Belles of England;" "The Barnaby's in America; or, the Widow Married;" "The Lauringtons; or, Superior People;" "Town and Country;" "The Life and Adventures of a Clever Woman;" and, indeed, scores of others, which constituted their authoress the most prolific writer of her day. B. 1790.

TROLLOPE, Thomas Adolphus, a modern English miscellaneous writer, son of the preceding, with whom he resided at Florence. He commenced as an author in 1840, at which date he put forth a work entitled "A Summer in Brittany." He next published "A Summer in Western France," which was followed by "Impressions of a Wanderer in Italy, Switzerland, France, and Germany." Improving with each successive effort, his latest works presented considerable attractions, both in style and subject. The most popular of these were—"The Girlhood of Catherine de' Medici," and a "Decade of Italian Women."

TROLLOPE, Anthony, an eminent novelist, son of Mrs. F. Trollope, and one of the most popular as well as prolific writers of the present day. He has produced several excellent transcripts of modern society; such as "Dr. Thorne," "The Three Clerks," "The Bertrams," "Framley Parsonage," "Orley Farm," &c.

TROMP, Martin Happertzoon, tromp, a celebrated Dutch admiral, who rose from the lowest station to the supreme command, wholly by merit. In 1639 he defeated a numerous Spanish fleet, and afterwards gained several other victories, principally over an English fleet under Blake, in 1652, after which he cruised in the Channel with a broom at the masthead of his ship. In the following year, the Dutch and English fleets, under Tromp and Blake, fought a desperate battle in the Channel, but without either side gaining the advantage. Blake falling ill, the command of the English vessels devolved upon Monk, who encountered Tromp off the Dutch coast. After a stubborn fight, the English claimed the victory, and in the engagement Tromp was killed. B. at the Brill, 1597; killed, 1653.

TROMP, Cornelius Van, a celebrated Dutch admiral, and second son of the preceding. In his 21st year he was placed in command of a vessel, with which he served under Dewildt, in the expedition against the emperor of Morocco, in 1650. After distinguishing himself in the Mediterranean, and with the English fleet off Livorno, he was created a rear-admiral. Subsequently to some years of repose, he was dispatched against the Algerine cruisers, whom he severely handled. The war between England and Holland was renewed in 1665, and in that year he served in the action in which the English fleet, under the duke of York, defeated Van Opdam. In the following year he served under Ruyter in an engagement in which the English were defeated. An action in which the Dutch were beaten soon followed, and Ruyter, attributing his misfortunes to Van Tromp, the latter was arrested; but was restored to his rank by the Stadtholder, afterwards William III., in 1673. In this year the English and French fleets fought as allies against the Dutch. In 1675 he went to England, where he was created a baron by Charles II. He next served against the Swedes, as the ally of the king of Denmark, who, to reward his services, raised him to the rank of count. At the death of Ruyter, he was created admiral-general of the United Provinces, and, after distinguishing himself under the prince of Orange, in the expedition against Saint Omer, he retired into private life. B. at Rotterdam, 1629; D. at Amsterdam, 1691.

TRONCHIN, Theodore, tronch'-ă, an eminent Swiss physician, who was the favourite pupil of Boerhaave. He settled at Amsterdam as physician, and afterwards at Geneva. In 1756 he removed to Paris, where he attended the royal family, and became the first inoculater of his time. His most important works are—several articles in the "Encyclopédie;" a treatise "de Nympha;" and "Observations on Ophthalmia and Hernia." B. at Geneva, 1709; D. at Paris, 1781.

TRONCHIN, John Robert, an eminent Swiss jurisconsult, who became procureur-general at Geneva, and wrote several works against Rousseau. B. 1711; D. 1793.

TROND, St., trawn(g), a town of Belgian Limbourg, 20 miles from Maestricht. It has an abbey founded in the 7th century, and manufactures of tobacco, lace, and soap. Pop. 9,500.

TRONDHJEM. (See DRONTHEIM.)

TRONSON DU COUDRAY, George Alfred, tron'-sawn(g), a celebrated French advocate, who defended Marie Antoinette and Louis XVI., and was the means of saving many of his countrymen from the guillotine during the Revolution. B. 1750; D. 1798.

TROPEA, tro'-pai-a, a town of Naples, 37 miles from Reggio. Manf. Linens, damasks, and blankets. It has, besides, an active anchovy and tunny fishery. Pop. 4,500.

TROPES, or TROPEZ, St., tro'-pai, a seaport-town of France, in the department of the Var, 36 miles from Toulon. Pop. 3,600, mostly engaged in the tunny and other fisheries.

TROPHONIUS, tro-fo'-ni-us, a celebrated Grecian architect, who built Apollo's temple at Delphi, with the assistance of his brother Agamedes. Having demanded of the god a reward, he was told by the priestess to wait eight days. When the days were passed, Trophonius and his brother were found dead in their bed. Trophonius was honoured as a god; he passed for the son of Apollo, and sacrifices were offered to his divinity, when consulted to give oracles. The cave of Trophonius became one of the most celebrated oracles of Greece. Many ceremonies were required from such as consulted the prophet. Every suppliant was pale and dejected at his return; and hence it came proverbial to say of a melancholy man, that "he had consulted the oracle of Trophonius."

TROPPAU, trop'-pou, a fortified town of Austrian Silesia, at the confluence of the Oppa and Mohe, 35 miles from Olmutz. It contains the ancient palace of the princes, churches, several convents, a college, and a museum. Manf. Woollen and linen fabrics, leather, soap, arms, and liqueurs. Pop. 10,200. Here the diplomatic congress, afterwards removed to Laybach, was held, from the 20th of October to the 20th of November, 1820.

TROSACHS, tros'-saks, certain rugged and picturesque mountains of Scotland, in Perthshire, greatly visited on account of their having been made the scene of the adventures in the poem of Sir Walter Scott, entitled "The Lady of the Lake." They lie between lochs Katrine and Achray.

TROUGHTON, Edward, trow'-tun, an eminent English astronomical instrument-maker, who succeeded to the business of his uncle and brother, in Fleet Street, London, and, in 1826, took Simms, also eminent as a maker of mathematical instruments, into partnership. It was said of him, that "he improved and extended every instrument he touched, and that every astronomical instrument was in its turn the subject of his attention." The greater number of the finest instruments used in the Royal Observatory and other scientific establishments were constructed by him. He was the author of several treatises in the Philosophical Transactions, &c. B. 1753; D. in London, 1835.

TROUP, troop, a county of the United States, in the W. of Georgia. Area, 416 square miles. Pop. 17,000.

TROWBRIDGE, trow'-brij, a market-town of Wiltshire, on a rocky hill, near the river Were, which runs into the Avon, near Bradford, and over which there is a stone bridge, 10 miles from Bath. It is irregularly built; but the church is a spacious structure, consisting of a nave, chancel, and two side aisles, with chapels attached. There are, besides, several meeting-houses for dissenters, an almshouse, and a schoolhouse, which stands in the churchyard. Manf. Superfine broadcloths and kerseymeres. Pop. 11,500.—It has a station on a branch of the Great Western Railway.

TROWBRIDGE, Sir Thomas, an English admiral, who, having entered the royal navy, served under Sir Edward Hughes in the East Indies, became a post-captain in 1782. Returning from an expedition to the China seas, he was captured by the French, but while being conveyed to France in the Sanspareil, that ship was taken by Lord Howe, in the victory of 1794. Trowbridge was placed in command of the ship; and, on removing to the Culloden, of 74 guns, he took part in the victory over the combined Spanish fleets at Cape St. Vincent. He was next placed as second in command under Nelson, and, in that capacity, prepared, with the other vessels, to enter the bay of Aboukir; but unfortunately his vessel ran aground, and he was thus prevented from sharing in the great victory of the Nile, a deprivation which almost broke the heart of the gallant sailor. Nelson, his attached friend, nevertheless represented his services so strongly to the Admiralty, that he and his officers were placed upon the same footing as those actually engaged. In 1799 he was created a baronet, and subsequently became an admiral, and was dispatched to the East Indies; on his return from which station, in a leaky vessel, he and his crew were lost at sea. B. in London, about 1750; drowned, 1807.

TROWBRIDGE, Sir Thomas St. Vincent Cochrane, a gallant English soldier, and grandson of the preceding, who, while serving in the Crimea, distinguished himself by holding, with the greatest bravery, a five-gun battery against the onslaught of the Russians at Inkermann, in which action he lost his right leg and left foot. On his return to England he was promoted to the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and received a pension. B. 1817.

TROY, troi, a city of the United States, and the capital of the county of Rensselaer, New York, on the Hudson, here crossed by a bridge, 6 miles from Albany. It is regularly laid out, and is a well-built and flourishing town. It contains a marble court-house, a gaol, a market-house, banks, a Lancasterian school, and numerous churches for different denominations of Christians. It has, also, various literary and scientific associations. Manf. Woollen and cotton goods, machinery, cutlery, ropes, leather, and carriages. There are, besides, various kinds of mills, distilleries, and breweries. Pop. 30,000, and with West Troy, 40,000. W. Troy stands on the opposite side of the Hudson, and has an extensive U.S. arsenal, and a railway connecting it with the Erie Canal. In point of wealth and trade, it ranks the third town in New York. The Hudson is navigable for sloops to this place. Three weekly newspapers are published here.

TROY, a post township of the United States, and capital of Miami county, Ohio.—Also the name of various other townships, generally with small populations.

TROY, Francis de, trwaw, an eminent French painter, who was the disciple of Nicholas de Loir, and became a professor in the academy. He painted historical subjects and portraits, and was employed by Louis XIV. B. 1648; D. 1730.

TROY, John Francis de, a French painter, and son of the preceding. Louis XIV. conferred on him the order of St. Michael, and appointed him director of the academy at Rome. B. at Paris, 1676; D. 1752.

TROYES, trwaw, a town and city of France, in the department of the Aube, situate between two fine meadows on the Seine, 88 miles from Paris. Its chief edifices are its churches; in particular the cathedral, and the churches of St. Etienne and St. Urban. Its castle, now antiquated, was long the residence of the counts of Champagne. Its public mall, or walk, extends along the ramparts, and is of great length. It has also a town-hall, a central school, a public library, and a society of arts. Manf. Hosiery, cotton and woollen stuffs, and yarn. Of these goods it may be considered as a centre. Pop. 28,000. This place was the capital of the old province of Champagne, and, in 1420, a treaty conferring the crown of France on the king of England, was concluded in it. In 1814 it was the scene of hard contests between the Russians and the French.

TRUBTCHEVSK, troob-tchevsk', a town of European Russia, in the government of Orel, 90 miles from Orel. It has large salt-magazines, and a trade in flax and corn. Pop. 4,300.

TRUEBA Y COSIO, Telesforo de, troo-ai'-va ē ko'-se-o, a Spaniard who wrote novels and tragedies in the English language. He was educated in England, and, in his 23rd year, first appeared as a writer, on producing his novel of "Gomez Arias," the action of which was placed in the times of the struggle between the Moors and Spaniards. This work, which obtained an extraordinary share of attention, was followed by other tales, the best of which were, "The Castilian," "Paris and London," and the "Romance of History." In 1822 he produced upon the stage of the Lyceum theatre, a musical farce, entitled "Call again to-morrow." Some comedies, which met with but little success, followed. He was likewise the author of "A History of the Conquest of Peru;" "Life of Hernon Cortes;" both of which were published in Constable's Miscellany. These works possess considerable merit; but have been totally eclipsed by the greater productions of Prescott. In 1834 he returned to his native country, and became a secretary to the Cortes, and afterwards wrote some plays, which met with success upon the Spanish stage. B. at Santander, 1805; D. at Paris, 1835.

TRUMBULL, trum'-bull, a county of the United States, in Ohio. Area, 890 square miles. Pop. 33,000.

TRUMBULL, Sir William, an English statesman, who was for some time ambassador in France, and afterwards secretary of state. But he is chiefly known as the early patron and correspondent of Pope, who wrote an epitaph on him. B. in Berkshire, 1636; D. 1716.

TRUMBULL, John, an eminent American painter, who, in early life, fought in the war of independence, and became colonel and aide-de-camp to Washington. Considering himself slighted, he threw up his commission, and, in 1780, repaired to England for the purpose of studying painting under his countryman West. Suspected by the English government, he was arrested, but was liberated on condition of immediately quitting England. He subsequently lived, on two occasions, in London and Paris, and became, after his final return to his native country, president of the American Academy of the Arts. He painted several portraits of Washington, and a series commemorative of the war of independence. Previous to his death, he bequeathed a number of pictures to Yale College, which were placed in a building at New Haven, called the Trumbull Gallery. B. at Lebanon, Connecticut, 1756; D. at New York, 1843.

TRURO, troo'-ro, a market-town and borough of the county of Cornwall, at the confluence of the rivers Kenwin and Allen, which direct their streams on each side of the town, and, at the bottom, unite with a branch of Falmouth harbour, 8 miles from Falmouth. At every spring tide these form a fine lake, 2 miles in length, and of sufficient depth to be navigable for vessels of upwards of 200 tons burden. The houses are built on a regular plan, and faced with granite. Being nearly surrounded with water, the town is connected with the suburbs by short stone bridges. The church is a spacious and handsome fabric, consisting of two aisles of equal size, and a smaller one on the north side. The spire is of a more modern date than the main building, and is remarkably plain. Besides the church, there are meeting-houses for Independents, Baptists, Methodists, and other sects of dissenters. The town-hall is a plain substantial building of stone. The coinage-hall, where the process of coining the tin is carried on every quarter, is a heavy ancient building. Here the parliaments of the lord-warden of the Stannaries, and the courts of his vice-warden, are held, for the adjudication of all matters connected with the tin-trade. It has a theatre, and various charitable institutions; a county infirmary, the Truro Humane Institution, and an hospital; literary institutions, various schools, a mining-college, a Dorcas society, and other charities. Exp. Tin, copper, paper, and pottery-ware. Imp. Coal, timber, and such materials as are necessary to mining operations. Pop. 11,000.—This is the birthplace of Sir Humphrey Davy.

TRURO, Thomas Wilde, Lord, a modern English lawyer, who was the son of an attorney, and himself practised as such in the early part of his career. In 1817 he was called to the bar, and speedily rose to a high position in the legal profession. He acted as junior counsel under Lords Denman and Brougham during the trial of Queen Caroline. In 1850 he became lord chancellor and Lord Truro. He distinguished himself by the soundness of his judgments and as a legal reformer. His second wife was Mademoiselle Augusta Emma D'Este, daughter of the duke of Sussex. B. 1782; D. 1855.

TRURO, a town of Nova Scotia, in Halifax county, 10 miles from Halifax. Pop. 2,000.—Also a post township of the United States, in Barnstaple county, Massachusetts. Pop. 2,300.

TSCHERNOWITZ. (See CZERNOVITZ.)

TSCHETNEK, tshet'-nek, a town of Hungary, 13 miles from Gomer. Pop. 5,000.

TSCHIRNHAUSEN, Ehrenfried Walter Von, shirn'-housen, an eminent German mathematician, who was of a noble family, and who, while pursuing his studies at the university of Leyden, suddenly left that seat of learning to enter the Dutch army, then engaged against the French. After pursuing a military career during a year and a half, he proceeded to visit England, Italy, and France; but, returning home, he occupied himself with experimenting upon burning-glasses. According to an account furnished to the Memoirs of the French Academy, in 1699, he constructed a lens three feet in diameter, which was capable of firing wet wood and melting thin iron plates. In 1701, and subsequently, he produced some Memoirs, in which he endeavoured to prove that the infinitesimal calculus could be dispensed with. In 1686 he published a work entitled "Medicina Corporis," in which he laid down rules for the preservation of health. A companion volume, called "Medicina Mentis," followed; in which he analyzed the sources of pleasure and pain in the mind, and treated of the capabilities of that curve line which was subsequently named after him. To him is due the development of the Saxon porcelain-manufacture, he having discovered the method of making porcelain equal to that which is procured from China. D. at Keislingswald, Upper Lusatia, 1657; D. at his estate in Saxony, 1708.

TSCHUDI, Gilles, shoo'-de, surnamed the father of Swiss history. He was educated under Zwinglius, the reformer, and afterwards rose to the office of landamman, or governor of his native canton. A man of enlightened mind and humane temper, he displayed tact and moderation in the disputes which took place relative to religious opinions. He wrote many works upon the history and topography of Switzerland, most of which still remain in manuscript. Of his printed productions the most important was a chronicle which narrated the history of Switzerland from 1000 to 1470. B. at Glarus, 1505; D. 1572.

TUCKER, Abraham, tuk'-er, a celebrated English metaphysical writer, who was a gentleman of good fortune in Surrey, and devoted his life to the study of the philosophy of mind and morals. He published a curious work, called "The Light of Nature pursued," under the assumed name of Search; and also "Man in Quest of Himself," which was reprinted in Paris; and Mathematical Tracts. He has been styled "the metaphysical Montaigne." B. 1705; D. 1774.

TUCKER, Josiah, a celebrated English divine, became D.D. of the university of Oxford in 1759. On entering into orders, he settled at Bristol, and became rector of St. Stephen's, and prebendary of the cathedral in that city. In 1758 he was preferred to the deanery of Gloucester. He was an able writer on commercial, political, and theological subjects. At the beginning of the American war he advocated the granting independence to the colonies, for which he was greatly censured by many writers. His principal work is a treatise on Civil Government, against Locke. B. at Laugharne, Carmarthenshire, 1711; D. at Gloucester, 1799.

TUCUMAN, too-koo-man', a department of the Plata Confederation, bounded N.E. by Chichas and Lipes in Charcas; N.W. and W. by Atacama; W. and S.W. by Cuyo or Cujo; and S.E. by the Pampas, or territories inhabited by the Indians. It is described as being, in its central parts, one of the richest provinces of the confederation. Pro. Cotton, indigo, dyewoods, wax, and cocoa. Minerals. Gold, silver, copper, and lead. Pov. Estimated at 45,000.

TUCUMAN, or SAN MIGUEL DE TUCUMAN, the capital of the above department, stands in a pleasant plain, and contains a cathedral, a convent of Franciscans, one of La Merced, and a college, which was built by the Jesuits. It has a trade in mules, in oxen for the travelling waggons, and in the waggons themselves. Pop. 8,000. Lat. 26° 49′ S. Lon. 64° 36′ W. Here the independence of the Plata provinces was first promulgated, and, in 1816, the first congress of the republic held.

TUDELA, too-da'-la, a city of Spain, in Navarra, at the confluence of the Queiles and the Ebro, 45 miles from Pampeluna. A fine bridge, beautiful walks, and an advantageous situation, give it a picturesque appearance; but the look of the interior is spoiled by the narrowness of the streets. Manf. Tiles, earthenware, soap, and coarse woollen fabrics. Pop. 7,000.—Here, in 1808, the Spaniards were defeated by the French.

TUDELA, a town of Spain, on the Douro, 5 miles from Valladolid. Pop. 2,000.

In 1657 he was appointed principal of St. Edmund Hall, and, after the Restoration, was created D.D., and made chaplain to the king. He wrote "Logica Apodeictica," "Præcipuorum Theologiæ," and several controversial pieces against Dr. Bull and Mr. Baxter on Justification. B. at Carlisle, 1620; D. 1676.

TULLY, George, a learned English divine, who wrote a "Discourse on the Government of the Thoughts," several sermons and tracts against Popery, and translated part of Plutarch's "Morals;" from the Latin of Cornelius Nepos, the "Life of Miltiades;" and from Suetonius, the "Life of Julius Cæsar." D. 1653; D. 1695.

TULMERO, tool-mai'-ro, a town of the Caraccas, S. America, in Venezuela, 6 miles from Maracay. It is modern and well built, and has a handsome church and many neat private buildings. Pop. 8,000.

TULN, tooln, a town of Lower Austria, near the Tuln, 14 miles from Vienna. Pop. 2,000.—Here, in 1683, Sobieski collected his troops for the defence of Vienna.

TUMBEZ, toom'-bez, or toom'-beth, a town of Peru, province of Piura, on the Rio Tumbez, 280 miles from Truxillo.—Here, in 1526, the Spaniards first disembarked.

TUNBRIDGE, or TONBRIDGE, tun'-brij, a market-town of the county of Kent, on the river Tun, one of the five branches into which the Medway here divides itself, and over each of which is a stone bridge, 28 miles from London. It consists chiefly of one long and wide street, and has a free grammar-school, with considerable privileges. Many charitable bequests have been made to the town by different persons, and it has been long noted for its manufacture of toys and turnery. Pop. 4,600.—It has a station on the South-Eastern Railway.

TUNBRIDGE WELLS, a market-town of Kent, within five or six miles from the town of Tunbridge immediately bordering on Sussex, deriving its origin and importance from the celebrated mineral waters in the vicinity. Formerly the wells were frequently visited by different branches of the royal family. The bath-house is a handsome edifice, and contains hot and cold baths, whilst the parades, usually called the Upper and Lower walks, run parallel to each other, and are much frequented. The trade consists chiefly in the manufacture of a variety of toys in wood of different kinds, such as tea-chests, dressing-boxes of different kinds, children's toys, punch-ladles, snuff-boxes, and other articles. Pop. 10,800.—It has a station on the Hastings branch of the South-Eastern Railway.

TUNG, toong, the name of several cities in China, and the prefix to the names of many others.

TUNGARAGUA, toon-ga-ra'-gwa, a large river of South America, which has its rise in Peru, and pours itself into the Amazon, by an immense mouth, below the village of St. Regis.

TUNIS.

TUNGUSES, toon-goo'-ses, a wandering native race of Asiatic Russia, who cover nearly the whole south-eastern portion of that vast territory. They are first found on the banks of the Yenisei, whence they extend all the way eastward to the Sea of Okhotsk.

TUNGUSKA, toon-goo'-ska, the name of three large rivers of Asiatic Russia, all tributaries of the Yenisei.

TUNIS, tu'-nis, a considerable territory or regency of the Ottoman empire, in Northern Africa, having Algeria on the W. and the Mediterranean on the N. and E. On the S. it is bounded by the Greater Atlas and Tripoli. Area. Estimated at 72,000 square miles. Desc. It consists chiefly of a large peninsula, stretching into the Mediterranean in a north-easterly direction, and coming within less than a hundred miles of the coast of Sicily. The cultivated part reaches from 200 to 250 miles into the interior, till it terminates with the chain of Atlas, and the vast dry plains of the Bled el Jereede. There are few countries more highly favoured as to natural beauty and fertility. It is watered by the noble river Mejerdah. The tracts to the south called Bled el Jereede, or the country of dates, though not presenting the same rich and verdant aspect as those on the seacoast, yield in plenty, not only the date, but grain of different kinds, and contain a number of large villages. Cotton and indigo have recently been introduced. The mountains near Tunis contain mines of silver, copper, and lead; and there is one of quicksilver near Porto Farina; but these sources of national wealth are not turned to any account. The domestic animals comprise camels, horses, and buffaloes. Manf. Soap, silk, woollen and linen fabrics, with leather. Pop. about 2,500,000. Lat. between 31° and 37° N. Lon. between 8° and 11° E.—Tunis was anciently the seat of Carthage. It then fell under the Roman power, was conquered by the Vandals, and, afterwards, by the Saracens. In 1574, being occupied by the troops of the emperor Charles V., it was again annexed to the Turkish empire. It was governed for some time by its viceroys, called beys; but the people, or rather the soldiery, soon acquired the privilege of electing their own bey; and that officer may now be considered entirely independent of the Porte.

TUNIS, a fortified city of Africa, and the capital of the regency of the same name. It is situate at the bottom of a bay, on a plain, surrounded on all sides, except on the east, by considerable heights, and is encircled by lakes and marshes. It is built in the most irregular manner, and the streets are so extremely narrow and filthy that they can with difficulty be passed through. The citadel is commanded by the neighbouring heights, and there is a rising ground on the north of the town, which commands both it and El Bardo, the fortified palace of the bey, 2 miles west of Tunis. The city contains a number of mosques, and, near its centre, a piazza of vast extent, said to have formerly comprised 3,000 shops for the sale of woollen and linen manufactures. The finest structure is the palace of the bey, in the Gothic or Saracenic style, and once the residence of Queen Caroline of England. The Moorish houses, according to custom, are only one story high, with flat roofs, and cisterns for the purpose of collecting the rain-water. The city, however, is well supplied from a neighbouring spring, which is conveyed into it by a very fine aqueduct, built in the time of Charles V. Besides the mosques, there are a few colleges and schools. Six miles to the west, is the Goletta, the celebrated harbour and citadel of Tunis, and the great naval and commercial depôt of that state. A basin has been formed here, sufficiently spacious to receive all the vessels of war and merchant ships belonging to Tunis. A large lake, separated from the sea by a very narrow isthmus, extends from Tunis to the Goletta. About four miles north of the Goletta, is Cape Carthage, forming a high promontory stretching into the sea, on which the celebrated city of the same name was built. Exp. Considerable quantities of grain, olive-oil, wool, fish, fruits, wax, soap, and sponge. Orchilla weed is collected in considerable quantity amid the ruins of Carthage. The caravans from Tombuctoo furnish the Tunisian merchants with gold-dust, ivory, and ostrich feathers. Imp. These consist of all kinds of European manufactures, colonial produce, and East-India cottons. Pop. Estimated at about 150,000. Lat. 36° 4′ N. Lon. 10° 20′ E.

TUNIS, BAY OF, a large bay of the Mediterranean, comprehending a coast of 120 miles, in the most interior part of which is the city of Tunis. It lies between capes Bon and Farina, and has at its entrance a breadth of 45 miles.

TUNJA, toon'-ha, a town of New Granada, S. America, 70 miles from Bogota. Manf. Woven goods, and it has a trade in tobacco. Pop. 7,000.

TUNQUIN. (See TONQUIN.)

TUNSTALL, tun'-stal, the name of various hamlets, townships, and parishes in England, none of them with a population above 800.

TUNSTALL, James, a learned English divine, who, in 1741, was elected public orator of the university of Cambridge. He wrote—"Discourses upon Natural and Revealed Religion," and other works. B. about 1710; D. 1772.

TUNSTALL COURT, a market-town and chapelry of Staffordshire, 4 miles from Newcastle-under-Lyne. In the vicinity are numerous potteries, collieries, and chemical works. Pop. 9,600.

TUPPER, Martin Farquhar, tup'-per, a modern English writer, who, after studying at the Charterhouse and Christ Church, Oxford, entered upon the study of the law. In 1839 he produced the well-known work entitled "Proverbial Philosophy," which passed through upwards of thirty editions. His subsequent works were—"A Crock of Gold;" "A Modern Pyramid;" "Ballads for the Time on White Slavery;" "American Ballads;" "Paterfamilias's Diary of Everybody's Tour;" a translation of the Poems of King Alfred, from the Anglo-Saxon; &c. The "Proverbial Philosophy" has been attacked by the best English critical writers, and would appear, notwithstanding its success, to be as heavy, inflated, and dull a piece of literary workmanship as ever crept into notoriety or secured the patronage of the multitude. B. in London, 1810.

TURA, too'-ra, a river of Asiatic Russia, which, after a course of about 300 miles, falls into the Tobol, 70 miles from Tobolsk.

TURBUT, or TARBUT, toor-but', a city of Korassan, in Persia, 50 miles from Meshed. Pop. 18,000.

TURCKHEIM, toork'-hime, a town of France, in the Upper Rhine, 3 miles from Colmar, where the French, in 1675, defeated the Imperialists.

TURCOING. (See TOURCOING.)

TURENNE, Henry de la Tour d'Auvergne, Viscount de, toor-ren', a celebrated French general. He was the second son of the Duc de Bouillon and Elizabeth of Nassau, daughter of William I. of Nassau, prince of Orange. Educated in the Calvinistic faith, he acquired the art of war under Prince Maurice and his brother Prince Henry Frederick, his maternal uncles, in Holland. In 1630 he was sent as a hostage to the court of France. After several gallant actions against the Spaniards in the Low Countries, he took Brisac in 1638, for which Richelieu offered him his niece in marriage; but Turenne, as a Protestant, declined the honour. The next year he served in Italy, and afterwards signalized himself by the conquest of Roussillon. At the age of 23 he became field-marshal, and, in 1643, was appointed marshal of France. About this time he was sent to Germany, where he gained several victories; but was defeated in 1645 at Mariendall. He soon after repaired this loss by the victory of Nordlingen, and, the same year, re-established the elector of Treves in his territories. In 1647 he effected the famous junction with the Swedish army, and obliged the duke of Bavaria to sue for peace. That prince having violated the treaty, Turenne defeated him in the battle of Zumulhausen, and drove him from his dominions. In the civil wars of France he acted at first against the king; but, in 1651, he became reconciled with the court, and became general of the royal army, and was opposed to the prince of Condé, whom he defeated. In 1657 he took Dunkirk, in conjunction with the English troops. This was followed by the capture of several places in the Netherlands, which produced peace between France and Spain in 1659. Hostilities being renewed in 1667, he was appointed marshal of all the armies, and had the honour of instructing Louis XIV. in the art of war. About this time he renounced the Protestant religion. In 1674 he conquered Franche-Comté, which occasioned a league between the German states against France. To prevent their junction, Turenne attacked the army commanded by the duke of Lorraine, and gained a splendid victory. He afterwards defeated the Imperialists at Mulhausen, and again at Turckheim. Montecuculi was then sent against him; and while the two armies were in view of each other, and preparing for battle, Turenne was killed by a cannon-ball, at Sassbach, in 1675, his army crying out, "Our father is dead." He left his memoirs, which were published in 1782. B. at Sedan, 1611.

TURGOT, Anne-Robert James, toor'-go, a French statesman, who was educated for the ecclesiastical state in the college of the Sorbonne, after which he applied to the study of the law, and was, in 1761, appointed intendant of Limoges. He was next created comptroller-general of the finances, in which office he evinced great talents, by endeavouring to effect a reform in the public expenditure, and by introducing several important regulations for the revival and encouragement of trade. He was at the head of the society called Economists, after the death of Quesnay. He was the author of a number of works upon politics, political economy, metaphysics, and literature, as well as some articles for the "Encyclopædia." B. at Paris, 1727; D. 1781.

TURIN, tu-rin' (Ital. TORINO, to-re'-no), a city in the north of Italy, in Piedmont, the capital of the Sardinian dominions, in a beautiful plain, on the Po, 80 miles from Milan. It is of an oblong form, with a circumference of about 4 miles. Its citadel and other fortifications were demolished by the French, after the battle of Marengo. The entrance from the west has an air of elegance, which announces the seat of royalty. The streets in general are wide and straight, intersecting each other at right angles, and running in direct lines from one extremity of the city to the other. Several of them have at the sides arcades or piazzas. The principal square, near the centre of the town, ranks, both for its size and beauty, among the most elegant of Europe. On one of its sides stands the royal palace; in the centre is the structure erected by the dukes of Savoy, now converted into a royal picture-gallery. On three of the sides of the square are arcades, as in the Palais Royal at Paris. The Piazza di St. Carolo, though smaller, is entitled to notice, its façades being uniform, and its two longer sides having arcades supported by pillars. There are various public walks in the vicinity, much frequented. The materials of the public buildings consist of marble of every vein and colour. The cathedral is an old Gothic edifice, remarkable for nothing but its marble cupola. The church of Corpus Domini is very richly ornamented. Other churches claim attention only from their size, their pillars, or the variety of marble employed in their construction. The Castello Reale and Palazzo Carignano are both buildings of interest. The university contains a court surrounded with arcades, covered with inscriptions and antique bas-reliefs. It has a library of 110,000 volumes. The opera, or principal theatre, is of great size; and its hospitals are richly endowed. Besides these, there are a school for youths of rank, a lyceum, a seminary for the education of clergymen, and agricultural and veterinary schools. Manf. These comprise woollens, cotton, leather, and stoneware; also silk stuffs, damask, and velvet. The smaller articles made here are liqueurs, chocolate, works in marble, wood, and wax: in one of the suburbs is a government manufactory of saltpetre and gunpowder, tobacco and snuff; also paper-mills on a large scale. Pop. 140,000.—The foundation of Turin is of very remote date, Hannibal having found on its site a town, which he sacked. It was successively occupied during the last war by the French and Austrians, and remained in possession of Napoleon I. till 1814. Under his empire, it was the capital of the department of the Po.

TURKESTAN, or TARTARY, toor-kis-tan', the name often given to an extensive region of Central Asia, the original or acquired seat of the great Tartar race called Turks or Toorks. Lat. between 30° and 50° N. Lon. between 50° and 82° E.

TURKESTAN, CHINESE, forms the W. portion of the Chinese empire, and includes Dzoungaria. Area. Unascertained. The country is little known to Europeans. Lat. between 30° and 50° N. Lon. between 22° 30′ and 100° E.

TURKESTAN, INDEPENDENT, a region of Central Asia, separated on the E. from Chinese Turkestan by the Pamir table-land, and having on its N. Western Siberia, on the W. the Caspian Sea, and on the S. Persia and Afghanistan. Area. Estimated at 721,000 square miles. Pop. Supposed to be about 4,000,000. Lat. between 31° and 50° N. Lon. between 51° and 75° E.

TURKEY, tur'-ke, an extensive empire, extending over the south-east of Europe and the contiguous parts of Asia and Africa. It, nominally at least, comprises the Hedjaz in Arabia, and Egypt, Nubia, and the beylics of Tripoli and Tunis in Africa. Its administrative divisions are not well defined, and subject to frequent changes. The grand divisions by which it is known in geography are Turkey in Europe and Turkey in Asia.

TURKEY IN EUROPE is bounded on the N. by the southern limits of the Russian and Austrian dominions, E. by the Black Sea and the Bosphorus, S. by Greece and the Sea of Marmora, and W. by the Adriatic. Political Divisions. These are, by the Turks, divided into thirty-six governments, called Eyalets, fifteen of which are in Europe, eighteen in Asia, and three in Africa. More comprehensively, however, these may be recognized as nine provinces; named Roumelia, Thessaly, Albania, Herzegovina, and Montenegro, Bosnia, inclusive of Turkish Croatia, Bulgaria, Servia, Wallachia, and Moldavia. The three last are called the Danubian principalities, with Montenegro little more than nominally belonging to Turkey. Seas. The Black, the Sea of Marmora, the Adriatic, and the Ionian. The gulfs are those of Cassandra, Salonica, Monte Santo, and Contessa; the Straits those of the Bosphorus and the Dardanelles; and the channel of Otranto connects the Ionian and Adriatic seas. Islands. Candia, Imbro, Stalimene, Samothrace, and Thaso. Area, 200,000 square miles. Desc. Mountainous in general. It is traversed from east to west by the Balkan chain, the eastern half of which is the ancient Hæmus. This great range is connected with the Carpathians by a chain which, running northward, separates Servia from Bulgaria. On the south side it sends out two secondary ranges, one of which traverses Albania, while the other, longer in its course, extends even through Greece, and terminates in the extremity of the Morea. The principal mountains, besides the Balkan, are the Despoto Dagh, or Rhodope, in the S., Pindus in the S.W., the Dinaric Alps in the W., and the Carpathians in the N. Whatever may be the heights of the mountains of Turkey, however, none of them seems to have reached the limit of perpetual snow. Rivers. The Danube with its tributaries, the Drin, the Pruth, the Sereth, the Aluta, the Morava, and the Save. These are in the N., with some other smaller streams. On the south side of the Hæmus range, the outlet is the Archipelago, and the principal rivers that flow into it are the Marizza and the Vardar, the Hebrus and the Strymon of the ancients. Of the rivers in the west, the principal are the Drin, the Narenta, the Vardari; in Albania, the largest is the Achelous. Lakes. Not numerous, and the largest are those of Ochrida and Scutari in the W. Climate. Salubrious, and not very warm when latitude is taken into consideration. Forests. Extensive on the mountains. Zoology. The wolf, the bear, the jackall, the wild boar, and the deer. Pro. The products of the maritime districts of Turkey in Europe are sufficiently known; but we have no minute acquaintance with the botany of the interior. In regard to fruit, chestnuts, apples, and pears, are found only in the northern provinces. The southern produce oranges, raisins, olives, figs, and almonds. The grape succeeds in almost every part of the empire; the pomegranate and the sugarcane only in its southern and warmest districts. Wheat, maize, rice, cotton, silk, and tobacco, are all indigenous to the country. Cattle and horses are reared in almost every part of the empire. The goat is useful in the mountains; the ass and mule are as those of Italy. Minerals. Unimportant, except iron: it has mines of salt, lead, and marble, however. Manf. Almost entirely domestic, comprising fire-arms, woollen and cotton stuffs, shawls, leather, with dyeing and printing works. Brandy-distilling is also common throughout the country. Rel. Mahomedanism, of the sect of Omar. The rule of faith is the Koran, an incongruous mixture of sound and absurd doctrines, of grave and of trifling precepts. Fasts are frequent and rigorous; the injunctions in the principal one (the Ramadan) being to taste neither food nor drink while the sun remains above the horizon. The great majority, however, are followers of the Greek Church. Education. Deficient. The lower ranks are almost devoid of education: learning is confined to law and theology, which have here a close connection; for the lawyer must be skilled in the Koran, and the divine learned in the law. In philosophy and literature they have made little progress; and in the arts, whether useful or ornamental, they are equally backward. Pop. [illegible]ds of 350,000. This estimate is given for the whole of the Ottoman empire. Navy. Considerable, but [illegible]-manned. Previous to the Russian war of 1853, it comprised 6 ships of the line, 10 frigates, 6 corvettes, 14 brigs, 6 steam-frigates, 16 cutters and schooners, and 12 smaller vessels, manned by 35,000 seamen and 4,000 marines. Many of these, however, foundered in the Black Sea, and others were sunk at Sinope. Rev. The public revenue of Turkey is derived partly from a capitation tax on Christians and Jews, partly from duties on tobacco and other articles of consumption. The amount of the whole is about £3,000,000 sterling, and the objects to which it is applied are the army, the navy, the fortifications, and a part of the household of the sultan. Gov. Despotic, the power of the sultan being only virtually restrained by the ordinances of the Koran, and the decisions of the ulema and the mufti, and also by certain usages. But neither these ordinances nor usages protect the property of individuals in the service of the state. To this the sultan is heir in the eye of the law, and may exercise his power over their lives and properties without any dread of general discontent. The grand vizier, or prime minister, is, by his office, commander of the forces. The divan, or cabinet council, was formerly composed of six pachas, of the first character for experience; but Selim III. changed its constitution, and it is now limited. Another minister is the reis effendi, whose office corresponds in part to that of the chancellor, in part to that of the secretary for foreign affairs in Britain. The pachas, or governors of provinces, are charged not only with the civil and military, but, by a strange mixture of powers, act as farmers-general of the revenue for their respective provinces. A waywode is merely the governor of a provincial town, or of one of the districts which do not belong to any pachalic; and sangiac beys are the governors of districts under the pachas, and invested, like them, with both civil and military functions. There is, in Turkey, hardly any hereditary nobility, and very little distinction of rank, but what arises from holding a public office. Yet the emirs and scheriffs who can trace their genealogy to Mahomet, like the descendants of the celebrated viziers, Ibrahim Khan Oglou and Achmed Kiuprili, enjoy certain privileges. The ulema are a numerous and respectable body, whose functions consist in expounding the Koran, and in applying its injunctions to the circumstances of the times. They thus combine the character of clergy and lawyers, having at their head the grand mufti, whose decrees are considered by the public as the voice of inspiration, though necessarily accommodated to the will of the court. The imans or priests are a body altogether inferior to, and distinct from, the ulema, their duty being merely to perform public worship in the mosques; but every law promulgated by the sultan, must be sanctioned by an act of approbation from the mufti. Pop. 35,400,000. This embraces the whole inhabitants of the Ottoman empire. Lat. between 39° and 48° 20′ N. Lon. between 15° 40′ and 29° 30′ E. (See ADRIANOPLE, BOSNIA, CONSTANTINOPLE, and other relative articles.)

TURKEY IN ASIA is bounded on the E. by Persia, on the W. by the Mediterranean, on the N. by the Black Sea and the Sea of Marmora, and on the S. by the Persian Gulf and Arabia. Political Divisions. These consist of Anatolia, or Asia Minor, Armenia, Kurdistan, Mesopotamia, or Al Gezirch, Irak Arabi, with Syria, including Palestine. Islands. These, in the Archipelago, comprise Mitylene, Nicaria, Scio, Samos, Patmos, Rhodes, and Scarpanto, with Cyprus in the Mediterranean. Area. Estimated at about 450,000 square miles. Desc. Diversified with a soil and climate presenting many varieties. The summits of Taurus are covered with snow, whilst their sides are clad with the vegetation of temperate regions, and their valleys below producing the fruits of tropical countries. In the south are arid plains of vast extent; but on the banks of the rivers fertility abounds. Rivers. The Euphrates, the Tigris, and their affluents, which fall into the Persian Gulf; the Yeshil-Irmak and Kizil-Irmak, which flow N. to the Black Sea; the Meander and the Sarabat to the Archipelago; the Jordan to the Dead Sea; and the Jihoon, Sihun, and the Aasay to the Mediterranean. Lakes. The principal are Van and the Dead Sea. Pro. Silk, which is extensively cultivated, oil, medicinal plants, gums, wax, dried fruits, gall-nuts, cotton, wool, goat's hair, leeches, and sponges. The soil is capable of producing all kinds of grain, but agriculture is in a wretched state. Minerals. Every kind are to be found in the mountains. Manf. Increasing; silk, fine cotton, sword-blades, firearms, Turkey leather, and dyeing are followed. Exp. Silk, fruits, drugs, and Turkey leather. Imp. Coffee from Arabia, and manufactured goods from Europe; but internal communication is defective, there being few roads and canals. The canal is the great means of transport. Lat. between 39° and 48° 20′ N. Lon. between 15° 40′ and 29° 30′ E. (See ASIA MINOR, ARMENIA, NATOLIA, BAGDAD, CARAMANIA, ERZEROUM, KURDISTAN, DAMASCUS, MESOPOTAMIA, PALESTINE, SYRIA, and TREBIZONDE.) The earliest notice of the Turks or Turkmans, in history, is about the year 800, when, issuing from an obscure retreat, they obtained possession of a part of Armenia, called from them Turcomania. They afterwards extended their conquests over the adjacent parts of Asia, Africa, and Europe, occupying Syria, Egypt, and eventually the territory that remained to the Greek emperors. In 1453 Constantinople was taken by Mahomet II. The Morea and the islands were afterwards overrun, with parts of Hungary, the Crimea, and the shores of the Black Sea. They next took the whole of the countries now forming Turkey in Asia, the Hedjas in Egypt, and the regencies of Tripoli, Tunis, and Algiers. In the 17th century their power declined. The Austrians expelled them from Hungary, and Russia stripped them of much of their territory. The Greeks formed an independent state; and the French have taken Algiers; the Danubian principalities are under the influence of Russia, and many of the provinces of Asia Minor, Arabia, and Egypt, have been wrested from them. In 1853 Moldavia and Wallachia were invaded by the Russians, when the Porte declared war against the Czar. In this struggle he was assisted by the British, French, and Sardinians, and the result was the final defeat of the Russians. (See CRIMEA, SEVASTOPOL, &c.)

TURKHEIM. (See TURCKHEIM.)

TURKHEIM, toork'-hime, a town of Bavaria, on the Wertach, 25 miles from Augsburg. It has a convent and a castle. Pop. 2,000. Also the name of two contiguous villages of Wurtemberg, on the Neckar, 3 miles from Stuttgart. Pop. 3,000.

TURNEBUS, Adrian, tur'-ne-bus, a learned French professor, whose French name was Tournebœuf, which some writers maintain was a translation of Turnbull; further declaring him to have been the son of a Scotchman settled in Normandy. He became professor of Greek at Paris, and superintendent of the royal press for works in that language. He wrote notes on Cicero, Varro, Thucydides, and Plato; pieces against Ramus; translations from Aristotle, Theophrastus, Plutarch, Plato, &c.; and Latin poems. But the most important of his works is his "Adversaria." B. at Les Andelys, Normandy, 1512; D. at Paris, 1565.

TURNER, William, tur'-ner, an eminent English physician and divine, who became a preacher, and travelled over the kingdom to propagate the Protestant doctrines, for which Bishop Gardiner sent him to prison. On his release, he went abroad, and took his doctor's degree at Ferrara. At the accession of Edward VI. he returned, and was made dean of Wells. When Mary came to the throne, he went into exile, and did not return till after her death. Queen Elizabeth restored him to his preferments. He wrote a treatise on the Baths of England and Germany; "A Complete Herbal, or History of Plants;" "Historia de Naturis Herbarum;" and some other botanical works. B. at Morpeth, Northumberland, 1520; D. 1568.

TURNER, Thomas, a pious English divine, who became fellow of St. John's College, Oxford. In 1629 he obtained a canon residentiaryship in St. Paul's Cathedral, and was appointed chaplain to Charles I., whom he accompanied to Scotland. In 1641 he was made dean of Rochester, and soon after dean of Canterbury, of which he was deprived at the Revolution. He recovered his preferments at the Restoration. B. 1591; D. 1672.

TURNER, Francis, an English prelate, and son of the preceding. He became prebendary of St. Paul's, dean of Windsor, and in 1683 bishop of Rochester; whence, the year following, he was translated to Ely. He was one of the seven bishops sent to the Tower by James II., and was deprived at the Revolution, for refusing the oaths. He was the author of some sermons, pious poems, and the "Life of Mr. Nicholas Ferrar." D. 1700.

TURNER, Dawson, an eminent modern English botanist, who became fellow of the Royal and Linnæan societies, and produced, among other valuable works, "A Synopsis of the British Fuci;" "History of the Fuci;" "Tour in Normandy;" "Sepulchral Reminiscences of Yarmouth;" "The Botanist's Guide through England and Wales;" and a treatise upon Irish mosses, under the title of "Muscologiæ Hibernicæ Spicilegium." B. towards the close of the 18th century.

TURNER, Edward, of eminent modern Scotch chemist, who studied medicine at Edinburgh, and took his M.D. degree there. At the establishment of the London University, in 1828, he was nominated professor of chemistry at the new seat of learning. He wrote a valuable work, called "The Elements of Chemistry," and contributed some articles upon mineralogy to the "Penny Cyclopædia." Much esteemed by his pupils, they, after his death, subscribed for a marble bust to commemorate his worth. This memorial was placed in the library of the college. B. in Scotland, 1798; D. in London, 1837.

TURNER, Joseph Mallord William, a celebrated English landscape-painter, who was the son of a barber in London. In early youth he evinced the strongest inclination for pictorial art, and so successfully did he labour in his vocation, that, even in his 30th year, he was acknowledged as the first of living English landscape-painters. At that period, 1805, it was written of him: "Turner may be considered as a striking instance of how much may be gained by industry, if accompanied by perseverance, even without the assistance of a master. The way he acquired his professional powers was by borrowing where he could a drawing or a picture to copy, or by making a sketch of any one in the Exhibition early in the morning, and finishing it up at home. By such practices, and by patient perseverance, he has overcome all the difficulties of the art." He exhibited his first picture at the Royal Academy in 1787, in his 12th year; and from this period until his death, he sent, besides others to the British Institution, 259 pictures to the same place. Many of these works were of the most ambitious character; and included in the list were some reproductions of nature of marvellous skill and beauty. In 1799 he was elected associate, and, three years afterwards, academician. In 1807 he was appointed professor of perspective. Delighting in measuring his strength against the great master of landscape-painting, Claude, he, in 1808, began a series of sketches in professed rivalry with him, entitled "Liber Studiorum." Many other celebrated engravings were also executed from his designs, the principal being, "Scenery of the Southern Coast;" illustrations to Rogers's "Italy," and to the poems of Byron; "Rivers of England," "Rivers of France," and "The Shipwreck." Ever progressing, he commenced by imitating Gainsborough, Wilson, and other English painters; afterwards followed Claude and Gaspar Poussin; till, finally, he threw off all signs of pupillage, and appeared as a bold, original, and unrivalled painter and colorist. Ruskin, his most enthusiastic admirer, speaking of these changes of manner, says: "There has been a marked and constant progress in his mind: he has not been like some few artists, without childhood; his course of study has been as evidently as it has been swiftly progressive; and in different stages of the struggle, sometimes one order of truth, sometimes another, has been aimed at or omitted. As he advanced, the previous knowledge or attainment was absorbed in what succeeded, or abandoned only if incompatible, and never abandoned without a gain; and his last works present the sum and perfection of his accumulated knowledge, delivered with the impatience and passion of one who feels too much and knows too much, and has too little time to say it in, to pause for expression, or ponder over his syllables." Of a reserved and unsocial disposition, he stood aloof from artistic and other society, and, during his lifetime, it used to be said that he was absorbed with a love of money. After his decease, however, it was found that he had bequeathed the whole of his pictures and drawings to the nation, and, as he had been in the habit of repurchasing the best of his earliest works as they came to be offered for sale, and had, moreover, refused, for years before his death, to part with his finest productions, the gift was indeed a munificent one. His funded property he left to be applied to the purpose of founding an asylum for decayed artists at Twickenham. The will having been, unfortunately, informal in several respects, a chancery suit was the result; but the matter was compromised by his next of kin taking the engravings and other property; one hundred of his finest oil-paintings, and several hundreds of drawings and sketches, becoming the property of the nation. These last were arranged for exhibition by Mr. Ruskin, and, together with his pictures, they may be viewed at the Gallery of British Art, in the South Kensington Museum. Turner died in an obscure lodging on the banks of the Thames, at Chelsea, where he had for a short time resided under an assumed name. His remains lie in the crypt of St. Paul's Cathedral, near the ashes of Reynolds, Wilkie, and other great luminaries of the English school of pictorial art. B. in London, 1775; D. at Chelsea, 1851.

TURNER, Sharon, an English historical writer, who practised as an attorney in London; but, from an early period of his life, devoted his leisure to historical researches. In 1799 he produced the first volume of his "History of the Anglo-Saxons;" in which work, the most valuable of all his publications, he set the example to historians of finding materials in the valuable records written in the Anglo-Saxon tongue. Encouraged by the success of this work, he made a continuation of it, and completed his history from the earliest period down to the death of Queen Elizabeth. He retired from business in 1829, and in his retreat wrote "Sacred History of the World, as displayed in the Creation and subsequent Events to the Deluge;" "Sacred Meditations of a Layman;" "Richard III.," a poem; and several articles for the "Quarterly Review." B. in London, 1768; D. in the same city, 1847.

TURNER, Thomas Hudson, a modern English writer upon antiquities, who was brought up to the trade of a printer, but was subsequently engaged in the Record Office of the Tower, and was afterwards appointed secretary to the Archæological Institute. His most important works were,—"Some Account of Domestic Architecture in England," "Early Household Expences," and a number of papers contributed to the Journal of the Society of Archæologists and that of the Society of Antiquaries at Newcastle. He likewise assisted Mr. Tyrrel, remembrancer of London, in collecting materials for a history of the English metropolis. B. in London, 1815; D. 1852.

TURNHAM GREEN, a hamlet of England, in Middlesex, on the road to Brentford, 8 miles from St. Paul's Cathedral, London.

TURNHOUT, toorn'-hout, a well-built town of Belgium, in the province of Antwerp. It stands in a wide heath, and has manufactures of carpets, linens, lace, paper; with oil, bleaching, dyeing, and brick works. Pop. 13,500.

TURPIN, or TILPIN (Latin TURPINUS), toor'-pĭn, a French monk of the Benedictine order, who gained the favour of Charlemagne, and was, by him, created archbishop of Rheims, in 773. He is held by some writers to have been the author of a poetical romance in Latin, founded upon the expedition of Charlemagne against the Moors in Spain. Flourished at the end of the 8th century.

TURPIN DE CRISSÉ, Lancelot, a French writer upon military science, who, at an early age, entered the army, and, after signalizing himself in the campaigns in Germany and Italy, attained the grade of brigadier-general. About 1753 he quitted the army, and, after remaining for a short time in the abbey of La Trappe, entered, in 1754, upon a literary career, with the publication of a work entitled "Literary and Philosophical Amusements of Two Friends." His most important work, "An Essay on the Art of War," was put forth shortly afterwards, and, attracting considerable attention amongst military men, was translated into English, and, at the order of Frederick the Great, into German. In 1757 he resumed his profession as a soldier, and after being appointed lieutenant-general, was, in 1781, created governor of Fort Scarpe, in Douay. He subsequently produced "Commentaries upon the Institutions of Vegetius," and "Notes on Cæsar," which was founded upon Clarke and Wailly. At the outburst of the French revolution, he retired to Germany, where he is supposed to have died; but the date has not been ascertained. B. in La Beauce, about 1715.

TURRIFF, tur'-rif, a town of Scotland, Aberdeenshire, on a rivulet, about one mile above its confluence with the Doveron, and 9 miles from Banff. Manf. Linen yarn, thread, brown linens, and coarse stockings. Pop. 2,000.

TURSHEEZ, toor-sheez', a city of Korassan, in Persia, situate on the borders of the Great Salt Desert, 75 miles from Mushed. It imports indigo and other drugs, wool, cloth, and rice. The chief export is iron. Pop. Unascertained.

TURTLE BAY, ter'-tel, lies on the W. coast of Africa, Benguela, Lower Guinea.—Also an ISLAND of the Feejee group, in the Pacific Ocean.—A GROUP OF ISLETS in the Sea of Banda.—A LAKE near the source of the Mississippi, N. America.—A RIVER forming an affluent of the Upper Mississippi.

TURTON, ter'-ton, a chapelry of Lancashire, 5 miles from Great Bolton. Manf. Cotton-spinning, bleaching, and calico-printing. Pop. 4,200.

TURYASSU, too-re-as'-soo, a river of Brazil, forming the boundary-line between Para and Maranham. After a course of 350 miles, it falls into the Atlantic at the Bay of Turyassu.

TUSAPAN, too-sa-pan', a ruined city of the Mexican Confederation, in the state of Vera Cruz, 35 miles from Papantla. Pop. Unascertained. It has a pyramid with a base of 30 feet square.

TUSCALOOSA, tus-ka-loo'-sa, a city of the United States, N. America, the capital of the state of Alabama, 67 miles from Cahawba. About a mile from it is the university of Alabama. Pop. 3,500.—Also a COUNTY of the United States, with an area of 1,500 square miles and a population of 20,000, of whom a third are slaves.

TUSCANY, tus'-ca-ne (in Italian TOSCANA, tos-ka'-na), a state hitherto known as a grand-duchy of Italy, in the central part of the peninsula, having on its N.E. and S. the Pontifical states, or States of the Church, and on its W. that part of the Mediterranean called the Tuscan or Tyrrhenian Sea. Divisions. These comprise the prefectures of Florence, Pisa, Sienna, Arezzo, Grosseto, Lucca, the government of Leghorn, and the island of Elba. Area, 9,000 square miles. Desc. Pleasantly diversified with hill, valley, and plain. The Apennines, entering at its northern extremity, traverse it in a south-east direction. Besides the principal chain of this range, there are several smaller ranges extending in different directions, and declining in height as they approach the sea. The highest summit is Monte Falterona, in which the Arno has its rise, and which has an elevation of 5,560 feet above the level of the sea. Rivers. The principal are the Arno, the Ombrone, the Serchio, and the Chiana. The canal of Chiana unites this river with the Arno. There are various other streams of inferior note. The Tiber takes its rise in the E. part of Tuscany. Lakes. None of any extent; but there are numerous pools and marshes. Climate. The country is protected from extreme heat by the Apennines on the north and east, and by the Mediterranean on the west. Some parts of the low country are, however, liable to excessive heat. The sky is serene, the winter is severe only in the high-lying tracts, and the country is healthy, except in the Maremna, a marshy district lying along the S. coast, and covering nearly a sixth part of the superficies of the state. Here malaria is so bad, and fevers so prevalent, that it is nearly deserted. Pro. The valley of the Arno is called the garden of Italy; but agriculture is very imperfectly pursued. Wheat, maize, beans, pease, are the principal crops. A variety of vegetables are produced, also clover and other artificial grasses. The fruits are vines, olives, oranges, lemons, and figs. Rice is raised in marshy districts, particularly on level tracts adjoining the sea. The wine of Tuscany is in general fair, and the annual produce of olive or Florence oil is considerable. Raw silk is exported, and pasturage is good. The breed of horses is wretched; that of mules, asses, goats, and swine, is tolerable. The horned cattle are, as in Lombardy, kept up by regular importations from Switzerland. Sheep are numerous in the mountainous districts, but their wool is in general coarse, although the breeds are excellent. Minerals. Abundant. The island of Elba contains iron-mines; and on particular spots of the mainland there are mines of copper, lead, and quicksilver: in the Apennines are marble, alabaster, crystal, and rock salt; while borax is plentifully supplied from the borax lagoons of Volterra. Manf. Silks, which are excellent; coarse woollens, paper, glass, crystal, porcelain, and articles in marble, alabaster, brass, iron, and coral. The straw-hat manufacture is still followed, but has greatly declined. Exp. Olive-oil, straw hats, borax, rags, hides, wool, hemp, potash, coral, tallow, marble, paper, and building timber. Imp. British manufactures, colonial goods, grain, French, German, and Swiss manufactures, with salt-fish. Gov. The form of government was formerly an absolute monarchy, but in 1848 a representative constitution was obtained. The seat of government is at Florence. Education. Widely diffused, and the dialect is considered the purest Italian spoken. Florence, Pisa, and Susa, are the seats of its universities. Pop. 1,820,000. Lat. between 42° 22′ and 44° 30′ N. Lon. between 9° 45′ and 12° 22′ E.—Tuscany is familiar to the readers of ancient history under the names of Etruria and Tyrrhenia. It was overrun by the barbarians in the 5th century. Held at first as a duchy and fief of Lombardy, it was afterwards ruled by the family of the Medicis, and on their extinction, by a younger branch of the family of Austria. It was declared by Napoleon I. an integral part of the French empire; but on his downfall in 1814, it was restored to the archduke Ferdinand. On the 20th of August, 1860, the National Assembly at Florence unanimously voted its annexation to Piedmont, amid the acclamations of "Viva il Rè!"

TUSCARAWAS, tus-ca-raw'-as, a county of the United States, in the state of Ohio. Area, 705 square miles. Pop. 32,000.

TUSKAR ROCKS, tus'-kar, four rocks off the S.E. coast of Ireland, Wexford, with a lighthouse 101 feet high. Lat. 52° 11′ N. Lon. 6° 12′ W.

TUSSER, Thomas, tus'-ser, an English writer, who produced, in verse, a treatise upon agriculture, entitled "Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry." It is a curious picture of the agriculture of his time. D. in London, about 1580.

TUSTEREN, toos'-te-ren, an island off the W. coast of Norway, immediately to the E. of Christiansand. Ext. 12 miles long, with a breadth of 6. Pop. Unascertained.

TUTANA. (See TOTANA.)

TUTBURY, tut'-ber-re, a market-town of Staffordshire, on the Dove, over which is a stone bridge, 5 miles from Burton-on-Trent. It is noted for its ancient castle, one of the most famous in England, but now in ruins. The unfortunate Mary queen of Scots was confined for some time in it. It was also a former residence of the Mercian kings, and, afterwards, of the earls and dukes of Lancaster. The parish church, a large massive building, constitutes a portion of the old priory church. The town contains an excellent free school. The principal business of the inhabitants formerly consisted of wool-stapling, but it has now glass-works and a cotton-factory. Pop. 1,000.

TUTTLINGEN, toot'-tling-en, a town of Wurtemberg, on the Danube, 20 miles from Sigmaringen. Manf. Woollen, linen, silken fabrics, and paper. Pop. 5,200.

TUY, twe, an ancient town of Spain, in Galicia, on a rising ground, at the foot of which flows the Minho, 26 miles from Pontevedra. It is surrounded by good ramparts, and has a citadel and a cathedral. Manf. Table linens, hats, leather, and liqueurs. Pop. 4,300.

TUY, a river of the Caraccas, in the province of Venezuela, falling into the Caribbean Sea, 60 miles from Caraccas. Total course, 90 miles.

TUZ-GHIEUL, tooz'-ge-ul, a large salt lake of Asia Minor, in the centre of the pashalic of Caramania. Ext. 45 miles long and about 15 broad. It has a height of 2,500 feet above the level of the sea, and in summer its bed is wholly dry.

TVER, twair, one of the central governments of European Russia, lying between the governments of Moscow and Novgorod. Area, 26 square miles. Desc. It has a more elevated surface than most parts of Russia, but its soil is generally poor; and here the Volga, the Tverza, the Mologa, and the Meduevitza, have their rise. Pro. Large quantities of hemp, flax, and beans. Forests are extensive, and cattle for consumption are mostly imported. Manf. Bricks, glass wares, woollen cloths, dyeing materials, spirits, and leather. Pop. 1,327,800. Lat. between 56° and 59° N. Lon. between 32° and 38° 20′ E.

TVER, a city of European Russia, the capital of a government and an archbishop's see, at the confluence of the Tverza, the Volga, and the Tmaka, 100 miles from Moscow. These rivers divide the town into four parts, united by three bridges; the one over the Volga being of boats, that it may be removed during winter. Tver having, in 1763, been consumed by fire, was rebuilt on a prescribed model, and, in consequence, is the most regular city in the empire, after St. Petersburg and Moscow. The houses are of brick, stuccoed white, and have an elegant appearance. There are also several handsome squares. The chief public buildings are the cathedral, which is old, and in the Gothic style; numerous other churches, the palace, the courts of justice, the government offices, the hospital, a barracks, theatre, seminary, and various schools. Manf. Various; comprising linen, wax, leather, candles, and hardware. Standing as it does, however, on the high road between Moscow and St. Petersburg, it is an entrepôt for goods destined for the capital. Pop. about 50,000.—This place was the capital of a principality from 1240 to 1490.

TWEED, tweed, a large river of Scotland and England, rising in Peeblesshire, and draining almost all the E. portion of the Scottish lowlands. It takes a course nearly north-east, being augmented by a number of small streams, and, after a course of 95 miles, enters the North Sea at Berwick. Its salmon-fisheries are valuable.

TWEEDDALE, twee'-dale, the popular name of Peeblesshire.

TWEEDMOUTH, tweed'-mouth, a parish and village of Northumberland, on the right bank of the Tweed, opposite Berwick. Pop. 5,500.—It has a station on the Newcastle and Berwick Railway.

TWEEDSMUIR, tweede'-muir, a parish of Peeblesshire, Scotland, in which large numbers of Cheviot sheep are pastured. Pop. 230.

TWENTY-FOUR PERGUNNAHS, per-gun'-na, a district of British India, in the presidency of Bengal. Area, 1,200 square miles. Desc. Its surface is little elevated, but is traversed by numerous streams and watercourses. In the E. it is covered with jungle, which is tenanted by tigers, hyenas, hogs, and deer. Pop. about 200,000: this is exclusive of Calcutta. Lat. between 21° 55′ and 22° 48′ N. Lon. between 88° 6′ and 88° 43′ E.

TWICKENHAM, twik'-en-ham, a village of Middlesex, on the Thames, immediately opposite Richmond, 12 miles from London. It is adorned with many handsome seats and villas, the principal of which was that of the celebrated Pope. The church is a fine Doric building. Pop. 6,260.—It is the burying-place of Pope and his parents. Twickenham Ait, or Eel-Pie House, on an island in the Thames, is a favourite resort of holiday visitors from London.

TWIGGS, twigs, a county of the United States, in Georgia. Area, 390 square miles. Pop. 9,000.

TWINING, Thomas, twi'-ning, a learned English divine, rector of St. Mary's, Chichester. He published a translation of the "Poetics" of Aristotle. B. 1734; D. at Chichester, 1804.

TWINING, William, an English surgeon, who served with the British army in different parts of the world, and, in 1830, became surgeon to the civil hospital at Calcutta. He was the author of a work upon the diseases of Bengal, which is of great authority. D. at Calcutta, 1835.

TWISS, William, twiss, an English Presbyterian divine, who was president of the assembly of divines at Westminster, and was made rector of St. Andrew's, Holborn. He wrote a number of works upon religious matters, strongly Calvinistic in tone. D. 1645.

TWIZEL, or TWISEL, twiz'-el, a hamlet of Northumberland, 8 miles from Morpeth. Pop. 340. Here the vanguard of the English crossed the river Till on their march to Flodden-field.

TWOFOLD BAY, too'-fold, an inlet on the E. coast of Australia, in the county of Auckland, 30 miles from Cape Howe. Lat. 37° 6′ 2″ S. Lon. 149° 58′ 2″ E. Port-Boyd-town, on its S. shore, is resorted to by steamers, emigrant-ships, and whaling vessels.

TWO-LICK CREEK, too'-lik, a river of the United States, in Indiana county, Pennsylvania.

TWO SICILIES, KINGDOM OF THE. (See NAPLES—SICILY.)

TWY, too'-e, a river of Wales, in Cardiganshire, falling into the Irish Channel.

TWYFORD, twi'-ford, the name of several parishes of England, none of them with a population above 1,400.

TYCHSEN, Olaus Gerard, tike'-sen, a learned orientalist, who was the son of a tailor; but having displayed great abilities in his youth, he was enabled by some benevolent patrons to prosecute his studies at Gottingen, Halle, and other seats of learning. He subsequently became chief librarian and curator of the museum, and professor of oriental literature at Rostock. His principal work, consisting of essays upon Biblical literature, was entitled "Leisure Hours at Butzow." B. at Tondern, Schleswig, 1734; D. at Rostock, 1815.

TYCHSEN, Thomas Christian, a celebrated orientalist, who, after travelling in France, Spain, and Italy, was, in 1784, nominated professor of theology at the university of Gottingen. His most important works were,—"Manual of the History of the Jews," and an Arabic grammar. B. at Horsbyll, Schleswig, 1758; D. at Gottingen, 1834.

TYCHO BRAHE. (See BRAHE.)

TYCOCKTOW ISLAND, ti-kok-tow', in the Canton river, China. Ext. 8 miles long, with a breadth of 6. It bounds the outer and the inner waters at the entrance of the Bocca Tigris.—In 1841 the British took the forts of this place.

TYDEUS, tyd'-e-us, a son of Œneus, king of Calydon, fled, after the accidental murder of one of his friends, to the court of Adrastus, king of Argos, whose daughter Deiphyle he married. He slew 50 Thebans who had lain in ambush to surprise him; only one escaping to bear the tidings of the fate of his companions. The savage barbarity of Tydeus, exercised on the dead body of Menalippus, whom he had slain, displeased Minerva, who intended to make him immortal; the goddess left him to his fate, and suffered him to die. He was father of Diomedes.

TYE, Christopher, ti, an English musician, who was admitted to the degree of doctor in music at Cambridge in 1545. Dr. Tye was instructor in music to Edward VI., and organist of the royal chapel in the reign of Elizabeth. He composed a number of anthems. B. in London, and flourished in the 16th century.

TYERS, Thomas, ti'-ers, a miscellaneous writer, who was educated for the legal profession, but never practised. He became proprietor of Vauxhall gardens, and was greatly esteemed by Dr. Johnson. He wrote "Supposed Conferences between Eminent Characters, political and literary;" and some poems. D. 1787.

TYKOCZIN, te'-ko-chin, a town of Poland, on the Narew, 17 miles W. Bialystock. It has an ancient castle. Pop. 2,000.—Here, in 1831, a battle took place between the Russians and Poles.

TYLER, ti'-ler, a county of the United States, in the north-west part of Virginia, formed, in 1814, from a part of Ohio county. Area, 370 square miles. Pop. 6,000.

TYNAN, ti'-năn, a parish of Ulster, Ireland, 7 miles from Armagh. Pop. 7,500.

TYNDALE, or TINDALE, William, tin'-dal, an eminent English divine, who was educated at Magdalen Hall, Oxford. Having embraced the doctrines of the Reformers, he went to Antwerp, where he printed a translation of the Scriptures in English. This being sent over to London, all the copies were bought up; on which Tyndale revised his work, and printed a larger impression. The work exciting the hatred of the Romish clergy, he was apprehended as a heretic, strangled, and burnt near Antwerp, in 1536.

TYNE, tine, a river of Scotland, in Haddingtonshire, rising in the county of Mid-Lothian, and, after a N.E. course of nearly 30 miles, falling into the sea 2 miles N. of Dunbar.

TYNE, the chief river of Northumberland. It consists of two branches, which unite near Nether Warden, above Hexham, and form a large river, flowing to Newcastle, to which town it is navigable for vessels of from 300 to 400 tons. It is of great commercial importance, and drains an area of 1,100 square miles. After a course of 80 miles, it falls into the North Sea by the estuary at its mouth.

TYNEMOUTH, tine'-muth, a town of Northumberland, at the mouth of the river Tyne, about a mile below North Shields, with which it is united. It is chiefly noted for its ancient castle and priory, situate on a high rock, and inaccessible from the sea. Little remains of this ancient bulwark, except a strong gateway, the approach to which is flanked with bastions, and which serves for a barracks and military magazines. The monastery was within the castle; and still presents many elegant remains of architecture. Tynemouth, from its exposed situation, is extremely bleak and uncomfortable in the winter season, but is much resorted to for sea-bathing during the summer. Good lodgings may be procured, and commodious baths have been erected; and there are delightful walks in the neighbourhood. Pop. of township of Tynemouth, about 15,000.

TYPHŒUS, ti-phe'-us, a giant, the son of Tartarus and Terra. He had a hundred heads, and cast forth flames from as many mouths, and was of an extraordinary stature. He was one of the leaders of the giants who ascended to Olympus; but Jupiter launched against him his thunderbolts, and, casting him back to the earth, buried him beneath Mount Etna. He was the parent of Geryon and Cerberus.

TYPHON, ti'-fon, a giant whom Juno produced by striking the earth.—A brother of Osiris, whom he murdered. He was reckoned among the Egyptians to be the cause of every evil, and on that account was represented as a wolf and a crocodile.

TYPINSAN, ti-pin-san', the most E. and largest of the Madjicosima Islands, in the China Sea. Ext. 20 miles long, with a breadth of 10 at its widest point. Lat. 24° 42′ N. Lon. 125° 29′ E.

TYRANNIO, ti-răn'-ni-o, a celebrated Greek grammarian, whose real name was Theophrastus, which his pupils altered to Tyrannio, on account of his severity. He was taken prisoner by Lucullus, and carried to Rome, where he became intimate with Cicero, who employed him in arranging his library. He himself possessed a large collection of books. Flourished 50 B.C.

TYRCONNEL, Richard Talbot, Duke of, tir-kon'-nel, an Irish nobleman, and zealous Roman Catholic, who was appointed, by James, lord-lieutenant of his native country. He espoused the cause of James II. against William III., and received the king at Dublin, after he had fled from England. After the revolution of 1688, he attempted to render Ireland independent, but signally failed. D. 1691.

TYRE, or SOUR, tire (Hebrew tsoor, Arabic soor), a seaport of Syria, which now derives its only importance from its occupying the site of the most celebrated commercial city of antiquity. Lat. 33° 10′ N. Lon. 35° 20′ E.

TYRIA, or TIREH, tir'-i-a, a town of Asia Minor, Anatolia, near the Little Mendere river, 44 miles from Smyrna. It is the ancient Caystor, and stands at the base of Mount Tmolus. Mosques are numerous. Pop. Unascertained.

TYRI-FIORD, tir'-e-fe-ord, a lake of Norway, 16 miles from Christiana. Ext. 16 miles long, with a breadth of 7. On the S. its surplus waters are carried off by the river Drammen; whilst, on the N., it receives the Beina-ely.

TYRNAU, tyesr'-now, a town of Hungary, on the river Tyrna, in a fertile, but rather unhealthy district, 25 miles from Presburg. It has an academy, a seminary for priests, a school for young noblemen, and numerous churches. Manf. Woollen and linen fabrics, with a considerable general trade. Pop. 6,000.

TYRO, ti'-ro, a beautiful nymph, daughter of Salmoneus, king of Elis. As she often walked on the banks of the river, Neptune assumed the shape of her lover, and gained her affections. She had two sons, Pelias and Neleus, whom she neglected; but the children were preserved by shepherds.

TYROL and VORARLBERG, tir'-rol (Germ. te-rol'), a province of the Austrian empire, bounded by Bavaria, Salzburg, Carinthia, Austrian Italy, and Switzerland.

of which last it forms a continuation in the east. Its form approaches to the circular, but its boundary-line is marked by frequent projections and indentations. Political Divisions. These consist of seven districts or circles, named Roveredo, Etsch, Trient, Pusterthal and Eisach, Lower Inn and Wipperthal, Upper Inn and Vintschgau, and Vorarlberg. Area, about 11,000 square miles. Desc. Of all the countries of Europe, Tyrol is the most exclusively mountainous. The Rhætian Alps, with their ramifications, divide it into upwards of twenty valleys, and traverse it from E. to W. The culminating summits are the Gross Glockner, in the E., which attains a height of 12,425 feet, and Mount Ortler, in the W., which rises to 12,852 feet above the level of the sea. Rivers. The principal are the Inn, the Drave, and the Adige, with their affluents in the N. and S. The N.W. part, Vorarlberg, is watered by the Ill and Bragenz, falling into Lake Constance. Lakes. Constance forms the N.W. boundary, and the N. part of the Garda is in the Tyrol. Besides these, small lakes are numerous. Climate. This, in consequence of the height of the mountains, is cold, not only in winter, but in spring; in summer the valleys are hot, particularly when open to the south. Zoology. The chamois, the Alpine goat, the marmot, wolf, bear, and wild boar. Pro. Its agricultural produce is scanty, and corn is imported in exchange for the wine and silk raised in the southern valleys. Some maize, wheat, and pulse are grown in the lower valleys, and, on the mountain-sides, buckwheat, rye, and oats. Flax, hemp, and tobacco, are also produced. Wine and silk are the products of the S. provinces, and the rearing of canary-birds is extensively followed in the valley of the Inn. Most of the singing-birds of Europe are supplied from the Tyrol. Minerals. Abundant; but the only mines that have as yet been worked with advantage are those of salt, iron, copper, and calamine. Mineral springs abound, there being no less than sixty in different parts of the country. Manf. Silks in the S.; iron goods, cottons, linens, leather, wooden articles, glass, and paper. Exp. Cattle, cheeses, silk, iron goods, salt, wine, timber, tobacco, corn, and various kinds of manufactured goods. Rel. Mostly Roman Catholic, under ten bishops, suffragans of the archbishop of Salzburg. Gov. A national diet, comprising nobility, clergy, and the deputies of towns and rural districts. These all assemble in one chamber. Pop. about 865,000. Lat. between 45° 39′ 30″ and 47° 45′ 15″ N. Lon. between 9° 35′ and 13° E.—This country passed to the house of Hapsburg in the 13th century. By the treaty of Presburg, in 1806, Tyrol was conveyed to Bavaria, but, in 1815, restored to Austria. Its inhabitants are the most attached to the imperial rule in the Austrian empire.

TYRONE, tir-one', a county of Ireland, in the province of Ulster, bounded on the N.E. by Londonderry, E. by Lough Neagh, S.E. by Armagh, S. by Monaghan, S.W. by Fermanagh, and W. by Donegal. Area, 1,260 square miles. Desc. Rough and mountainous in the N. and S., and in other parts hilly and scant of wood; but many portions of the soil are rich and fertile, and equally calculated for tillage or pasture. Rivers. The principal are the Blackwater, the Foyle (known also by the names of the Cammon and the Mourne), the Mounterlouny and Drimna, the Fentona, the Owenreagh, the Longfield, the Derg, and Fin; besides numerous streamlets. The other rivers are the Farran and the Cookestown. Lakes. Lough Neagh, which forms part of the E. boundary. Pro. Potatoes and oats, with some barley, flax, and clover. Minerals. Coal, which is raised in considerable quantities. Manf. Linens, coarse woollens, whisky, beer, and earthenware. Pop. 258,000.—This county is intersected by the Enniskillen and Londonderry Railway; whilst the navigation of the Tyrone Canal is wholly within its E. district.

TYRONE, the name of several townships of the United States, none of them with a population above 2,000.

TYRREL, tir'-rel, a county of the United States, in North Carolina. Area, 730 square miles. Pop. 6,000.

TYRRELL, James, tir'-rel, an English historical writer, who, after studying at Queen's College, Oxford, entered of the Middle Temple, and was called to the bar about 1665. Possessed of an independent fortune, he was not under the necessity of practising the law. He accordingly devoted himself to the pursuit of historical research. Among his first literary efforts, was a reply to Sir Robert Filmer's treatise on government, under the title of the "Patriarch Unmonarched." Opposed to the government of James II., Tyrrell was one of those who welcomed the Revolution and the accession of William III., which change he championed in a course of "Political Dialogues," which were afterwards republished in a volume entitled "An Enquiry into the Ancient Constitution of the English Government." The publication of his most important work was commenced in 1700, and was called "General History of England, both Ecclesiastical and Civil," a work which is valuable as being founded upon the original chroniclers. He intended to bring the narrative down to the time of William III., but it was only continued to the close of the reign of Richard II. B. in London, 1642; D. 1718.

TYRRELL'S-PASS, tir'-rels pass, a market-town of Ireland, in the county of Westmeath, Leinster, 9 miles from Mullingar. Pop. 600. In the time of Queen Elizabeth, this place was the scene of some severe contests.

TYRTÆUS, tir-te'-us, a celebrated Greek poet, who distinguished himself by warlike verses to animate the Lacedæmonians in their war with the Messenians; for which he was made a citizen of Sparta. Some fragments by him are to be found in various collections of the Greek poets. Flourished about 660 B.C.

TYRWHITT, Thomas, tir'-wit, a learned English writer, who became fellow of Merton College, Oxford. In 1762 he was appointed clerk of the House of Commons. He published an edition of Aristotle's "Poetics;" another of Chaucer, with a life of that poet; notes on Shakspere, and collected the poems attributed to Rowley, in which controversy he distinguished himself. B. in London, 1730; D. in the same city, 1786.

TYSILIO, ti-sil'-yo, a Welsh poet, historian, and divine, who wrote a Chronicle of Britain, from which Geoffry of Monmouth composed his history. Flourished in the 7th century.

TYSMIENICA, tyes-me'-ne-ka, a small town of Austrian Galicia, on the borders of Russia, 7 miles from Stanislawow. It has several churches, and a trade in cattle, wax, and leather. Pop. 3,000.

TYSON, Edward, ti'-son, an eminent English physician, who became a fellow of the Royal Society, whose Transactions he enriched with many valuable papers. He was appointed physician to the hospitals of Bethlem and Bridewell. He published "Phocæna, or the Anatomy of a Porpoise;" "The Natural History and Anatomy of the Ephemeron;" "Orang Outang, or the Anatomy of a Pigmy compared with that of a Monkey, an Ape, and a Man." Haller says of this work, "We have nothing in comparative anatomy that can be compared to it, excepting the works on insects;" which last probably referred to Swammerdam's writings. B. 1649; D. 1708.

TYTLER, William, tit'-ler, an eminent Scotch antiquary, who was the editor of "The Poetical Remains of James I.," to which he prefixed a dissertation on the literary history of Europe. He also wrote a vindication of Mary queen of Scots, and a dissertation upon Scottish music. B. at Edinburgh, 1711; D. 1792.

TYTLER, Alexander Fraser, called Lord Woodhouselee, a Scotch judge and miscellaneous writer, who was the son of the preceding. After studying the law, he was admitted as an advocate. He became professor of universal history and Roman antiquities in the university of Edinburgh, in 1786; but still continuing to practise his profession, he, in 1790, rose to be judge-admiral of Scotland. In 1802 he became judge of the Court of Session, with the courtesy title of Lord Woodhouselee. His most important works were,—"Elements of General History;" an essay on the Principles of Translation; a treatise on Martial Law; and essays contributed to Edinburgh periodicals. B. at Edinburgh, 1747; D. 1813.

TYTLER, Patrick Fraser, a Scotch historical writer, who was the son of the preceding. After studying at the university of Edinburgh, and becoming a member of the Faculty of Advocates, he, in 1813, relinquished the law for literature. Subsequently to visiting the continent, in company with Mr. (now Sir A.) Alison, he began to write for "Blackwood's Magazine," and, in 1819, put forth his first separate work, under the title of "Life of James Crichton of Cluny, commonly called Admirable Crichton." "The Life of John Wicklyff," and other works, followed, till about 1826 he acted upon the suggestion of Sir Walter Scott, and commenced his most important work, "The History of Scotland." This, perhaps the best history of Scotland, commenced with the accession of Alexander III., and ended with the union of the English and Scottish crowns in the person of James I., in 1603. From a large number of other works, we may mention of his, "The Lives of the Scottish Worthies;" "Life of Henry VIII.;" "England under the Reigns of Edward VI. and Mary;" "Historical View of the Progress of Discovery on the more Northern Coasts of America;" and "Life of Sir Walter Raleigh." For some years before his death, he was in receipt of a pension of £200 per annum from the government. B. at Edinburgh, 1791; D. there, 1849.

TZANA. (See DEMBIA.)

TZARITZIN, tsar-rit-seen', a fortified town of Russia, on the Volga, 110 miles from Kamishin. It is celebrated for its mineral waters. Pop. 5,000.

UCAYALE, oo-ki'-a-lai, a large and navigable river of South America, which, after a course of 400 or 500 miles, enters the Amazon by the south side, in lat. 4° 25′ S.

UCCELLO, Paolo, oo-chel'-lo, an eminent Florentine painter, and the first of the Italian artists who evolved a practical theory of perspective. He excelled in landscapes and in depicting animals. One of his best works was a collection of portraits upon one panel, of Giotto the painter, Brunelleschi the architect, Donatello the sculptor, himself as a master of the art of perspective, and Giovanni Manetti as the first mathematician of his time. D. according to Vasari, 1432.

UCLES, oo'-klais, a fortified town of Spain, in the province of Cuenca, and 30 miles from the town of that name. It stands at the foot of a hill crowned by a famous monastery, and was, in 1809, taken by the French. Pop. 1,800.

UDALL, Nicholas, an English classicist, who studied at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and was, in 1534, appointed master of Eton school. He subsequently became master of Westminster school, and, under Edward VI., held a canonry at Windsor. He produced "Flowers for Latin Speaking," and translations of the comedies of Terence and of the works of Erasmus. B. in Hampshire, 1506; D. 1564.

UDDEVALLA, ood-val'-la, a town of Sweden, in the province of Bahus, on both sides of a deep bay of the Cattegat. It has a convenient harbour. Manf. Cotton and linen fabrics, snuff, and leather. Pop. 4,000.

UDINE, oo-de'-nai, a town of Austrian Italy, in the government of Venice, on the Roja, 40 miles from Trieste. It has a cathedral, with several churches and convents. It has, besides, a town-hall, bishop's palace, barracks, and opera-house. The best houses are decorated with fine paintings. Silk is reared in the neighbourhood, and forms, along with some woollen stuffs, and the liqueurs made from the fruits of the country, the chief branch of trade. In the mountains of the territories of Udine are quarries of marble, and minerals of various descriptions. Pop. 25,000.—The delegation of Udine has a population of about 60,000.

UDINSK, GREAT and SMALL, oo-dinsk', the name of two towns of Irkutsk, in Asiatic Russia, the former on the Uda. It is well fortified, and contains large magazines. Pop. 3,000. Lat. 51° 23′ N. Lon. 107° 20′ E.

UDVARHELY, oot-far'-ha-le, the chief town of a district in Transylvania, 90 miles from Klausenberg. It has large tanneries, and trades largely in honey and tobacco. Pop. 3,000.

UITHUIZEN, oit'-hoi-zen, a town of the Netherlands, 14 miles from Groningen. Pop. 3,500.

UJHELI, or SATORALLIA, oo-yai'-le, a town of Hungary, on the Rougyva, 9 miles from Zemplin. It is celebrated for its wine. Pop. 6,600.

UKRAINE, ook'-rain, 'a frontier,' an extensive country in the south-east of Russian Poland, which forms the four governments of Kiev, Podolia, Poltava, and Kharkov. In fertility it is not surpassed by any country in Europe. Wheat, oats, barley, and other products are raised with comparatively little labour, and the pastures are in many parts of great luxuriance. Fruits are also abundant, and the kermes, or Polish cochineal, forms one of the products of Ukraine. The chief town is Kiev, once the capital of the Russian dominions in their circumscribed state. The river Dnieper intersects the country in a winding direction, and affords a channel for the conveyance of products to the Black Sea, where, at Odessa, situate between the mouths of the Dneiper and Dniester, the principal outlet is formed.

ULEABORG, o'-le-a-borg, a seaport town of Russian Finland, on a peninsula where the river Ulea falls into the Gulf of Bothnia, 70 miles from Tornea. Its chief trade is the export of tar, pitch, salt fish, and salt butter. Pop. 5,000. On an adjacent island is the castle of Uleaborg, constructed in 1590.

ULEA-TRASK, o'-le-a-trask', a lake of Finland, 50 miles from Uleaborg, of very irregular shape. Ext. 35 miles long, with an average breadth of 10. It receives several rivers, and discharges its surplus waters by the river Ulea.

ULFILAS, or ULPHILAS, ul-fi'-las, bishop of the Goths residing between the Danube and Mount Hæmus. He made a translation of the Holy Scriptures into the Gothic language. Of this version there exist two fragments, one in the library of the university of Upsal, and the other in the library at Wulfenbuttel. The Upsal volume bears the name of the "Codex Argenteus," on account of its solid silver binding. Of both, several editions have been published; and, as the earliest known example of a Teutonic language, it is highly esteemed by philologists. The Gothic name of this bishop is supposed to have been Vulfila (Wolfling). B. about 318; D. at Constantinople, 388.

ULLDECONA, ool-dai-ko'-na, a town of Spain, in the province of Tarragona, 15 miles from Tortosa. Pop. 5,000.

ULLESTHORPE, uls'-thorp, a hamlet of Leicestershire, 3 miles from Lutterworth. Pop. 600. It has a station on the Midland Counties Railway.

ULLOA Y PEREIRA, Louis de, ool-lo'-a e pai-ree'-ra, a Spanish poet, who gained great reputation by his sonnets in the reign of Philip IV., and was, by count de Olivarez, appointed governor of Leon. D. 1660.

ULLOA, Don Antonio, an eminent Spanish mathematician, who was, in 1735, appointed as one of the mathematicians employed in measuring a degree of the meridian at the equator. On his return he was taken prisoner by the English, but was soon afterwards released. He published an account of his voyages, and a work upon the "Natural History and Antiquities of America," &c. He subsequently distinguished himself in promoting the establishment of a cabinet of natural history, a laboratory, the observatory at Cadiz, and in making improvements in the manufactures of his native country. B. 1716; D. 1795.

ULLSWATER, or ULLESWATER, uls-waw'-ter, the largest of the English lakes, after Windermere, between the counties of Cumberland and Westmoreland, 5 miles from Penrith. Ext. 9 miles long, with an average width of 1. It abounds with char and other fish. The navigators of this lake find much amusement by discharging guns in certain stations, the report being reverberated from rock to rock, promontory, cavern, and hill, with every variety of sound. Its S.W. extremity is overlooked by the mountain Helvellyn.

ULM, oolm, a frontier town of Germany, in Wurtemberg, on the Danube, at its confluence with the Blau, which flows through the town, 45 miles from Stuttgart. It is an ancient place, consisting of crooked streets, and of houses in the old German style. Here are a large Gothic church or minster, about 416 feet in length and 160 in breadth; several other churches, the town-house, arsenal, theatre, barracks, custom-house, gymnasium, and hospitals. Manf. Playing-cards, leather, tobacco, pipe-bowls, vinegar, and linen.

There are also shipbuilding docks. Pop. 15,000. Here, in 1805, the errors of Mack and the combinations of Napoleon I. led to the surrender of an Austrian army, without a shot being fired; and it has frequently been the scene of great military events.

ULMANN, Karl, ool'-man, a learned German writer upon theology, who, in 1821, became professor extraordinary of theology in the university of Heidelberg. His most important works were,—"John Wessel a forerunner of Luther;" "Of the Evangelical Church in Germany;" "On the Nature of Christianity;" and "Of the Future of the Evangelical Church in Germany." B. at Epfenbach, Baden, 1796.

ULPHILAS. (See ULFILAS.)

ULPIANUS, Domitius, ul-pi-ai'-nus, a celebrated Roman jurisconsult, was minister of state to the emperor Alexander Severus, who elevated him to the prætorship. Some fragments of his works are extant. His severe exercise of justice led to his being murdered under the emperor's eyes by the prætorian soldiers, in 228.

ULRICI, Hermann, ool'-re-tse, a learned German writer, who was educated for the legal profession, but subsequently entirely devoted himself to literature. His most important works were,—"History of the Poetical Art in Greece;" a treatise upon the Hegelian philosophy, and another upon Shakspere's dramatic works, in which he sought to prove that the English poet wrote with a deeply religious moral beneath all his plays. In 1833, Ulrici became professor of the university of Halle. B. at Pföiren, Lower Lusatia, 1806.

ULSTER, uls'-ter, a river in the circle of the Upper Rhine, which, after a course of 30 miles, runs into the Werra, near Vach, in the principality of Hesse.

ULSTER, a county of the United States, in the S.E. part of New York. Area, 1,096 square miles. Pop. 80,000.

ULSTER, the most N. province of Ireland, bounded on the E. by the Irish Sea, on the N. by the Northern Ocean, on the W. by the Western Ocean, on the S. by the province of Leinster, and on the S.W. by that of Connaught. Area, 8,550 square miles. Desc. The coasts of this province are indented by numerous bays and large inlets. On the W. is Donegal Bay, on the N. Loughs Swilly and Foyle, and on the E. Belfast Lough and Dundrum Bay. The southern parts are rich, fertile, and well cultivated, but the northern are hilly and mountainous. Both on the N. and E. are remarkable basaltic cliffs, including the Giant's Causeway. Some of the mountains in the W. attain to an elevation of 2,000 feet. This province, however, is freer from bogs than any other part of Ireland. Rivers. The principal are the Bann, the Foyle, and the Erne, with some smaller tributaries of the Shannon. Lakes. Neagh, Strangford, and Erne, which are the largest; but there are numerous others. The Ulster Canal, 24 miles in length, connects Loughs Neagh and Erne. Pro. Corn and grass; and horses, sheep, and horned cattle are largely reared. Manf. This province is the principal seat of the Irish linen manufacture. The annual value of the linen produced is estimated at £5,000,000. Pop. 2,012,000. Ulster contains the counties of Donegal, Derry, Antrim, Tyrone, Fermanagh, Cavan, Armagh, Monaghan, and Down. It is traversed by the Ulster Railway between Belfast, Armagh, and Ballymena.

ULUG-BEG. (See OULOU-BEG.)

ULVA, ul'-va, an island of the Hebrides, separated by narrow straits from the W. coast of Mull. Ext. 5 miles long, with a breadth of 2.

ULVERSTONE, ul'-ver-stone, an ancient market-town of Lancashire, at the distance of about a mile from an arm of the bay of Morecombe, called Leven Sands, 15 miles from Lancaster. The church is a plain neat structure, has three aisles and a square tower. Besides other churches and chapels, there are a small theatre, an assembly-room, and a public subscription library; also a clerical library. Manf. Cottons, linens, ropes, hats, and woollen yarn. It has, also, a trade in iron-ore, pig and bar iron, limestone, blue slate, wheat, oats, barley, and beans. Pop. 11,000.

ULYSSES (in Greek, ODYSSEUS), u-lis'-sees, a celebrated Greek hero, king of Ithaca. On being summoned by Agamemnon to join the Greek expedition against Troy, he, in order not to leave his beloved wife Penelope, pretended to be insane, and yoked a horse and a bull together, and ploughed the sea-shore, where he sowed salt instead of corn. This artifice was, however, discovered by Palamedes, who, by placing before the plough of Ulysses his infant son Telemachus, proved that the father was not mad, who had sufficient reasoning power to turn away the plough from the furrow so as not to hurt his child. Ulysses was, therefore, obliged to go to the war. (See PALAMEDES.) During the Trojan war, Ulysses was distinguished for his valour, prudence, and sagacity. By his means Achilles was discovered among the daughters of Lycomedes, king of Scyros, and Philoctetes was induced to abandon Lemnos, and to fight the Trojans with the arrows of Hercules. With the assistance of Diomedes, he slew Rhesus, and slaughtered the sleeping Thracians in the midst of their camp, introduced himself into the city of Priam, and carried away the Palladium of the Trojans. For these eminent services he was universally applauded by the Greeks, and was rewarded with the arms of Achilles. After the Trojan war, Ulysses embarked on board his ship to return to Greece, but was exposed to a number of misfortunes before he reached his native country. He was thrown by the winds upon the coasts of Africa, and visited the country of the Lotophagi, and of the Cyclops in Sicily. He was next at Æolis, and thence he was cast upon the coast of the Læstrygones, and of the island Æea, where the enchantress Circe changed all his companions into pigs. Having escaped the magic of Circe, he visited the infernal regions, and consulted Tiresias as to how he might return to his country. After again reaching the earth, he passed along the coasts of the Sirens unhurt, by the directions of Circe (see SIRENS), and escaped the whirlpools and shoals of Scylla and Charybdis. On the coasts of Sicily Apollo destroyed his ships, and all were drowned, except Ulysses, who swam to the island of Calypso. There Calypso, after seven years, suffered him to depart in a ship, which Neptune sank. Ulysses swam to the island of the Phæacians, where king Alcinous gave him shelter. He related the story of his misfortunes to that monarch, and was, at length, conducted in a ship to Ithaca, after an absence of twenty years. He was informed that his palace was besieged by a number of suitors, who continually disturbed the peace of Penelope, and thereupon assumed the habit of a beggar, by the advice of Minerva, and his faithful shepherd Eumæus. Ulysses being restored to his family (see TELEGONUS, PENELOPE, TELEMACHUS, EUMÆUS), lived about sixteen years after his return, and was at last killed by his son Telegonus, who had landed in Ithaca, in the hope of making himself known to his father.

UMBAGOG, um'-ba-gog, a lake of the United States, in New Hampshire and Maine, 18 miles long, and, where widest, 10 broad. It is traversed by the Androscoggin river, which issues from it on the W.

UMBREIT, Friedrich Wilhelm Karl, oom-brite', a learned German writer, who, in 1829, became professor of theology at Heidelberg. He distinguished himself by his knowledge of oriental languages, and produced a number of works upon eastern literature, which were very valuable. His commentaries and interpretations of the Holy Scriptures were amongst his most important efforts, the principal of these being "A Philological, Critical, and Philosophical Commentary upon Solomon's Proverbs;" "Practical Commentary upon the Prophets of the Old Testament;" and "Fundamental Principles of the Old Testament." B. at Sonneborn, Saxe-Gotha, 1795.

UMEA, oo'-me-o, a seaport-town of Swedon, in West Bothnia, at the mouth of the river Umea, 93 miles from Hernosand. It has a good harbour, and a traffic in wood and fish. Pop. 1,400. Lat. 63° 49′ 46″ N. Lon. 20° 4′ E.

UMRITSIR. (See AMRITSIR.)

UMROHAH, oom-ro-ha', a town of British India, in the district of Moradabad, in the N.W. Provinces. Pop. 73,000. Lat. 28° 54′ N. Lon. 78° 33′ E.

UMSTADT, oom'-stat, a town of Germany, in Hesse-Darmstadt, 12 miles from Darmstadt. Pop. 2,740.

UNDERCLIFFE, un'-der-klif, a maritime tract of England, in the Isle of Wight, extending along its S. coast from Niton 5 miles E. to Bonchurch. Its average width is three-quarters of a mile, and has been formed by a landslip from a range of chalk cliffs which bound it on the land side.

UNGARN, oon'-garn, a country of Europe. (See HUNGARY.)

UNGER, Johann Friedrich Gottlieb, oong'-er, an eminent German printer and wood-engraver, who introduced an improved form of German types, which were called after his name. He likewise greatly advanced the art of wood-engraving, and was, in the year 1800, created professor of the Academy of Arts at Berlin. As a publisher, he produced a number of excellent works. B. at Berlin, 1750; D. 1804.

UNGER, Frederica Helen, an eminent German authoress, who was the wife of the preceding. She executed a number of excellent translations from the French and English languages, and produced some original works, the most popular of which were the novels entitled "The History of a Girl at a Boarding-School," "Confessions of a Fair Saint," and "The Young Frenchman and the German Girl." D. 1813.

UNGHVAR, oong'-var, a town of Hungary, capital of a county, 82 miles from Debreczin. It has Roman Catholic and Greek churches, with a trade in wines. Pop. 5,000.

UNIE, oo'-ne, an island in the Adriatic Sea, 15 miles from Istria. Ext. 6 miles long, with a breadth of 2. Pop. Unascertained.

UNIEH, oo'-ne-ai, a seaport of Asia Minor, on the coast of the Black Sea, the ancient Æneæ, 50 miles from Samsoun. It is situate on a bay, with a range of finely-wooded mountains behind. The inhabitants are wealthy, consisting of Turks, Greeks, and Armenians, who carry on a considerable trade with Constantinople and the Crimea. Exp. Cotton stuffs from Tocat and Diarbekir, fruits, and wine. Imp. Corn and oil from the Crimea; coffee, sugar, and European manufactures from Constantinople. Pop. Unascertained.

UNION, u'-ni-on, the name of several counties in the United States. 1. In Arkansas. Area, 1,230 square miles. Pop. 11,000.—2. In Georgia. Area, 630 square miles. Pop. 7,500.—3. In Illinois. Area, 320 square miles. Pop. 8,000.—4. In Indiana. Area, 770 square miles. Pop. 7,500.—5. In Kentucky. Area, 350 square miles. Pop. 10,000.—6. In N. Carolina. Area, 350 square miles. Pop. 11,000.—7. In Ohio. Area, 445 square miles. Pop. 14,000.—8. In S. Carolina. Area, 500 square miles. Pop. 20,000.—Also the name of numerous townships, with populations varying between 2,000 and 6,000.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, u-ni'-ted staits, a federal republic, comprehending an extensive portion of North America. This government is bounded on the N. by Canada and the British possessions, from lat. 42° N. at Lake Erie, N.W. to the Lake of the Woods, and thence W. to the Pacific on the parallel of 49° N.; on the S. by the Mexican republic and the Gulf of Mexico. Ext. From E. to W. 3,050 miles, and from N. to S. 1,050. Area, about 2,940,000 square miles. Political Divisions. In 1776, when the declaration of independence was made in this country, these states consisted only of thirteen. There are now thirty-one, one district, and eight territories. The following are their names:—N. or Atlantic States. Maine, New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Vermont, Rhode Island, and Connecticut. Middle States. New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland. Southern States. Virginia, N. Carolina, S. Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, and Texas. Western States. Arkansas, Tennessee, Kentucky, Ohio, Illinois, Michigan, Indiana, Missouri, Iowa, Wisconsin, and California. Territories. Minesota, Utah, Washington, North-west, Oregon, New Mexico, Nebraska, and the Indian. District. Columbia, of which Washington is the capital. Of these divisions, the slave-holding states comprise the whole of the southern portion, with New Jersey, Delaware, and Maryland, in the middle; Arkansas, Tennessee, Kentucky, and Missouri, in the western; and the Columbian district. The territories have no share in the general government, as they send no members or representatives to congress; nor have they any voice in the election of the president. Bays. The principal are the Chesapeake, Delaware, Massachusetts, and Penobscot. Coastline, inclusive of bays, sounds, islands, &c., is estimated at about 33,000 miles. Desc. The territories of the United States are intersected in almost their whole length by the great chain of mountains called the Alleghany or Apalachian mountains, which extend 900 miles in length, from near the mouth of the St. Lawrence to the confines of Georgia, and are about 200 miles in breadth. They run nearly parallel to the shore of the Atlantic Ocean, at the distance of from 50 to 130 miles, and have an average height of about 2,500, although in some parts they attain an elevation of about 4,000 feet. On the western side of the Alleghany chain the country is spread out into that vast valley which is bounded by the Rocky Mountains on the west, and which is from 1,200 to 1,500 miles in breadth. The Mississippi, which runs generally in a direction from north to south, and falls into the Gulf of Mexico, is the common channel through which all the waters of this vast valley flow out into the ocean. The Rocky Mountains rise to an elevation of 9,000 feet. The distance to the Mississippi being more from the Rocky Mountains than from the Alleghanies, the rivers to which they give rise have to pursue a longer course before they reach the common recipient; and the rapidity of their descent being modified by this circumstance, they are equally navigable with those streams which issue from the lower range of the Alleghany Mountains to join the Mississippi. For 250 miles above the mouth of the Mississippi, the country is a perfect flat; but it afterwards gradually rises. In consequence of this favourable configuration of the ground, vessels may ascend by the course of the Mississippi, the Ohio, and the Alleghany rivers, an inclined plane of 2,400 miles, to an elevation of 1,200 or 1,400 feet, without the help either of canals or locks. Rivers. Of these the principal which flow into the Atlantic are, the Penobscot, Kennebeck, Androscoggin, Saco, Merrimac, Connecticut, Hudson, Delaware, Susquehannah, Potomac, James, Roanoke, Cape Fear, Pedee, Santee, Savannah, Alatamaha. The following are those which fall into the Gulf of Mexico, or join the Mississippi and its tributaries: the Appalachicola, Alabama, Tombigbee, Mississippi, Red River, Arkansas, White River, Ohio, Illinois, Moines, Tennessee, Cumberland, Wabash, Missouri, from its source to the Gulf of Mexico, Osage, Grand, Kansas, Platte, Yellowstone, Bighorn, and Ouachitta. The following are those which run to the west of the Rocky Mountains: the Columbia, Multnomah, Lewis' River, and Clark's River. The water-slopes of the United States have been estimated as follows. The Pacific slope, 766,000 square miles; Atlantic, lake, and gulf slope, E. and W. of the Mississippi, 955,000 square miles; Mississippi valley, drained by the Mississippi and its tributaries, 1,218,000 square miles. There are no large lakes south of Michigan and Erie. Soil. With regard to soil, the territory of the United States may be classed under five grand divisions:—1. That of the New England states, beyond the Hudson, where the Alleghanies spread out into a broken hilly country, is in general rocky, has but little depth, is barren in many places, and better adapted for pasture than for tillage. 2. The sandy soil of the sea-shore, commencing from Long Island, and extending to the Mississippi, with a breadth varying from 30 to 100 miles. This tract, from the Potomac southward, approaches to a horizontal plain, very little raised above the sea, and traversed through its whole breadth by the tide-water at the mouths of the great rivers. The surface, which consists of sea sand, is scarcely capable of cultivation, and produces nothing but pines, except on the banks of rivers, and in marshy spots, where rice is raised. 3. The land from the upper margin of the sandy tract to the foot of the mountains, from 10 to 200 miles in breadth, the soil of which is generally formed from the alluvion of the mountains and the decomposition of the primitive rocks beneath the surface. This tract is fertile, and generally well adapted for tillage. 4. The valleys between the ridges of the Alleghanies, the soil of which is various, but rather richer than that of the tract last mentioned. 5. The extensive region west of the Alleghanies, which is bottomed on limestone, is well watered, inexhaustibly productive, and contains, perhaps, as large a proportion of first-rate soil as any country in the world. Zoology. The animals found within the territory of the United States are, the bear, distinguished into the different species of black, brown, and grizzly. These are mostly carnivorous, of great strength, and very ferocious. The other animals are, the deer of various species; the antelope, the wolf, which is very fierce; the fox, the marten, the weasel, the badger, the ermine, and the polecat; also a species of panther. There are numerous other animals of prey; namely, the mountain cat, the wild cat of various species, the Virginian opossum, the beaver, the otter, the squirrel of different species, the porcupine, the fox, racoons, and many large birds. Extensive herds of bisons wander over the prairies of the W., and serpents are found in the morasses adjoining the rivers. The domestic animals are the same as those of Europe, from which they have been all taken to America. Climate. This has the disadvantage of being liable to great extremes, both of heat and cold; and the latter is felt much farther south than in the countries of the old continent. In the N.E. states, such as Maine, New Hampshire, and Vermont, the cold is intense for three or four months. At Brunswick, in Maine, the greatest cold in January has been 30° below zero. In summer the heat is very intense during five or six weeks; and, in low confined situations, is nearly equal to that of the Arabian coast, the thermometer rising to 100° in the shade. In the more southern states the cold in winter is extreme, the thermometer in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Massachusetts, &c., falling below zero, and rising in summer to nearly 100°. The winter is, however, of shorter duration. In Virginia, the cold in winter brings down the thermometer to 6°, and in summer it rises to 96° and 98°. In Georgia, &c., it ranges between 17° and 100°; and still farther south, even in Louisiana, the winter is occasionally severe. It has been generally thought that the climate to the west of the Alleghany mountains is more temperate than on the eastern declivity; but from recent observations this seems doubtful. The quantity of rain which falls in the United States is greater than in Europe; but there are not so many rainy days. The mean annual fall at New York is 36 inches; at Charleston, S. Carolina, 47; and at Marietta, in Ohio, 34. Pro. In a country so extensive there must necessarily be a considerable diversity in agricultural produce. The north-eastern states form a good grazing country, and beef, pork, butter, and cheese, are among the principal articles attended to. Maize, or Indian corn, an indigenous American plant, is cultivated from Maine to Louisiana, but succeeds best in the middle and western states. The maple grows in all the states, but thrives best in the middle and western. Wheat is also cultivated from one extremity of the Union to the other. The cultivation of tobacco begins in Maryland, about the parallel of 39° or 40°, and continues through all the southern states, and partially through the western states, particularly Kentucky and Tennessee. The average annual amount raised of this narcotic is estimated at 2,000,000 cwt. Cotton and rice are the great staples of all the southern states, from North Carolina to Tennessee, and the leading exports of the Union. Of cotton the average annual amount is estimated at 750,000,000 lb. The sugar-cane grows in low and warm situations, as high as the latitude of 33°. Oats, rye, and barley, are raised in all the northern, and in the upper districts of the southern states. Hay, hops, potatoes, hemp, flax, silk, madder, and indigo, are also abundantly cultivated. The climate is exceedingly favourable for the production of fruits, which abound throughout the whole extent of the territories. In the northern states, apples, pears, cherries, peaches, currants, gooseberries, plums, &c., are produced in great abundance. Towards the south, the fruits which flourish best are pears, pomegranates, and watermelons; the latter, in particular, grow to an enormous size, and are superior perhaps to any in the world. The other fruits are figs, apricots, nectarines, olives, almonds, oranges, lemons, limes, and citrons, which are abundantly produced in the southern states. In the pine barrens, grapes grow to a great size, and possess an excellent flavour. The vine can be raised as far north as Pennsylvania, and grows spontaneously in most of the southern and western states. Hops also grow naturally in the middle and western states. The mulberry-tree grows spontaneously. Minerals. Copper, iron, coal, lime, and salt, exist in great abundance, as also lead, which is chiefly procured from Missouri, where the supply appears to be inexhaustible. There are also rich lead-mines both in Illinois and Wisconsin. In California gold is found in great abundance, besides iron, copper, lead, and silver. Mercury is found in Kentucky, and the supply of coal is, perhaps, equal to that of any country in the world. The coal formation is believed to extend on the western side of the mountains, from Lake Ontario to the river Tombigbee, a distance of 800 or 900 miles. Limestone, gypsum, and slate, abound in many parts. Of nitre, Kentucky, Tennessee, and Virginia, furnish quantities more than sufficient for the consumption of the whole states. Salt is imported, or obtained from the sea, on the eastern side of the mountains; on the western side it is procured from salt-springs, which are so numerous, and so copious in their produce, all over the western states and the Missouri territory, that it is believed a salt formation accompanies the great coal formation from Lake Ontario to the river Tombigbee, extending westward, perhaps, to the Rocky Mountains. The mines of the United States, altogether, give employment to a vast number of persons. Commerce. The commerce of the United States, with the exception of occasional intervals of stagnation, chiefly from war, has been regularly increasing since the first establishment of the colonies, and now forms an important part of the general commerce of the world. The annual exports amount to about £45,000,000, and comprise the following articles:—Cotton, wheat, flour and biscuit, tobacco, lumber, rice, pot and pearl ashes, Indian cork and meal, dried and pickled fish, beef, tallow, hides, live cattle, skins and furs, rye and meal, pork, bacon, &c.; horses and mules, naval stores, flax-seed, whale-oil (common) and bone, spermaceti oil and candles, butter and cheese. The imports amount also to about £45,000,000, and chiefly consist of British and other European manufactures. Manf. Important; the mechanical trades are everywhere carried on; and many manufactures have been established on such a scale as fully to supply the home consumption. Clothing and furniture have long been made, both for use and ornament; and in the great staples of wool, cotton, flax, hemp, iron, glass, &c., the eastern states take a leading position. The shipping of the United States has increased with their commerce, and an internal communication greatly facilitates trade by canals and railways. 4,000 miles of canals are in operation, and nearly 20,000 miles of railway. Telegraphic communication and cheap postage extend throughout all the more thickly-peopled states. Rel. None established. Every inhabitant is left to support that form of religion which is agreeable to himself, by his own voluntary contributions. Nor are there any exclusive tests to be taken as qualifications for political offices, every American citizen, of whatever religious profession, being capable of holding any office in the state. The great body of the people profess the Christian religion, and are divided into all the various sects and denominations to which the Christian religion has given rise. Education. Good and general. It is one great principle of the American government to give every possible degree of encouragement to the diffusion among its subjects of literature and science. In all the vacant lands which have been surveyed and offered for sale, an express reservation is made by the state, of a certain proportion of every township, for the endowment of schools and colleges, where the rising generation may have ample opportunities of instruction. There are, accordingly, in all parts of the United States, universities for the instruction of youth, as well as schools and other inferior seminaries. Considerable libraries have also been accumulated for the great end of public instruction. Army. Small; about 12,000, with a militia about 2,210,000, but ill disciplined. Navy. Considerable; as an effective power, it is, perhaps, second only to the navy of Great Britain. Navy-yards are established at Portsmouth, Charleston, Brooklyn, Philadelphia, Washington, and Norfolk. Rev. The public revenue arises chiefly from duties on the importation of foreign merchandise, from the post-office, and from the sale of the public lands. There were, besides these sources, during war, other duties laid on all goods and wares manufactured within the United States. It amounts to about £12,000,000. Gov. The United States, while they have each separate and independent legislatures, for the administration of local concerns, are ruled, in all matters of imperial policy, by two houses of legislature,—the Senate and the House of Representatives, to which delegates are sent from all the different members of the American confederacy. The Senate consists of two members from each state, chosen by the local legislature for six years; while the House of Representatives is chosen by the people for two years. The number of the representatives is fluctuating, as one is returned for every 93,000 inhabitants. In the slave-states five slaves count only as three persons. The right of voting is in some of the states universal; in others it is restricted to such as pay a certain amount of taxes, or rent a tenement of a certain value. Another great and essential distinction of the American government is, that the first magistrate of the state is chosen every fifth year for this office, by the free and unbiassed voice of the people, and he is commander-in-chief of both the army and the navy. He, with the advice and consent of the Senate, levies war, makes peace, appoints judges, and other government officers. The highest office of first magistrate in the republic is supposed to be given to him who is the most worthy of it. Pop. about 25,000,000. Lat. between 25° and 49° N. Lon. between 67° and 125° W.—The colonization of North America originated either in the religious persecutions carried on in England against the Puritans and other sectaries, or in the visionary schemes of adventurers, who set out to the New World in quest of settlements. It was the former cause which peopled the colony of Virginia, and it was from the latter that the colonies of New England drew their origin; and these, the one in the south and the other in the north, may be considered as the original and parent colonies. They struggled long with the hardships and difficulties incident to all new establishments on remote and barbarous shores; and at times were so much reduced by sickness and disease, and the attacks of Indians, that it was resolved to abandon the settlement of the country as impracticable. All these impediments, however, being gradually overcome, the colonies at last began to flourish, and to increase both in wealth and population. They continued to make a rapid progress in improvement, and at the peace of 1763 they had risen to a state of great prosperity. It was about this period that they became involved in disputes with the mother country. These disputes increased, until they produced a war, which was terminated by the peace of 1782, when Great Britain acknowledged her former colonies as an independent power, under the title of the United States. After an interval of considerable agitation, the American army was disbanded, and the articles of the American constitution agreed upon. Under this constitution the United States continued to flourish, until 1812, when they were again involved in the war which raged between Great Britain and France. At last they took up arms for the vindication of their rights as a neutral power. This war was terminated in 1814, after the general peace which had taken place among the European powers. At the beginning of 1861 a series of secessions took place, on account of the long-vexed question of slavery, between the northern and southern states. The Carolinas were the first to secede from the Union; and these were followed by others adverse to the abolition of an institution which, certainly, reflects the greatest disgrace upon a government proclaiming itself free. A Southern Congress was formed, in opposition to that of the Federal Union held at Washington, and in May it passed acts "recognizing the existence of war with the Washington government, and authorizing the issue of letters of marque." In July, 1861, the first collision on a large scale took place at Bull's Run, about 20 miles from Washington. The Southern or Confederate troops were commanded by General Beauregard, who completely routed the Northern or Federal troops, under General Scott. While we write, the war is being prosecuted with vigour on both sides.

UNITY, u'-ni-te, the name of several townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 4,000.

UNNA, oon'-na, a town of Prussian Westphalia, 19 miles from Arnsberg. Manf. Cotton stuffs, with breweries, distilleries, and extensive salt-works. Pop. 5,000.

UNST, unst, the most northern of the Shetland Isles, Scotland, separated on the S. side from Yell, by Blumol Sound, 1 mile across. Ext. 10 miles long, with an average breadth of 3½. Area, 37 square miles. Desc. Diversified by hill and dale, with several small lakes; and the arable land is disposed in strips by the shore. Pro. Bere, black oats, and potatoes. The ling, cod, and tusk fishery is prosecuted by the inhabitants. Minerals. Gneiss, serpentine, talc, limestone, asbestos, and chromate of iron. The exports, besides the fish and the kelp, are butter, beef, tallow, and a considerable quantity of soft and warm woollen stockings; the imports chiefly tea, sugar, and wines. Pop. about 3,000.

UNTERWALDEN, oon'-ter-val'-den, a canton almost in the centre of Switzerland, to the east of Berne and south of Lucerne. Area, 263 square miles. Desc. It is one of the smallest in the republic, and consists of four valleys, covered with meadows and pasture-lands, and surrounded by the Alps, which rise to various heights of from 3,000 to 10,000 feet. Pasture being the chief occupation, the exports consist of cattle, hides, cheese, butter, and tallow; the imports of corn, wines, and various manufactures, there being hardly a weaver, hatter, or potter in the canton. Pop. 26,000, nearly all Roman Catholics.—This canton formed, with Uri and Schwytz, early in the 13th century, the nucleus of the confederation, in which it holds the sixth place.

UPHAM, up'-ham, a parish of Hampshire, 2½ miles from Bishop's Waltham. Pop. 600.—It is the birthplace of Young, the author of the "Night Thoughts."

UPHOLLAND, up'-hol-land, a township of England, in Lancashire, 3 miles from Wigan. Pop. 3,500.—It has a station on the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway.

UPPER, up'-per, a prefix to the names of numerous townships of the United States.

UPPINGHAM, up'-ping-ham, a neat and well-built market-town of Rutlandshire, 12 miles from Stamford. The church is an ancient Gothic structure, and there are an hospital and a free school. Pop. 2,000.

UPSAL, or UPSALA, oop-sa'-la, a province of Middle Sweden, bounded by the Gulf of Bothnia, the Baltic, the Lake of Mælar, and Westmannland. Area, 2,000 square miles. Desc. It consists of an extensive plain, little elevated above the level of the sea, and in general fertile. Its centre is traversed by the river Sala, and cattle-rearing is the principal branch of rural industry. Pop. 90,000.—In this province are the mines of Dannemora and several important smelting-works.

UPSAL, an ancient city of Sweden, 45 miles from Stockholm. It is situate on the small river Sala, which divides it into two parts, and communicates with the Lake of Mælar. Most of the private houses are of wood; but the public buildings are of stone or brick. The cathedral, in which the Swedish kings used to be crowned, is a large structure. The university was founded in the 15th century. The other objects worthy of attention are the observatory, the botanical garden, the cabinets of natural history and mineralogy, the royal castle and gardens, and the residence of the archbishop. Manf. Silk and tobacco; and it has a small trade by the river, on which it has steam communication with Stockholm. Pop. 5,000.

UPTON, up'-ton, the name of numerous parishes and hamlets in England, none of them with a population above 3,600.

UPTON-UPON-SEVERN, a neat and well-built market-town of Worcestershire, on the Severn, over which there is a stone bridge of six arches, 10 miles from Worcester. Its church is a handsome structure, with a square tower. It has, besides, a market-house, court-hall, assembly-rooms, and numerous schools. Its trade chiefly consists of exporting cider. Pop. 2,700.

UPTON, James, a learned English divine, who became fellow of King's College, Cambridge, and was afterwards appointed master of the grammar-school at Taunton, in Somersetshire. He published an edition of Ascham's "Schoolmaster," with notes; and another of Aristotle's "Art of Poetry." B. in Cheshire, 1670; D. at Taunton, Somersetshire, 1749. — His son James became prebendary of Rochester. His works are, an edition of Epictetus; another of Spenser's "Faerie Queene;" and "Observations on Shakspeare." D. 1760.

Upwell, up'-wel, a parish of Norfolk and Cambridgeshire. Pop. 5,400.

Urach, oo'-rak, a town of Germany, in Wurtemberg, on the Erms, 22 miles from Stuttgart. It has a castle and a theological seminary. Manf. Paper and gunpowder, and there are dyeing and bleaching works. Pop. 2,100.

Ural Mountains. (See Oural Mountains.)

Ural, or Oural, oo'-ral, a river of Russia, rising near Minsk, on the E. side of the Ural chain, and considered with the Oural Mountains to form the E. boundary of Europe. After an estimated course of about 1,800 miles it enters the Caspian, 180 miles from Astracan.

Uralsk, oo-ralsk', a town of Russia, on the Ural, 150 miles from Orenberg. Pop. 13,000, mostly Cossacks, of whose chief it is the residence.

Uranus. (See Cœlus.)

Urban I., Pope, ur'-ban, succeeded Calixtus I. in 222. There are no particulars of his life known, except that he suffered martyrdom in 230.

Urban II. succeeded Victor III. in 1088. He caused Guibert, who had been supported as anti-pope under the title of Clement III., to be driven out of Rome; preached the first crusade in 1095, and convoked the councils of Bari, Clermont, and Rome. D. 1100.

Urban III. (Hubert Crivelli, archbishop of Milan) was the successor of Lucius II., and was elected to the papal chair in 1185. He endeavoured to send assistance to the Christians in the East, who were being sorely pressed by Saladin; but his death took place before he could effect his object. D. 1187.

Urban IV. became pope in succession to Alexander IV. in 1261. He excommunicated Manfred, king of Naples, and offered the crown to Charles, count of Provence and Anjou, and brother to Louis IX. of France, which led to the subsequent wars of the Anjous for the possession of Sicily and Naples. D. 1264.

Urban V. was a Frenchman, of a noble family, who had previously been abbot of St. Victor at Marseilles. At the death of Innocent VI., in 1362, he was elected to the papacy. He restored the papal seat from Avignon to Rome, founded many churches, and reformed numerous abuses. D. 1370.

Urban VI. (Bartolomeo Prignano) succeeded Gregory XI. in 1378. The cardinals afterwards chose Robert of Geneva, who took the name of Clement VII., and took up his residence at Avignon. Thus was originated the famous "Western Schism," which endured for nearly fifty years. D. at Rome, 1389.

Urban VII. succeeded Sixtus in 1590, but died in less than a week afterwards.

Urban VIII. (Maseeo Barberini) ascended the pontifical throne in 1623. He condemned the Jansenists, revised the hymns of the Roman Catholic Church, and was the author of some Latin and Italian poems. B. 1568; D. 1644.

Urbana, ur-bai'-na, a post township in Ohio, U.S., 40 miles from Columbus. It is a flourishing place, and contains a court-house, a gaol, and various meeting-houses. Pop. 3,500.—Also the name of several other villages in Virginia, Maryland, and Illinois.

Urbania, oor-ba'-ne-a, a town of Central Italy, 7 miles from Urbino. Pop. 3,800.—Near it Bramante was born, about the middle of the 15th century.

Urbino, oor-be'-no, a town of Italy, in the States of the Church, capital of the delegation of the same name, 20 miles from Pesaro. It has a ducal palace and a college cathedral. Manf. Pins principally. Pop. 7,200. This is the birthplace of Baroccio, Baldi, Pope Clement XI., and Raphael.—The Delegation has an area of 1,690 square miles and a population of 240,000.

Ure, Andrew, ure, an eminent Scotch chemist, who was educated for the medical profession, and took his degree as M.D. in 1801, at Glasgow. After lecturing with some success upon chemistry, natural philosophy, and materia medica at Glasgow, he was nominated to the post of astronomer, upon an observatory being established in that city. In 1821 he produced a valuable work, entitled "A Dictionary of Chemistry." He took up his residence in the metropolis in 1830, and was, four years afterwards, appointed analytical chemist to the Board of Customs. Among the more important of his subsequent works were—"The Cotton Manufactures of Great Britain," "The Philosophy of Manufactures," and "On the Arts and Manufactures." He was a fellow of the Royal, Geographical, Astronomical, and other societies. B. at Glasgow, 1778; D. in London, 1857.

Urfé, Honoré d', oor'-fai, a French poet, who wrote a celebrated romance, entitled "L'Astrée," which was during almost half a century highly popular. He served with distinction under Henry IV., and, afterwards, as a diplomatist, at Savoy and Venice. Some other less-important poetical pieces emanated from him. B. 1567; D. at Nice, 1625.

Urfé, Anne d', a French poet, and brother of the preceding. He wrote, while a young man, 150 sonnets, in honour of Diana of Château Morand, whom he afterwards married; but became divorced from her, being unable to endure the company of a number of dogs, which Diana, who was devoted to the chase, continually kept in her own and her husband's sleeping-apartment. In 1599 he took holy orders, and afterwards composed some hymns. B. 1555; D. 1621.

Uri, oo'-re, a canton in the central part of Switzerland, bounded N. by the canton of Unterwalden, and E. by the country of the Grisons. Area, 422 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, and containing some of the principal heights of the Alps. Cattle-rearing is the chief occupation of its inhabitants. Rivers. The Reuss and its affluents. Pop. 15,000, Roman Catholics.—This canton, with Underwalden and Schwytz, united in the 14th century to form the Swiss Confederation, in which it holds the fourth rank.—The Lake of Uri forms the S. extremity of the Lake of Lucerne, and receives the river Reuss.

Uridge, u'-ridj, a hamlet of Wiltshire, near Chippenham.

Urie, u'-re, a river of Scotland, rising in Aberdeenshire, and falling into the Don at the burgh of Inverury.

Urloffen, oor-laf'-fen, a town of Baden, in the circle of the Middle Rhine, 7 miles from Offenburg. Pop. 2,000. It has a station on the railway to Offenburg.

Urquhart, ur'-kart, three parishes of Scotland, in Elgin, Inverness-shire, Ross-shire, and Nairn. None of them have population above 3,400.

Urr, or Orr, or, a river of Scotland, in Kirkcudbrightshire, rising in a lake of the same name, and entering the Solway Firth 10 miles from Kirkcudbright.—The Lake has a circuit of about 2 miles.

Ursins, Anne Maria de la Tremouille, Princess des, oor'-sil, a French lady, celebrated in her time for her political intrigues. She was the daughter of the duke de Noirmoutier, and became the wife of Adrien, prince of Talleyrand-Chalais, who was sent into exile for fighting a duel. Accompanied by the princess, he retired to Italy, where he died, the princess afterwards marrying the duke of Bracciano, chief of the powerful Italian family of Orsini. This old nobleman dying, his relict sold the duchy, but continued to style herself Princess des Ursins, the French form of Orsini. In 1701 she was appointed, at the instance of Louis XIV., camerara-major to the young queen of Spain, first wife of Philip V., over both of whom she obtained a complete ascendancy, and was, in reality, the ruler of the kingdom. But when Elizabeth Farnese became the wife of Philip, she immediately dismissed the intriguing Frenchwoman, who retired to Rome, and there conducted the household of the Pretender James Stuart. Her Memoirs and Correspondence, which, says an eminent authority, "interest us in the same way that 'Gil Blas' does, by their mixture of passion and adventure," were published at Rome in 1722, and again at Paris in 1826. B. 1642; D. at Rome, 1722.

Ursinus, John Henry, ur-si'-nus, an eminent German Lutheran divine, who became superintendant of the churches of Ratisbon. His works consist of an ecclesiastical history and commentaries upon the ancient writers. D. 1667.

Ursinus, Zachariah, a celebrated German divine and reformer, who was an advocate for the Calvinistic doctrines, and being persecuted by the Lutherans, he retired to Heidelberg, and thence to Neustadt, where he became professor of divinity. His works are chiefly controversial. B. at Breslau, 1534; D. 1583.

URSINUS, Benjamin, a celebrated German preacher, who was created a bishop, and raised to noble rank by Frederick I. of Prussia, in 1701. The bishop was in the habit of always commencing his sermons with "Once upon a time," and after the death of his royal patron, he made application to the new king, Frederick William I., that his salary as a bishop might be exempted from those rigorous measures of retrenchment with which Frederick William I. was inaugurating his reign. The royal answer contained only these words, "All that, was once upon a time." The pulpit oratory of Ursinus was, nevertheless, of a style very much superior to the other preachers of the period. He was a descendant of the celebrated reformer Zacharia Ursinus. D. about the commencement of the 18th century.

URSINUS, Fulvius, a learned Italian writer, who, entering into holy orders, became librarian to Cardinal Alexander Farnese, and received an annual pension from Pope Gregory XIII. He made a collection of valuable books and manuscripts, which he bequeathed to the library of the Vatican. His works consist of commentaries on Livy, Tacitus, and Sallust, and learned editions of Cicero, Polybius, and others. He also produced an edition of the Greek poets. B. at Rome, 1529; D. at the same city, 1600.

URSUS, Nicolas-Raymarus, ur'-sus, a Danish mathematician, who was, in his youth, a swineherd, and did not learn to read till he was 18. His after-progress was, however, very rapid, both in the languages and sciences. He taught mathematics at Strasburg, whence he was invited to a professorship at Prague. He invented an astronomical system so like that of Tycho-Brahe, as to bring him into a dispute with that astronomer respecting the right of discovery. D. 1600.

URUGUAY, or BANDA ORIENTAL, u'-roo-gwai, a republic of S. America, bounded N. by Brazil, S. by the mouth of the Plata, E. by the territory of Mirim, and W. by the river Uruguay. Its length from north-east to south-west is somewhat more than 600 miles, and its width from east to west about 400, although in some parts it is narrower. It is divided by the river of its name into east and west. Area. Estimated at 120,000 square miles. Desc. Level along the coast, and mountainous in its central parts. It is full of ravines, with heights clothed with forests, abounding with wild animals. Rivers. The Uruguay and its affluents, of which the principal is the Rio Negro. Climate. Humid, but temperate and healthy. Pro. Maize, wheat, beans, and melons. The country is well adapted for growing the fruits of most temperate climates, and cattle and horses are extensively reared. Minerals. Granite, limestone, jasper, and chalcedony; but the mines are not worked. Exp. Hides, skins, horns, tallow, and jerked beef. Pop. about 50,000.—This country formed itself into an independent republic in 1825, and has frequently been engaged in hostilities with Buenos Ayres. In 1853 a revolution took place; but order was eventually restored by the intervention of a Brazilian army.

URUGUAY, a large and navigable river of Brazil, and one of the principal tributaries of the Plata. It rises in lat. 26° 30′ S., and, collecting various other streams, traverses a vast extent of country to the south-east. After a course estimated at 800 miles, it enters the Plata, 35 miles from Buenos Ayres, to the W.N.W. of the colony of Sacramento, being joined, a little below this place, by the immense tributary stream of the Barana, which serves, also, to swell the Plata. Its principal tributary is the Rio Negro from the E.

URUMEA, URUMIYAH, or OORMIAH, oo-roo-me'-a, a lake of Azerbijan, in Persia, 35 miles from Tabriz. It has a number of small islands, and receives several rivers; but its waters are so salt that none but the lowest kinds of animal life can live in them. It has a circumference of 300 miles.—Also a TOWN, 12 miles from the lake, the reputed birthplace of Zoroaster. It is the see of an Armenian bishop. Pop. Unascertained; perhaps about 20,000.

URUMTSI, u-rum'-tse, a city of the Chinese empire, situate in a volcanic district immediately N. of the Thian-Shan mountains. It is a large place, with several temples, and the seat of a considerable trade. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 43° 45′ N. Lon. 88° 50′ E.

URUP, or OURUP, oo'-rup, one of the Kurile Islands, in the North Pacific Ocean. Ext. 50 miles long, with a breadth of 12. Desc. Mountainous, and producing copper, sulphur, and quartz. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 45° 38′ N. Lon. 149° 33′ E.

URVILLE, Dumont d', door'-veel, a celebrated French naval officer, who, in 1820, formed a member of the expedition to the Black Sea, which brought home the celebrated statue called the Venus of Milo, now one of the greatest treasures of the Louvre. In 1822 he accompanied Captain Duperrez upon a voyage round the globe, and, after his return, published some valuable scientific memoirs. In 1826 he was appointed to the command of two corvettes, and dispatched upon a mission of exploration in the track of La Peyrouse, the results of which were given to the world in 1830, under the title of "The Voyage of the Astrolabe," the name of D'Urville's vessel. In 1837 he went upon an expedition which extended as far as the Antarctic pole. His work entitled "Voyage to the South Pole" appeared after his death. B. 1790; D. 1842.

USEDOM, oo'-se-dom, an island of Prussia, in Pomerania, formed by the Baltic and several inland waters, in particular the Great and Little Haff, 9 miles from Rugen. Area, 150 square miles. Pop. 12,000, chiefly engaged in fishing and cattle-rearing.—Also a town on its W. shore. Pop. 1,500.

USHANT, or OUESSANT, ush'-ant, or oo-es'-sant, an island on the north-west coast of France, in the department of Finisterre, 25 miles from Brest. It has a circumference of about 10 miles. In 1759 the French, under Admiral Conflans, were, off this coast, defeated by the British, under Sir Edmund Hawkes. Also, in 1778, an indecisive action took place between the English, under Admiral Keppel, and the French, under Count d'Orvilliers.

USHER, James, ush'-er, an illustrious Irish prelate, whose uncle, Henry Usher, archbishop of Armagh, the founder of Trinity College, Dublin, placed him in that seminary, where he made great progress in all departments of learning. At the age of 16 he commenced a "Chronology of the Bible," in Latin, which was the origin of his great work, afterwards published under the title of "Annals of the Old and New Testament." In 1607 he was appointed professor of divinity at Dublin, and chancellor of St. Patrick's Cathedral. He was promoted to the bishopric of Meath in 1620, whence he was translated to the archbishopric of Armagh, in 1626. On the breaking out of the Irish rebellion, he retired to England, and was promoted to the see of Carlisle, from which he received no advantage, owing to the civil wars and the abolition of episcopacy, of which he approved himself a zealous advocate. The curators of the university of Leyden offered him a professorship, which he declined, as he also did an invitation from Cardinal Richelieu to settle in France, with the free exercise of his religion. Besides his "Annals," he published a "Body of Divinity;" the writings of Godeschalc in support of predestination; "Antiquitates Ecclesiarum Britannicarum;" an edition of the epistles of Ignatius, Barnabas, and Polycarp, with notes; sermons and other learned works. His remains were interred in Westminster Abbey. B. at Dublin, 1580; D. at Reigate, Surrey, 1656.

USHITZA, oo-shit'-za, an inland town of European Turkey, 85 miles from Belgrade. It has several mosques and a Greek church. Pop. 4,000.

USINGEN, oo'-sing-en, a town of Nassau, Germany, on the Usbach, 16 miles from Frankfort-on-the-Maine. Manf. Leather and hosiery. Pop. 2,000.

USK, usk, a market-town of England, in Monmouthshire, on the Usk, 14 miles from Monmouth. It has some remains of an ancient castle and a church. It is, however, a place of no trade. Pop. 1,000.

USK, a river of South Wales, rising in Brecknockshire, and, after a course of 60 miles, entering the Bristol Channel, 4 miles from Newport.

USKUP. (See SCOPIA.)

USMAN, oos'-man, a town of European Russia, in the government of Tambov, on the Usman, 85 miles from Tambov. Pop. 4,000.

USSEL, oos'-sel, a town of France, in the department of the Corrèze, 30 miles from Tulle. It is partly inclosed by walls. Pop. 4,400.

Ussel, a town of the island of Corsica. Pop. 4,500.

Usson, oos'-sawng, the name of several parishes and towns in France, none of them with a population above 3,800.

Ustica, oos'-te-ka, the ancient Euonimo, an island in the Mediterranean, off the N. coast of Sicily, 42 miles from Palermo. It is fertile in wine, olives, and cotton; also in wheat. On its S.W. side is the town of Santa Maria, with a harbour defended by batteries.

Ustiug, Veliki, or the Great, oos'-te-oog, a city of European Russia, in the government of Vologda, at the confluence of the Suchona and the Jug, which unite here and form the Dwina, 500 miles from St. Petersburg. It has three cathedrals, and a number of churches or chapels; but most of its houses are of wood. It is a mart of the trade between the frozen regions of the north and the more temperate provinces in the south. Its principal traffic is in corn and furs; also in fish, and in the silks and tea of China. Manf. Tallow, soap, leather, tiles, jewellery, and silver goods. It has, also, sawmills. Pop. 13,000.

UTRECHT.

Usumasinta, oo-soo-ma-sin'-ta, a river of Central America, rising in Guatemala, and, after a course of 400 miles, joining the Tobasco near its mouth.

Utah, u'-tah, a territory of the United States, ceded to them by Mexico in 1848. It is bounded on the N. by Oregon, W. by California, E. by the Rocky Mountains, and S. by the parallel of 37° N. Ext. About 500 miles long and the same broad. Desc. Its distinguishing feature is the "Great Basin," consisting of a plain of about from 4,000 to 5,000 feet above the level of the sea. Rivers. The Colorado. The country is inhabited by a few Indian tribes, the principal being that of Utah. (See Salt Lake, Great.)

Utica, u'-ti-ka, a city of Oneida county, New York, on the Mohawk, 85 miles from Albany. It is handsomely laid out, well built, and contains numerous churches, academies, a free school, a court-house, banks, and charitable institutions. Manf. Machinery; and it has an extensive trade. Pop. 18,000.—Also the name of many villages in the Western states.

Utrecht, u-trekt' (Dutch oo-trecht'), a province of the Netherlands, bounded W. by Holland, N. by the Zuyder Zee, and E. by Gelderland. Area, 535 square miles. Desc. Level, with the exception of the south quarter. Its pasturage is excellent. Rivers. The Leck or Rhine forms its boundary. Its other rivers are the Eem and Vechte. Manf. Woollens and cottons, with brewing and distilling. Pop. 156,000.

Utrecht, a city of the Netherlands, and capital of the preceding province, on the Old Rhine, by which it is divided into two parts, 20 miles from Amsterdam. The situation of Utrecht is healthy, and nothing can surpass the beauty of the approaches to the town, particularly the one from Amsterdam, which consists of a broad avenue, bordered with rows of trees. The city is surrounded with an earthen mound and moat, and, exclusive of the suburbs, is about three miles in circuit. The houses are built chiefly of brick, and the streets are of a tolerable width, and intersected by canals. Of the public edifices, the most remarkable is the cathedral, a considerable part of which is now in ruins; but the tower, 388 feet high, still remains entire. The other churches are numerous. The Stadhuis, or town-house, is a good structure. The other objects worthy of notice are the charitable establishments, hospitals, &c. The public walk called the Mall, outside the walls, is upwards of a mile in length, and bordered with a triple row of trees. The ramparts likewise form an agreeable walk. The university of Utrecht was founded in 1630, and has professors in the classical languages, mathematics, medicine, divinity, and law. It has a library, an anatomical theatre, a botanical garden, a cabinet of natural history, and an observatory. The town likewise possesses a hall of paintings, schools for the fine arts, and several valuable private libraries and other collections. Manf. Woollen, linen, silken fabrics, pins, and muskets. It has, besides, salt, sugar, bleaching, and tile works, with an extensive general trade. Pop. about 50,000. In 1579 the union of the provinces was concluded in the Stadhuis; and in the same building, in 1713, the treaty of peace between the allies and the French was completed.

Utrera, oo-trai'-ra, a town of Spain, on a very steep eminence, at the foot of which flows the Carbonel, 16 miles from Seville. It has two churches and eight monasteries or religious houses. It is surrounded by a wall, has a citadel, and is an important military post. Some of its churches are remarkable, and one of them is resorted to by a vast concourse of devotees. It has, besides, convents, hospitals, a town-hall, prison, and a cavalry barracks. Manf. Soap, leather, and starch. Near it are also salt-springs. Pop. 13,000, chiefly occupied with agricultural pursuits.

Utoxeter, ut-tox'-e-ter, or oox'-e-ter, a market-town of Staffordshire, near the river Dove, over which is a stone bridge, 13 miles from Stafford. It is well built, having a market-place in the centre, with three streets branching from it. Its church is an ancient edifice, with a tower and spire 180 feet high. In its neighbourhood are numerous iron-forges, and it has hardware factories, with a trade in agricultural produce. Pop. 5,000.—It communicates with Stafford by railway, and has its trade greatly facilitated by a branch of the Trent and Mersey Navigation.

Uvarov, Sergy Seminowitsch, oo'-va-rof, a Russian statesman and author, who became president of the Academy of Sciences at St. Petersburg, and afterwards minister of finance and of public instruction. His most important works were "Studies in Philology and Criticism," and some literary sketches in French, which are composed in an admirable style. B. about 1785; D. 1850.

Uvarov, Alexei Sergiewitsch, a modern Russian writer upon antiquities, who was son of the preceding. Among the more important of the valuable works which have been put forth under his direction, may be named, "Researches on the Antiquities of Southern Russia and the Coasts of the Black Sea," and "The Antiquities of Kertch," which is in progress at the present time (1861), and is pronounced by the best authorities to be a magnificent work. B. at St. Petersburg, about 1820.

Uwins, Thomas, u'-ins, an English artist, who was educated for the profession of an engraver, but afterwards became a painter in oil and water-colours. His best pictures consisted of Italian subjects, the most popular being "Interior of a Saint Manufactory at Naples," "Dressing for the Festa," and "The Fisherman's Song of Naples." B. in London, 1783; D. 1858.

UXBRIDGE, ux'-bridj, a township of Middlesex, on the Colne, 17 miles from London. It consists of one street, nearly a mile in length. The church or chapel of ease is a good building, and near it is a very commodious market-house. In the neighbourhood are many corn-mills, giving a great supply of flour to the metropolis. Pop. 3,300. It communicates with London by the Grand Junction Canal and branches.

UXBRIDGE, a post-township of Worcester county, Massachusetts, U.S., 40 miles from Boston. Pop. 2,500.

UYEA, two small pasture islands belonging to the Shetlands, Scotland. Their population is small, and one of them is a principal rendezvous for the deep-sea fishing.

UZEL, oo'-zel, a town of France, in the department of the Côtes-du-Nord, 9 miles from Loudeac. Its trade chiefly consists of linen goods. Pop. 2,200.

UZÈS, oo'-zai, a town of France, in the department of the Gard, 12 miles from Nimes. It has a communal college and an old episcopal palace. Manf. Silk, hosiery, common woollen cloths, and fine pasteboard. It has, besides, a trade in corn, wine, and brandy. Pop. 7,000.

UZNACH, ooz'-nak, a town of Switzerland, not far from the eastern extremity of the Lake of Zurich, 23 miles from Zurich. Pop. 1,500.

UZUNDJA-OVA, oo-zond'-ja-o'-va, a town of European Turkey, Rumili, near the Maritza, 55 miles from Adrianople. It has a large fair in October. Pop. Unascertained.

V.

[For names not in this letter see W and F.]

VAAGEN (East and West), va'-gen, two of the Loffoden Islands, Norway, W. of Hindoen, each about 30 miles in length and 15 across, the former having about 1,500 and the other 2,500 inhabitants.

VAAS, vas, a town of France, in the department of the Sarthe, on the Cher, 18 miles from La Flèche. Pop. 2,000.

VACARIUS, va-kai'-ri-us, an Italian jurist, who was one of the first who taught the Roman law in England, and, according to the chronicle of Robertus de Monte, "many, both rich and poor, resorted to him for instruction." He is stated to have composed nine books from the Code and Digests of the Roman system of jurisprudence, copies of which work are preserved in the town library of Bruges, and at Leipsic. Although he taught at Oxford, no copy of his works has been discovered at that university. Flourished early in the 12th century.

VADUTZ, a town of Germany. (See LICHTENSTEIN.)

VAGA, va'-ga, a river of Russia, in the governments of Vologda and Archangel. After a course of 250 miles it joins the Dwina.

VAHL, Martin, val, an eminent Danish botanist, who studied under Linnæus, and subsequently became professor of natural history in the university of Copenhagen. B. 1749; D. 1804.

VAIGATCH, or VAIGATZ, vai-gatch', an island of N. Russia, separated from the mainland by the Strait of Vaigatch. Ext. 95 miles long and 35 broad. Lat. 70° 25′ N. Lon. 59° 10° E.

VAILLANT, Francis le, vai'-ya, a celebrated French naturalist, who was the son of the French consul in Dutch Guiana. He spent three years in the colony of the Cape of Good Hope, and also collected objects of natural history in Germany and at Surinam. Returning to Paris in 1785, he devoted the rest of his life to arranging his museum, and composing his works, the most important of which were,—"Natural History of the Birds of Africa;" "Travels in the Interior of Africa;" and the "Natural History of Birds of Paradise." B. at Parimaribo, Dutch Guiana, 1753; D. in France, 1824.

VAILLANT, Jean Baptist Phillibert, Count, a French marshal, who was educated in the Polytechnic school, and, entering the army, served in the campaign in Russia; but being taken prisoner, he was retained a captive till the conclusion of the war. In 1815 he distinguished himself at Ligny and at Waterloo. After the restoration of the Bourbons, he served upon the staff. In 1834 he was sent to Africa to superintend the construction of fortifications. He was thus employed during eight years, at the end of which period he returned to Paris, and was engaged upon the defensive works of that capital. In the French expedition against Rome he acted as second in command. For his services there, he was created a marshal of France and a count. When Marshal Saint-Arnaud was sent in command of the army of the East, he succeeded to the office of minister of war. B. at Dijon, 1790.

VAILLANT, John Foy, an eminent French numismatist, who studied medicine, in which he took his doctor's degree in his 24th year. Having shown an extraordinary knowledge of ancient coins, he was selected by Colbert to collect medals in Italy and the East for the royal cabinet. On his return he was taken by the Algerines. After a captivity of four months, he recovered his liberty, and being in danger of shipwreck, he swallowed some of his most valuable medals. In 1702 he became pensionary of the Academy of Inscriptions. His principal works were,—"History of the Cæsars;" "Seleucidarum Imperium;" "Historia Ptolemæorum Ægypti Regum;" "Nummi Antiqui Familiarum Romanarum;" and "Numismata Græca." B. at Beauvais, 1632; D. at Paris, 1706.

VAILLANT, John Francis Foy, was son of the preceding, like whom, he was a learned physician and medalist. He wrote a treatise on the Nature and Use of Coffee, and a dissertation on the Cabiri. B. at Rome, 1665; D. 1708.

VAILLANT, Sebastian, an eminent French physician and botanist, who became superintendant of the Jardin du Roi and a member of the Academy of Sciences. His principal works were,—"Remarks on Tournefort's Botanical Institutions;" "Discourse on the Structure of Flowers;" "Botanicon Parisiense, or a Description of Plants which grow about Paris," with fine plates. B. at Vigny, near Pontoise, 1669: D. at Paris, 1722.

VAILLANT, Wallerant, an eminent Flemish portrait-painter, who was employed at the French court, and also assisted Prince Rupert in his experiments in mezzotint engraving. B. at Lille, 1623; D. at Amsterdam, 1677.

VAISON, vai'-sawng, a town of France, in the department of the Vaucluse, near the small river Ouvèze. In its vicinity are some ancient remains. Pop. 4,000.

VAJDA-HUNYAD, vaj'-da hoon'-yad, a market-town of Austrian Transylvania, 40 miles from Karlsburg. In its neighbourhood are the largest iron-mines in Transylvania. Pop. 2,000.

VAL, val, the prefix to numerous villages and small towns in Spain.

VALAIS, val'-ai, a canton in the south of Switzerland, bounded by the cantons of Uri, Berne, and Friburg, and in another direction by Savoy and the Lake of Geneva. Area, 1,665 square miles. Desc. It lies in the direction of north-east and south-west, and is of an oblong form, its length being about 100 miles, and its medium breadth from 25 to 30. It is the largest valley in Switzerland, watered in its whole extent by the Rhone, and bordered on the north, as on the south, by the loftiest mountains in Europe. Cattle-rearing is the principal branch of industry. Pop. about 82,000.—It holds the twentieth rank in the Swiss confederation. Under the empire of Napoleon I., it formed the department Simplon. The capital is the small town of Sion.

VALBENOITE, val-be-noit', a parish and town of France, in the department Loire, 1 mile from St. Etienne, of which it is a suburb. Pop. 6,000.

VALCKENAER, Louis Caspar, valk'-nar, an eminent Dutch philologist and philosopher, who, in 1755, was appointed professor of Greek and archæology in the university of Leyden, a post he retained until his death. His works, which are esteemed as among the most masterly of those treating upon the learning of antiquity, principally are,—editions, with notes, of some of the works of Euripides; the Idylls of Theocritus; and dissertations upon Herodotus, Callimachus, and others. B. at Leeuwarden, Friesland, 1715; D. at Leyden, 1785.

VALCKENAER, Jan, an eminent Dutch jurist, who was son of the preceding. In 1787 he was appointed professor of jurisprudence at Utrecht; but having participated in the movement against William V., stadtholder of the Netherlands, he was, upon the intervention of Prussia, compelled to quit Holland. With other members of the patriotic party, he went to Paris, where he remained until the French army under Pichegru entered the Netherlands, when he was enabled to return to Leyden, and to be nominated professor of public law. He subsequently acted as ambassador of the Batavian republic at the courts of Madrid and Berlin. After Louis Napoleon became king of Holland, Valckenaer was dispatched upon a mission to Napoleon I., to plead against the contemplated annexation of Holland to the French empire. Upon the abdication of Louis Napoleon, he retired into private life, and passed his remaining years in the study of jurisprudence. His works upon political affairs are characterized by eloquence and close reasoning. B. at Leyden, 1759; D. near Haarlem, 1821.

VAL DE PENAS, val dai pain'-yas, a town of Spain, on the Jabalon, 30 miles from Ciudad Real. It is celebrated for its wines. Pop. 10,000.

VALDIVIA, val-div'-i-a, the most S. province of Chili, on the sea-coast, on both sides of the great river Valdivia, and everywhere inclosed, except on the W., by Independent Araucania. Estimated area, 740 square miles. Pop. 6,800. Lat. about 40° S. Lon. 73° W.

VALDIVIA, the capital of the above province, a celebrated city and strong fortress, on the river of its name, 9 miles from the sea. It was founded in the year 1551, by the conqueror Pedro de Valdivia, who gave it his name, and obtained immense sums of gold from its vicinity. In 1590 it was taken and plundered by the Araucanians, the native inhabitants of the country. It was again rebuilt and fortified by the Spaniards. It has since suffered severely from fire, which twice almost entirely destroyed it, and, in 1837, was ruined by an earthquake. The harbour is situate in a beautiful bay, formed by the river, and is the safest, the strongest from its natural position, and the most capacious of any of the ports in the South Sea. Lat. 39° 48′ S. Lon. 73° 19′ 30″ W.

VALDUGGIA, val-dooj'-a, a town of Sardinia, Piedmont, 22 miles from Novara. Pop. 3,200.

VALEGGIO, va-lej'-o, a town of Lombardy, 7 miles from Peschiero. It has a fortified bridge about 550 yards long, defended by lofty towers. Pop. 4,000.

VALENÇA-DO-MINHO, va-lain'-sa, a small town and fortress of Portugal, on the Minho, 56 miles from Oporto, immediately opposite Tuy. Pop. 1,200.

VALENÇAY, va-lain'-sai, a town of France, in the department of the Indre, on the Nahon, 25 miles from Châteauroux. Pop. about 4,000. Here Napoleon I. retained Ferdinand VII. of Spain a prisoner.

VALENCE, va'-lănce', a town of France, in the department of the Drôme, on the Rhone, 56 miles from Lyons. It is old, ill-built, and irregular, with narrow, winding, and dirty streets. The cathedral is an ancient building; but neither it nor the episcopal palace is architecturally distinguished. The case is otherwise with the Gothic façade of an old castle, which is said to be one of the finest specimens of that style in France. Besides these buildings, it has a barracks, a theatre, a court-house, a prison, a school of artillery, communal college, and chamber of manufactures. Manf. Silk goods; and there are dyeing establishments, cotton-printing works, and docks for building river-boats. Pop. 16,300.—Also the name of two other towns, neither with a population above 3,300.

VALENCIA, va-len'-she-a (Sp. va-len'-the-a), an old province in the east of Spain, extending in an oblong form from north to south, with the sea on one side and the Castilian provinces on the other. It now forms the provinces of Alicante, Valencia, and Castillon-de-la-Plana. United area, 7,880 square miles. Desc. Mountainous in the N.W., but in the centre fertile and well watered, with extensive rice-grounds in the neighbourhood of Lake Albufera. Rivers. The Xucar, the Segura, and the Guadalaviar, are the principal. Climate. Generally mild. Pro. Grapes, olives, oranges, figs, maize, wheat, wine, silk, flax, hemp, and rice. The sugar-cane is also cultivated, and, with the silk and hemp, yields valuable returns. Minerals. Salt, marble, and potter's clay. Pop. 1,111,060.

VALENCIA, a city in the E. of Spain, the capital of the above province, 3 miles from the sea, in an open plain, on the Guadalaviar, here crossed by five wide bridges. It is surrounded by a rampart pierced by eight gateways; but its citadel is small and ill fortified, and does not even command the town. The interior, far from meriting the eulogium of Mariana, or the flattering epithet of Valencia la Bella, consists of narrow and winding streets, crossed by a multiplicity of lanes, in many of which there are no thoroughfares. Of the different public walks, the chief is that which extends along the banks of the river. It contains a large number of churches and convents, with several hospitals, besides public buildings, less remarkable for elegance than for antiquity and profuse decoration. The ancient palace, called El Real, is now the residence of the captain-general. The cathedral is a large but irregular Gothic building, with a tower 162 feet high. The other remarkable structures are, a Moorish mosque, a church built for Christian worship in the time of the Goths, and several modern edifices; such as the college of Pio Quinto, the convent of the Carmelites, the lodge or place of meeting for the commercial court, the custom-house, the college of the patriarch, &c. It is the see of an archbishop, and the seat of a supreme court of justice. The university was founded in 1470, and is on an extensive scale, but the course of study is antiquated. It has seventy professors, and a library of upwards of 15,000 volumes. Its academies are also numerous, and it has a seminary for nobles. Manf. Silk, linen, and woollen fabrics, hats, leather, Valencia tiles for flooring, glass, artificial flowers, and paper. Pop. about 75,000. Lat. 39° 28′ N. Lon. 0° 24′ W. In 1811 it was attacked by Suchet, and, after a vigorous siege and bombardment, it surrendered in January, 1812.

VALENCIA, or TACARAGUA, LAKE of, a beautiful lake of South America, in the government of Caraccas. Ext. 22 miles long, with an average breadth of 6. It has an oblong form, and lies about 3 miles to the E. of a city of the same name, in a valley surrounded with mountains. It contains many islands, and receives the river Aragua.

VALENCIA, a city of South America, in the government of the Caraccas and province of Venezuela, situate about 3 miles west of the lake of the same name. The houses are in general low and irregular, though some of the streets are broad and well built. The parish church, and a handsome square in which it stands, form the principal ornaments of the city. It covers a large surface, and the inhabitants are commercial and industrious. Pop. 16,000. Valencia, with the towns of Victoria and Barquisimeto, suffered very much from the earthquake which overthrew Caraccas, La Guayra, Merida, and several villages, in March, 1812.

VALENCIA, a county of the United States, in the S.E. of New Mexico. Pop. 15,000.

VALENCIA DE ALCANTARA, a small but strongly-fortified town of Spain, on a height near the frontier of Portugal, 25 miles from Alcantara. It has a citadel, barracks, and is supposed to occupy the site of the ancient Contrasta. Manf. Linens, leather, and hats. Pop. 5,000.

VALENCIA DEL VENTOSO, dail ven-to'-so, a town of Spain, 42 miles from Badajoz. Manf. Linens and sackings. Pop. 3,000.

VALENCIENNES, va-lan'-se-en, a fortified town of France, in the department of the North, on the Scheldt, 28 miles from Lille. Its form is circular, and its streets narrow and crooked. The public square, the church of Notre Dame, the town-hall, the artillery-house, asylums, military hospitals, a barracks, a museum, and a theatre, are the principal public buildings. Manf. Lace of great fineness; cambric, gauze, linen stuffs, gold and silver tissues, beet-root sugar, toys, earthenware, and leather. Pop. 24,000. It was often taken and retaken during the revolutionary war. It is the native place of Froissart, the historian.

VALENS, Flavius, vai'-lens, emperor of the East, was the son of Gratian, and became the colleague, in the government of the Roman empire, of his brother Valentinian, in 364. A zealous Arian, he violently persecuted the orthodox bishops. He forced the Goths to make peace, but imprudently suffered them to settle in Thrace, where they were joined by great numbers of barbarians, and the war being renewed, he marched against them, but was totally defeated near Adrianople. His soldiers carried him to his tent, which the barbarians set on fire, the emperor perishing in the flames.

VALENTIA, or KENMORE, va-len'-she-a, an island in the Atlantic, near the south-west coast of Ireland, south of Dingle Bay. Ext. 6 miles long, with a breadth of 2. Lat. 51° 55′ 8″ N. Lon. 10° 19′ W.—The Submarine Electric Telegraph, designed to communicate with America, was laid from this place.

VALENTINE, văl'-en-tine, an Egyptian heresiarch and a philosopher of the Platonic sect. Disappointed of a bishopric, he separated from the church, and improved upon the Gnostic notion of Æons, certain beings, as he pretended, by whom the world was created and governed, a schism in which he obtained many followers. Flourished in the 2nd century.

VALENTINE, Basil, a celebrated German alchemist, who was one of the founders of the chemical science. His writings have been translated into Latin and English. The principal are,—"The Triumphant Chariot of Antimony," "The Twelve Keys of Philosophy," and "Testament of Basil Valentine." Flourished in the 16th century.

VALENTINIAN I., văl'-en-tin'-i-an, emperor of the West, was the eldest son of Gratian. He divided the Roman empire into two portions, giving the east to his brother Valens, in 364, after which he defeated the Germans, and quelled the revolt in Africa. The Quadi and Sarmatæ having taken up arms in 374, he marched against them, and ravaged their country with fire and sword, which compelled them to sue for peace; but while he was addressing their ambassadors, he broke a blood-vessel, through excitement, of which he died, in 375.

VALENTINIAN II. was saluted emperor on his father's death, by the soldiery; but being only four years of age at that time, he was not, in reality, emperor until his brother Gratian's death, in 383. He was dethroned by the usurper Maximus, in 387; but Theodosius, after defeating Maximus, restored him in the year following. In 392, Valentinian II. was strangled by his general Arbogastes. He was a prince of many virtues and eminent piety.

VALENTINIAN III., emperor of the West, was the nephew of Theodosius II., and acknowledged emperor in 423, at the age of six years, under the guardianship of his mother Placidia, who governed with great prudence; but when Valentinian came of age, he plunged into debauchery, and ruled with such tyranny that he was assassinated in 455.

VALENZA, va-lain'-tza, a town of Italy, Piedmont, 7 miles from Alessandria, on an eminence near the Po. It is inclosed by walls, entered by four gates, and contains several churches. Manf. Soap and leather. Pop. 7,500.

VALERIANUS, Publius Licinius, va-lee'-ri-ai'-nus, a Roman, who was proclaimed emperor by the soldiery in 253. He associated his son Gallienus with himself in the government, and persecuted the Christians. He made war on the Goths and Scythians with some success, but was taken prisoner in an expedition against Sapor, king of Persia, who carried him to his capital in triumph, and treated him with great barbarity. After his death, which happened in 260, of grief, he ordered his body to be flayed, and, the skin being tanned, was nailed up in a Persian temple.

VALERIANUS, Pierius, a learned Italian, who became apostolic notary under Leo X. and Julius II., having previously refused a bishopric. His chief works are Latin poems. B. in the state of Venice, about 1475; D. 1553.

VALERIUS, Publius, va-lee'-ri-us, a celebrated Roman, surnamed Publicola, for his popularity. He assisted Brutus to expel the Tarquins, and was the first to take an oath to support the liberty and independence of his country. He gained the victory in the battle in which Brutus and the son of Tarquin fell. Publicola became four times consul, and, after his death, received the thanks which a people redeemed from slavery usually pay to their deliverers. He was so poor that his body was buried at the public expense. The Roman matrons mourned his death a whole year.

VALERIUS FLACCUS. (See FLACCUS, Caius Valerius.)

VALERIUS MAXIMUS, a Latin historian, who served with Sextus Pompeius in the Roman army in Asia; and at his return wrote a collection of remarkable actions and sayings of eminent Romans, dedicated to Tiberius. It was translated into English by Speed, and published in 1678. Flourished at the commencement of the 1st century.

VALERY, ST., val'-e-re, a seaport of France, on the Somme, near its mouth, 50 miles from Amiens. It has a school of navigation, salt-magazines, rope-walks, and docks for building small vessels. Pop. 3,750.

VALERY EN CAUX, ST., a town of France, in the department of the Lower Seine, on the shores of the Channel, 16 miles from Dieppe. Manf. Cotton twist; and it has soda-works and an active herring-fishery. Pop. 5,500.

VALESIUS, Henricus, or HENRY DE VALOIS, val'-waw, a learned French critic, who was educated for the legal profession, which he abandoned, and devoted himself to literary pursuits. His merit procured him the place of historiographer to the king, and a pension. He also received another from the clergy of France for publishing an edition of the Greek ecclesiastical historians. His life of excessive study caused him to become blind. B. at Paris, 1603; D. at the same city, 1676.

VALESIUS, or VALOIS, Adrian de, brother of the preceding, was also royal historiographer, and published, among other works, a History of France from 254 to 752. B. at Paris, 1607; D. 1692.

VALETTA, or VALLETTA, LA, va-let'-ta, the capital of the island of Malta, standing on its N.E. coast, between a fine double harbour. It consists of five parts, which are distinguished by particular names. 1. Citta Nuova, or La Valetta, properly so called, built in 1566. It is situate on the side of a hill, which runs out into the sea, forming a peninsula; and, besides its own fortifications, is defended by the castles of St. Elmo, Ricasoli, and St. Angelo. 2. Citta Vittoriosa, situate on a small tongue of land between two harbours called Marza and Marza Murzet, with a fort at the extremity, which defends the entrance into both. 3. Sanglea, or the isle of St. Michael, also situate on a peninsula, and separated from Citta Vittoriosa by a canal called Porto delle Galere. 4. Barmola, a small place, situate in front of Sangles, and surrounded by—5. Cottonera, which forms a kind of suburb to it. This last contains the castle of Santa Margaretha. The situation of La Valetta is one of the finest in the world: the appearance of the town from the sea is beautiful, and the interior corresponds. The streets are regular, and well paved with lava; and the quays and other public places contain large, and, in some respects, elegant buildings. The principal are the palace, or residence of the grand master, now occupied by his successor, the governor of the island, the house in which the knights of the seven different nations composing the order of Malta had their respective halls of meeting (it is gorgeously furnished, and has a fine armoury); the town-house, the Castellanea, where the courts of justice are held; the arsenal, and a building situate in Citta Vittoriosa, formerly occupied by the Inquisition; the cathedral, the public museum and library of 60,000 volumes; an exchange, a theatre, a barracks; numerous churches, besides the English collegiate church of St. Paul, founded by the late Queen Adelaide, at a cost of £15,000. There is also a university, and it is the seat of all the principal authorities and the commercial centre of the island. Charitable institutions, connected as they were with the objects of the order of Malta, were long on a liberal footing at La Valetta. The hospital of St. John received between 400 and 500 patients. But the funds for the support of this institution were seized by the French, and the building was afterwards given by the British government to the medical department of the civil staff. Here are also three other hospitals. The town is supplied with water by the aqueduct Vignacourt. La Valetta is, from its excellent harbour, of great importance as a naval station and a place of trade. On the south side of Citta Nuova is one of the finest bays in the world. This beautiful basin is divided into five distinct harbours, all equally safe, and each capable of containing a considerable number of vessels. The entrance is hardly a quarter of a mile wide, and is commanded on each side by strong batteries. It is also fronted by a quadruple battery. In the centre is a small island, on which are a lazaretto and a castle. The harbour on the other side would be highly prized in any other part of the world, but is here used for fishing-vessels and ships performing quarantine. The fortifications of the town are of extraordinary strength. The trade here is very considerable, serving partly as an intermediate station for the Ionian Isles and the Levant. It has, in Sanglea, a royal dockyard and docks for shipbuilding. Pop. with suburbs, about 64,000. Lat. 35° 53′ 8″ N. Lon. 14° 31′ 2″ E.—In 1798 it was occupied by the French, and, in 1801, taken by the British.

VALGORGE, val-gorje, a market-town of France, in the department Ardèche, 9 miles from Largentière. Pop. 1,500.

VALGUARNERA, val-gar-nai'-ra, a town of the island of Sicily, 25 miles from Noto. Pop. 5,500.

VALKI, or WALKI, val'-ke, a town of European Russia, on an affluent of the Donetz, 26 miles from Karkov. It has numerous churches. Pop. 9,000.

VALLA, Lorenzo, val'-la, a learned Italian writer, and the most profound scholar of his time. He revived the Latin language from Gothic barbarity; but having hazarded some free opinions respecting the doctrines of the Romish church, he was condemned to be burnt alive, but was saved by Alphonso, king of Naples. He was next confined in a monastery; but Pope Nicholas V., who respected his talents, called him to Rome, appointed him professor of rhetoric, and afterwards his secretary, and gave him a pension. His most important works were,—"On the Elegance of the Latin Language;" "History of the Reign of Ferdinand, King of Aragon;" translations of Thucydides, Herodotus, and Homer's Iliad; notes on the New Testament; treatise on Falsehood and Truth; and Fables. B. at Rome, about 1407; D. at the same city, 1457.

VALLADOLID, val'-la-do-lid' (Sp. val'-ya-do-leed'), an ancient city in the interior of Spain, on the Pisuerga, 26 miles from Palencia. It was formerly a town of great importance, but now decayed edifices are almost the only indication of its ancient splendour. The streets are dirty, and many of the houses in ruins. There are, however, two squares, one of which, the Plaza Mayor, contains some good buildings. The cathedral, begun by Philip II., has never been finished. The monastery of San Benito is a handsome building, and the church of St. Paul contains some good sculptures and paintings. The town has six gates, one large bridge, and a number of small ones; also several churches and hospitals. It has, also, a university, chiefly distinguished for jurisprudence, and well attended. It is the residence of a captain-general, and is a see suffragan to that of Toledo. Manf. Silk, cotton, and woollen stuffs; perfumery, jewellery, hats, paper, earthenware, and leather. There is also a trade in white wines, madder, and olives, raised in the neighbourhood. Pop. 21,000. Here Columbus died, in 1506.

VALLADOLID, or MECHOACAN, an episcopal city of the Mexican Confederation, situate in a fine valley, near the west side of a lake, about 120 miles west of Mexico. It is adorned with a fine cathedral and some handsome houses of rich Spaniards. Pop. 18,000. Here Iturbide, the emperor of Mexico, was born.

VALLADOLID, a city of Central America, in Yucatan, 90 miles from Merida. Its principal edifices are a cathedral and a town-house. Pop. 15,000. The suburbs of this place consist merely of mud huts peopled by Indians.

VALLATA, val-la'-ta, a town of Naples, in the province of Principato-Ultra, 12 miles from Ariano. Pop. 4,500.

VALLE, Pietro della, val'-lai, an Italian traveller, who journeyed through Turkey, Egypt, the Holy Land, Persia, and India, and, on his return to Rome, published an account of his travels in 54 letters, portions of which have been translated into English. B. at Rome, 1586; D. at the same city, 1652.

VALLENDAR, val-len'-dar, a town of Rhenish Prussia, on the Rhine, 3 miles from Coblentz. Manf. Leather and cloth. Pop. 3,200.

VALLENGIN, val-lain'-zha, a town of Switzerland, in the Val de Ruz, 2 miles from Neufchâtel. Pop. 6,400.

VALLERAUGUE, val'-rôg, a town of France, in the department Gard, on the Herault, 40 miles from Nîmes. Pop. 4,000.

VALLET, val'-lai, a town of France, in the Lower Loire, 12 miles from Nantes. Pop. 6,400.

VALLETTA, LA. (See VALETTA, LA.)

VALLIÈE, ST., val-le'-ai, the name of several parishes and villages of France, none of them with a population above 3,100.

VALLIEVO, val-le'-vo, a town of Servia, 55 miles from Belgrade. It is said to have well-frequented markets. Pop. 4,600.

VALLISNIERI, Antonio, val-lis-ne-ai'-re, an eminent Italian naturalist, who studied under Malpighi, and afterwards became physician to the pope. His works abound in curious discoveries in natural history and medicine. B. near Modena, 1661; D. 1730.

VALLON, val'-lawng, the name of several parishes and towns of France, none of them with a population above 3,000.

VALLORBE, val'-lorb, a town of Switzerland, in the canton Vaud, 8 miles from Orbe. Pop. 1,600.

VALLS, vals, a town of Spain, standing in a plain watered by the Francoli, 8 miles from Tarragona. It has a church, several monasteries and poor-houses. Manf. Cotton and woollen yarns, leather, and soap. There are, also, brandy-distilleries. Pop. 11,100.—Here the French defeated the Spaniards in 1809; but they, in their turn, were defeated in 1811.

VALMONT DE BOMARE, val'-mawng, an eminent French naturalist, who was intended for the legal profession, and during some years pursued a course of study to qualify him for practising at the French bar; but, at length, his greater love for natural science caused him to abandon jurisprudence altogether. The Duke d'Argenson provided him with the means of visiting the chief cities of Europe, and, in 1756, he returned to the French capital with a valuable collection of objects of natural history. During the interval 1756-88, he read lectures upon natural history at Paris, and was offered professorships in Portugal and Russia, but refused. His most important works were—"Dictionnaire raisonné Universel d'Histoire Naturelle," Catalogue of a Cabinet of Natural History, and "New Exposition of the Mineral Kingdom." B. at Rouen, 1731; D. at Paris, 1807.

VALMY, val'-me, a town of France, in the department of the Marne, 5 miles from St. Menehould. Pop. Small.—In 1792 the Prussians were here defeated by the French.

VALOGNES, val'-lone, a town of France, in the department Manche, in a valley on the small river Merderet, 10 miles from Cherbourg. It contains an hospital and several churches. Manf. Gloves, lace, and hats. Pop. 6,400.

VALOUR. (See AVOLONA.)

VALPARAISO, val-pa-rí'-so, the principal seaport in Chili, S. America, on a bay in the South Pacific Ocean, 60 miles from Santiago. It was formerly a very small village; but, in process of time, the excellence of the harbour, which is defended by forts, drew many foreign vessels to it, and the merchants built themselves houses; since which it has gradually increased. It stands on a steep declivity, and is mostly constructed of sun-dried bricks. The residences of most of the merchants are in the suburb Almendral. It monopolizes most of the foreign trade of Chili, and exports wheat, tallow, hides, copper, gold, indigo, wool, and drugs. Its imports consist of European manufactures, and it has a number of coasting vessels. Pop. 45,000. Lat. 33° 1′ 9″ S. Lon. 71° 41′ 5″ W.

VALPY, Rev. Richard, väl'-pe, an eminent English classical scholar, who became head master of the grammar-school at Reading, which establishment rose to a high reputation under his direction. He was the author of, among other works, a Greek grammar and a Latin grammar. B. in the island of Jersey, 1754; D. in London, 1836.—His son, the Rev. Francis Valpy, succeeded him in the mastership of the Reading school. Another son, A. J. Valpy, settled in business, in London, as a printer, and produced a number of learned works; among others, an edition of the "Thesaurus" of Stephens, and some of the Greek and Latin classics.

VALRÉAS, val-rai'-a, a town of France, in the department Vaucluse, 32 miles from Avignon. Pop. 5,000.

VALSALVA, Antonio Maria, val-sal'-va, a famous Italian physician, who became professor of anatomy at Bologna, and wrote a valuable treatise concerning the human ear, and some anatomical dissertations in Latin. B. at Imola, 1666; D. at Bologna, 1723.

VALSTAGNA, val-stan'-ya, a town of Lombardy, on the Brenta, 22 miles from Vicenza. Manf. Tyrolese hats, and it has a trade in charcoal. Pop. 2,300.

VALTELINE, val-te-leen', a lordship of Italy, now forming the greater part of the delegation or district of Sondrio, which, with Chiavenna, Bormio, and Tirano, are its principal towns. Area, 1,270 square miles. It consists of a long valley, traversed by the Adda.

VALVERDE, val-vair'-dai, the name of numerous towns in Spain, none of them with a population above 5,500.

VAN, van, a fortified city of Turkish Armenia, and the capital of a pashalic, situate on a lake of the same name, 140 miles from Erzeroum. It is surrounded with a good wall and a deep ditch, and has four gates. To the north, on a high and perpendicular rock, stands the castle, and it has Armenian churches, mosques, baths, caravanserais, besides some large remains attributed to Semiramis. The city is well built; the houses of stone and tile, and the streets spacious and well paved. It is said that it employs above 500 looms in manufacturing cotton goods for the Persian market. Pop. Variously estimated from 15,000 to 50,000.—The PASHALIC consists of a lofty basin encompassed by precipitous mountains, its centre being occupied by the Lake of Van. Area, 1,200 square miles. It produces corn, fruit, wine, flax, tobacco, timber, gall-nuts, cotton, honey, and manna. Its pastures are good, and large numbers of live-stock are reared. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. between 37° and 39° 30′ N. Lon. between 41° and 44° 30′ E.

VAN ACHEN, Hans, fan a'-kens, a celebrated German painter, who was much employed by the emperor Rudolph II. His works have been reproduced by the most eminent engravers of the 17th century. B. at Cologne, 1552; D. at Prague, 1615.

VANBRUGH, Sir John, van'-broo, a celebrated English dramatic writer and architect, who was descended of a family which had taken refuge in England during Alva's tyrannical rule in the Netherlands. After acquiring some celebrity as an architect, he commenced writing for the stage about 1695, producing "The Provoked Wife," "The Confederacy," and "The Relapse; or, Virtue in Danger," comedies which still hold their place on the stage. He was for some time Clarencieux king-of-arms, and in 1716 was appointed surveyor of Greenwich Hospital. He was also comptroller-general of works, and surveyor of the royal gardens. Sir John built several superb edifices, the principal of which is Blenheim, the seat of the duke of Marlborough. B. either in London or Cheshire, 1666; D. in London, 1726.

VAN BUREN, bu'-ren, the name of several counties in the United States. 1. In Michigan. Area, 633 square miles. Pop. 6,000.—2. In Iowa. Area, 450 square miles. Pop. 13,000.—3. In Arkansas. Pop. 3,000.—Also the name of several townships.

VANCOUVER (or QUADRA AND VANCOUVER) ISLAND, van-koo'-ner, in British N. America, separated from the mainland by the Gulf of Georgia and Queen Charlotte's Sound. Ext. 300 miles long, with a breadth of 75. Area, 16,000 square miles. Desc. Mountainous and well wooded, with numerous harbours on its W. coast and Nootka Sound. Coal has been discovered. Pop. Uncertain; perhaps 14,000, living mostly by fishing and hunting. Lat. between 48° 20′ and 51° N. Lon. between 123° and 128° W. This island was made over to the Hudson's Bay Company, who, in 1843, erected Fort Victoria upon it. (See QUADRA.)

VANCOUVER FORT is the chief settlement of the Hudson's Bay Company W. of the Rocky Mountains. It is on the N. side of Columbia river, and consists of a picketed inclosure, comprising an elementary school, dwellings, workshops, granaries, a village, large farms, with fine prairies and woods.

VANCOUVER, Captain George, a celebrated English navigator, who entered the royal navy at the age of 13, and accompanied Cook on his second and third voyages round the world. He was subsequently employed in exploring the north-west coast of America, the Sandwich Islands, and the coast of South America. He was the author of a "Voyage of Discovery to the North Pacific Ocean, and Round the World, in the years 1790-95." D. 1798.

VAN DALE, Antony, van dail, a learned Dutch physician, who was at first engaged in mercantile pursuits, which he quitted for the study of physic. He wrote a "Treatise on the Oracles," which was abridged by Fontenelle; and was also the author of a work on the "Origin and Progress of Idolatry," a "Dissertation on Aristeas and the Septuagint Version," &c. B. 1638; D. at Haerlem, 1708.

VANDERBURG, van'-der-berg, a county of the United States, in Indiana. Area, 240 square miles. Pop. 12,000.

VANDERMEER, Jan, van'-der-meer, an eminent Dutch painter, who excelled in painting landscapes and sea-views. B. at Rotterdam, 1627; D. subsequently to 1674.—His brother was also a clever artist in representing landscapes and animals.

VANDER-MEULEN, Antony Francis, van'-der-mu'-len, a celebrated Flemish painter, who settled at Paris, and excelled in painting horses, hunting-parties, sieges, and battles. He executed representations on the spot of most of the actions in which Louis XIV. was engaged. His best works are in the Louvre and at Versailles. B. at Brussels, 1634; D. at Paris, 1690.

VANDER-MEULEN, Peter, brother of the preceding, was engaged to paint battle-pieces for William III. of England.

VANDER-MONDE, Charles Augustin, van'-der-monde, an eminent physician, who wrote a "Collection of Medical and Surgical Observations," "Essay on the Manner of Perfecting the Human Species," and "Dictionary of Health." D. at Macao, 1727; B. at Paris, 1762.

VANDERVELDE, Adrian, van'-der-veld, an eminent Dutch painter, who excelled in painting landscapes, which he adorned with figures. He also painted historical subjects, and all his works are scarce and valuable. B. at Amsterdam, 1639; D. 1672.

VANDERVELDE, or VANDEVELDE, William, called the Old, a celebrated Dutch painter. In consequence of the successful manner in which he depicted the naval engagements between the English and Dutch, he was invited to England by Charles II., in 1675, and obtained a pension from the crown. B. at Leyden, 1610; D. in England, 1693.

VANDERVELDE, William, styled the Younger, an eminent Dutch painter, and son of the preceding. He painted, like his father, sea-pieces and shipping. B. at Amsterdam, 1633; D. in London, 1707.

VAN DIEMEN'S LAND, or TASMANIA, van de'-mens lănd, tas-mai'-ni-a, an island and British colony in the Southern Ocean, separated from Australia by Bass's Straits, 150 miles across. Ext. About 180 miles long, and, at its widest points, about the same. Area, 27,000 square miles. Desc. Greatly diversified, but generally mountainous. Many fine tracts of land are found on the very borders of the sea, and the interior is almost invariably possessed of a soil admirably adapted to all the purposes of civilized man. The highest mountains are Wylde's Craig and Benlomond, which respectively attain an elevation of 4,500 and 4,200 feet above the level of the sea. There are many other peaks scattered over the island, rising to a height of from 3,000 to 4,000 feet. A chain, called the Western Mountains, runs N. and S., and averages a height of 3,500 feet. It includes many lakes, and there is, perhaps, no island in the world of the same size which can boast of so many fine harbours: the best are the Derwent, Port Davy, Macquarie Harbour, Port Dalrymple, and Oyster Bay. In the S.E. the coasts are indented with many bays, such as Storm, Ralph, and Norfolk. It has also the Tasman and Forrestier peninsulas, and Hobart Town, with the Brime and Maria islands, lying off this coast. Rivers. Of these, the Derwent, Huon, and Tamar rank in the first class. There are also the Clyde and the Isis. Zoology. There is almost a perfect resemblance between the animals and vegetables found here and in Australia. In the animals, in particular, there is scarcely any variation. The native dog, indeed, is unknown here; but there is an animal of the panther tribe in its stead, which, though not found in such numbers as the native dog is in Australia, commits dreadful havoc among the flocks. Kangaroos are abundant. In the feathered tribes of the two islands there is scarcely any diversity; of this, the wattle-bird, which is about the size of a snipe, and considered a very great delicacy, is the only instance that can be cited. Whales frequent the coasts. Climate. Healthy, and congenial to the European constitution. Pro. Barley, oats, and potatoes arrive at great perfection. The wheat is also of a superior description, and the fruits comprise the apple, currant, gooseberry, and, indeed, all such as are suitable to a temperate climate. Horses, horned cattle, sheep, goats, and swine, are all extensively reared. Timber is plentiful. Minerals. Coal, with iron, copper, and several other metallic ores; but few, if any, mines are wrought. Sandstone, limestone, and basalt, are amongst the principal geological formations. Exp. Chiefly wool. Shipbuilding is, to some extent, carried on at Hobart Town and on the banks of the Huon, and a number of vessels are engaged in the whale-fisheries. The colony has been erected into an episcopal see, and there are numerous places of worship for different denominations of Christians. In connection with these there are also numerous schools. Besides these, there are several public hospitals and a lunatic asylum. The administration is vested in a governor and legislative council appointed by the crown, and in acts of the British parliament. Pop. about 80,000; many of whom are liberated convicts. Lat. between 40° 44′ and 43° 39′ S. Lon. between 144° 38′ and 148° 24′ E.—This island was first discovered by Tasman, in 1633. In 1773 it was visited by Captain Furneaux, and by Captain Cook in 1777; since which period it has been visited by different navigators. Among others, Bruny D'Entrecasteaux, the French rear-admiral, made the coast of Van Diemen's Land in 1792, and afterwards revisited it in 1793. This coast was afterwards explored by Lieutenants Bass and Flinders, who made a more ample survey of it than had ever been attempted by any preceding navigator. Since this period, several colonies have been sent from the original establishment made by the British at Port Jackson, to this island. In 1804 Hobart's Town was founded about 9 miles up the Derwent; and another settlement, namely, Launceston, was founded about 30 miles from the mouth of Port Dalrymple, and 130 miles in a straight line from Hobart's Town. The two settlements were long in a very bad state of defence, having but two companies of troops for the garrison and protection of them both. They were consequently infested for many years by banditti of runaway convicts, known as bushrangers, who endangered the person and property of every one who evinced himself hostile to their enormities.—At the request of the colonists, the name of Van Diemen's Land was changed to that of Tasmania; but it is as often called by its old name as its new.

VAN DIEMEN, CAPE, the most N. point of Melville Island, N. Australia. Lat. 11° 8′ S. Lon. 130° 20′ E.

VANDYCK, Sir Anthony, văn'-dike, a famous Dutch painter, who was educated under Rubens. He resided some time at Rome, and then removed to Genoa, where he was employed by Prince Philibert of Savoy, and other high personages. On his return to Flanders, his reputation rose to such a height that Cardinal Richelieu invited him to settle in France; but he preferred visiting England, where he had previously been, and was employed by Charles I., who conferred on him the honour of knighthood. His greatest works were executed in England, where he married a daughter of the earl of Gowry. He painted historical subjects, particularly a descent from the cross, at Antwerp; but his fame mostly rests upon his portraits of royal and noble personages. His masterpieces are held to be the portrait of the earl of Strafford, at Wentworth House, and the head of Gevartius, in the National Gallery, which last is, however, believed by some to be the work of Rubens. His remains were interred in St. Paul's Cathedral. B. at Antwerp, 1599; D. in London, 1641.

VANE, Sir Henry, vain, an English patriot, was eldest son of Sir Henry Vane, secretary of state to Charles I. After studying at Oxford, he went to Geneva, where he imbibed a hatred of the principles upon which his native country was then governed; on which account he quarrelled with his father, and made a voyage to New England. He returned in 1637, and upon the breaking out of the civil war took an active part against the king. He, however, opposed the usurpation of Cromwell, who caused him to be imprisoned. After the restoration, he was one of the twenty excepted out of the act of general pardon, and was sent to the Tower. In 1662 he was brought to trial for high treason, found guilty, and beheaded on Tower-hill. He wrote some political and theological works. B. about 1612; executed, 1648.

VANIKORO, or PITT ISLAND, va'-ne-ko'-ro, lies in the Pacific Ocean, New Hebrides, in lat. 11° 35′ S.; lon. 166° 46′ E. Here, in 1788, La Perouse was wrecked and lost.

VANINI, Lucilio, va-ne'-ne, an Italian sceptic, who promulgated a pantheistical system of philosophy, out of the works of Aristotle, Averroes, and Cardan. He also preached upon his philosophy in Germany, Holland, and England. In 1617 he was arrested at Toulouse, and condemned to death by the parliament there. He wrote, according to some, in support of atheism; but others have defended him from the charge. B. in the province of Otronto, July, 1585; burnt alive in 1619.

VANLOO, John Baptist, van'-loo, a celebrated French artist, who painted many portraits of illustrious personages in so fine a style as to bear away the palm from every rival both in Paris and in London. B. at Aix, Provence, 1684; D. at the same city, 1746.—His two sons were also eminent as painters.

VANLOO, Charles Andrew, brother and pupil of the above. After visiting Italy, he became painter to Louis XV., chevalier of the order of St. Michael, and a member of the Academy of Painting. He painted many fine historical pictures for the king of France. According to Diderot, he could neither read nor write. B. at Nice, 1705; D. at Paris, 1765.

VANMANDER, Charles, van-man'-der, a Dutch historical and landscape painter, and poet, who executed works at Rome, Vienna, and in Holland. He set up an academy at Haerlem, and trained there many pupils, who afterwards became eminent as artists. In literature, he produced songs, translations of the "Iliad," Ovid's "Metamorphoses," and compiled the biographies of celebrated German, Dutch, and Italian painters. His principal pictures are,—"Adam and Eve in Paradise," and "The Deluge." B. near Courtray, 1548; D. at Amsterdam, 1606. At his death, 300 of his pupils and fellow townsmen attended his remains to the tomb.

VANNES, van, a town of France, on the coast of Brittany, and the chief place of the department of Morbihan, at the bottom of a bay interspersed with islets, about 2½ miles from the sea. Its houses are old-fashioned, and its streets narrow, with the exception of two. The only public buildings are the cathedral, the hospital, an old castle, now the prefecture, and the churches. It has several hospitals, other charities, a school of navigation, a college, and a public library. Manf. Woollens, linens, cottons, lace, and leather. Shipbuilding is carried on, and it has a brisk coasting trade. Pop. 14,000.

VANNI, Francis, van'-ne, an Italian historical painter, who chiefly painted religious subjects. B. at Sienna, 1565; D. at the same city, 1609.

VAN PRAET, prait, a celebrated bibliopolist, who became one of the conservators of the Bibliothèque Royale at Paris, and enriched that establishment by obtaining for it many valuable works. His principal work is entitled "Catalogue of Works Printed upon Vellum." B. at Bruges, 1754; D. at Paris, 1837.

VANSITTART BAY, van-sit'-tart, lies to the E. of Admiralty Gulf, in N.W. Australia. Lat. 14° S. Lon. 126° 19' E.

VANSOMER, Paul, van-so'-mer, a celebrated Flemish portrait-painter, who settled in England, where he was greatly encouraged by James I. and the nobility. Some of his portraits are at Hampton Court Palace. B. at Antwerp, about 1576; D. in London, 1621.

VAN SWIETEN, Gerard, swe'-ten, an eminent Dutch physician. He became the pupil of Boerhaave, after which he went to Vienna, where he was appointed physician and librarian to the empress Maria Theresa. He also lectured on the Materia Medica and Practice of Physic, with great reputation in that city, where he performed many eminent cures. His principal work is a Commentary on the "Aphorisms of Boerhaave," which has been translated into English. B. at Leyden, 1700; D. at Vienna, 1772.

VANUCCI. (See SARTO, Andrea del.)

VANVITELLI, Luigi, van-ve-tel'-le, a celebrated Italian architect, who was of Flemish extraction, and at first worked as a painter; but having studied architecture under Ivara, he made designs for several churches, and other works, which raised him to so high a reputation, that the king of Naples selected him as the architect of the palace at Caserta, one of the greatest edifices erected in the 18th century. He also designed the immense aqueducts which supply water to that palace, the cavalry barracks, and three churches at Naples. In 1757 he produced a work upon the Palace at Caserta. B. at Naples, 1700; D. 1773.

VAPEREAU, Louis Gustave, va'-pe-ro, a modern French littérateur, who, on completing his educational career, became the private secretary of Victor Cousin, and afterwards taught philosophy in the college of Tours. In 1852 he entered upon the study of jurisprudence, and was, two years later, admitted as an advocate. Soon afterwards, he was appointed editor of a work of considerable importance, entitled "Dictionnaire Universel des Contemporains," to which task he entirely devoted himself during four years. He also furnished some articles to another valuable work, entitled "Dictionnaire des Sciences Philosophiques." B. at Orleans, 1819.

VAR, var, a frontier river of France and Italy, rising in the Alps, and, after a course of 60 miles, falling into the Mediterranean, 5 miles from Antibes.

VAR, a department of France, forming the S.E. extremity of the kingdom, and bordered by the country of Nice on the E., by the Mediterranean on the S., and by a part of the Alps on the N. Area, 2,820 square miles. Desc. Mountainous; and, in general, rugged and uneven, the only extensive levels being along the coast. Rivers. The Var, Verdon, and Argens, with a number of smaller streams. Climate. This varies according to elevation. Pro. Corn, lemons, oranges, olive-oil, dried fruits, cork, and silk, which form the principal exports. Manf. Soap, paper, leather, coarse woollens, earthenware, and marble articles. Pop. 360,000.

VARADES, va-rad', a town of France, in the department of the Lower Loire, 28 miles from Nantes. Pop. 3,500. It has a station on the railway to Tours.

VARALLO, va-ral'-lo, a town of Sardinia, Piedmont, 30 miles from Novara. Manf. Iron and copper wares. Pop. 3,000. Not far from it is a hill called the Sacro Monte, on which are an elegant church with 48 oratories.

VARAZZE, or VARAZZIO, va-rat'-sai, a market-town of Sardinia, 18 miles from Genoa. Shipbuilding is carried on. Pop. 7,800.

VARCHI, Benedetto, var'-ke, a learned Italian writer, who became, under Cosmo I., duke of Florence, director of the New Florentine Academy. His principal work is the "History of Florence," from 1527 to 1538; but he was also the author of several poems, and a work entitled "Ercolano, or Dialogues on the Philosophy of Language." B. at Florence, 1502; D. at the same city, 1565.

VARENIUS, Bernhardus, va-re'-ni-us, an eminent Dutch physician, who wrote an excellent "System of Universal Geography," which was republished, with great improvements, by Sir Isaac Newton in 1672, and has been translated into English. He was also the author of a curious "Description of Japan and Siam." D. 1660.

VARENNES, va-ren', the name of numerous parishes, towns, and villages of France, none of them with a population above 3,000.

VARESE, va-rai'-sai, a town of Lombardy, 12 miles from Como. Manf. Principally silk. Pop. 8,500.

VARESE, a market-town of Sardinia, near the Apennines, and 14 miles from Chiavari. Pop. of parish, 7,000.

VARGAS, Francis, var'-gas, a celebrated Spanish jurisconsult, and ambassador from Charles V. to the council of Trent. On his return to Spain he was appointed a counsellor of state. He wrote a work on the "Jurisdiction of the Pope and Bishops," for which he incurred the resentment of the court of Rome; also, "Memoirs of the Council of Trent." D. 1560.

VARIGNON, Peter, va-reen'-yawng, an eminent French mathematician, who became professor of mathematics in the Mazarin College. His most important works are, a treatise on Mechanics, "Elements of Mathematics," treatise upon the Motion of running Waters, and numerous papers in the Memoirs of the Academy. B. at Caen, Normandy, 1654; D. at Paris, 1722.

VARILLAS, Antony, va'-reel-la, a French historian, who became historiographer to Gaston, duke of Orleans, and sub-librarian in the Royal Library at Paris. He wrote a "History of France;" "Anecdotes of Florence, or the Secret History of the House of Medici;" "History of the Revolution in Europe on account of Religion," and other works. B. at Guéret, La Marche, 1624; D. at Paris, 1696.

VARINAS, va-re'-nas, a town of S. America, in Venezuela, 90 miles from Truxillo. It has a parish church, an hospital, and an active trade in rural produce. Pop. 4,000.

VARIUS, Lucius, vair'-i-us, a Latin poet, who was the intimate friend of Virgil and Horace, and was appointed by Augustus to examine and revise the "Æneid." Some fragments only of his works have survived. D. about 11 B.C.

VARLEY, John, var'-le, an eminent English water-colour painter, who was among the first to produce works in that department of art which could exhibit either force or breadth of treatment,—all the water-colour drawings executed before his innovations having been little better than tinted engravings. Although in receipt of a large income, he became involved in difficulties, chiefly through his attachment to the study of astrology. B. in London, about 1777; D. 1842.

VARNA, var'-na, a town of European Turkey, in Bulgaria, at the bottom of a bay of the Black Sea, at the mouth of the river Varna, 46 miles from Shumla. It is surrounded by walls, entered by six gates, and defended by an old castle, with massive towers; and has numerous mosques, also some Greek churches. Its harbour is large and commodious, and a lake, formed by the waters from the neighbouring hills, extends through a series of marshes towards Shumla. Pop. 25,000. Here, in 1444, the Turks defeated the Hungarians; and, in 1828, the Russians took the town after a siege of three months. In 1854 the allied British and French armies, which had been here encamped, sailed hence for the Crimea.

VARNHAGEN VON ENSE, Karl August, varn-ha'-gen, a modern German miscellaneous writer, who, in early life, abandoned his studies to enter the Austrian army, and fought at the battle of Wagram, where he was wounded. He subsequently held a commission in the Russian army, but quitted it to enter the Prussian diplomatic service. He was at the congress of Vienna in 1814, and in the following year became minister at Carlsruhe. The most important of his numerous works were,— "History of the Vienna Congresses;" "Göthe from the testimony of his Contemporaries;" "Lives of General Seydlitz and Field-marshal Keith;" "Memoirs and Miscellaneous Writings;" and a treatise on the "Writing of History and Literature." B. at Dusseldorf, 1785.

VARNITZA, var-nit'-sa, a town of Lower Moldavia, near Bender. Pop. Unascertained, but small.

VARRO, Marcus Terentius, vär'-ro, a Roman writer. He served under Pompey against Cæsar, and upon the defeat of the former, retired from the army; and having conciliated the favour of Cæsar, he was employed in superintending the Greek and Latin libraries at Rome. Equally learned as an historian, grammarian, poet, and naturalist, he was extolled by all his contemporaries. He dedicated to Cicero a treatise on the Latin language, and he wrote a work upon agriculture, entitled "De Re Rusticâ," both of which are extant, with some fragments of his Menippean satires. B. at Rome, B.C. 116; D. B.C. 27.

VARRO, Publius Terentius, styled the Gaul, a Latin poet. He wrote a poem, "De Bello Sequanico," and translated into Latin verse the "Argonautics" of Apollonius. Only some fragments of these works remain. B. in Gallia Narbonensis, B.C. 82; D. B.C. 37.

VARS, var, a town of France, in the department Charente, 6 miles from Angoulême. Pop. 2,600.

VARSARHELLY, var-sar-hel'-le, a market-town of Hungary, on the Torna, 25 miles from Veszprim. Pop. 25,000, occupied in cultivating the grape and raising tobacco.—Another, on Lake Hodos, 14 miles from Szegedin. Pop. 35,000, similarly engaged.

VARSOVIE, var'-so-ve, the French name for Warsaw.

VARUS, Quintilius, vaï'-rus, a Roman proconsul, who was descended of an illustrious family. He was appointed governor of Syria, and afterwards became commander of the armies in Germany. Surprised by the enemy, under Arminius, his army was cut to pieces. When he saw that everything was lost, he killed himself A.D. 10. His head was afterwards sent to Augustus, at Rome, by one of the barbarian chiefs.

VARUS, Quintilius, a friend of Horace, and other great men in the Augustan age. He was a great critic, as Horace, in his "Art of Poetry," seems to imply. The poet has addressed the 18th ode of his first book to him, and in the 24th he pathetically mourns his death.

VARZY, var'-ze, a town in France, of the department of the Nièvre, 26 miles from Nevers. Pop. 3,500.

VASA, va'-sa, a seaport of Finland, on a bay of the Baltic, 55 miles from Christianstadt. Pop. 3,400. It was founded by Charles XII. of Sweden.

VASA. (See GUSTAVUS I.)

VASARHELY, or MAROS VASARHELY, va-shar-hel'-(e), a town of Austria, Transylvania, on the Maros, 8 miles from Vajs. It has a Roman Catholic gymnasium and a Protestant college. Pop. 10,000.

VASARI, George, va-sa'-re, an Italian painter, architect, and biographer, who studied under Del Sarto and Michael Angelo, and copied the remains of ancient sculpture; but he was deficient in colouring. He wrote the "Lives of celebrated Painters, Sculptors, and Architects." B. at Arezzo, 1512; D. at Florence, 1574.

VASCOSAN, Michael, vas'-ka-sa, an eminent French printer, who was one of the first of the Paris printers that discarded the use of the Gothic characters in their books. B. about 1500; D. about 1576.

VASQUEZ, Alphonso, vas'-kai, an eminent Spanish painter and sculptor, who was engaged to design the superb catafalque of Philip II. He likewise adorned the great edifices of Spain with frescoes and oil-paintings. B. 1575; D. 1645.

VASQUEZ, Gabriel, a celebrated Spanish theologian, who became professor of theology at Alcala, and afterwards at Rome. He obtained the surname of the "luminary of Spanish theology." B. 1551; D. 1604.

VASSY, vas'-se, a town of France, in the department of the Upper Marne, 27 miles from Chaumont. Pop. 3,000.—It is celebrated in history for the massacre of its Protestants, in 1562, by order of the duke of Guise.

VASTO, or VASTO D'AMMONE, vas'-to, a town of Naples, in Abruzzo Citra, on the coast of the Adriatic, 30 miles from Chiesi.—It is inclosed by walls, has a market-square, churches, several convents, a palace, and hospitals. Manf. Silks, woollen cloths, and earthenware. Pop. 9,000.

GUSTAVUS VASA.

VATABLUS, Francis, va'-ta-bloos, a learned French Orientalist, who became professor of Hebrew in the Royal College of Paris, and had so profound a knowledge of the Hebrew as to astonish the most learned Jews. He wrote notes for Stephens's Bible. These were condemned by the faculty of theology at Paris, but they are very highly esteemed. D. 1547.

VATAN, va'-ta, a town of France, in the department of the Indre, 11 miles from Issoudun. Pop. 3,300.

VATER, John Severin, fa'-ter, an eminent German philologist and theologian, who became professor of theology and Oriental languages at the university of Halle. His most important works were—a continuation of the "Mithridates" of Adelung, "Handbook of the Grammar of the Hebrew, Syriac, Chaldaic, and Arabic Languages;" "Ecclesiastical History and Exposition of the New Testament." B. at Altenburg, 1771; D. at Halle, 1826.

VATERSA, or WATERSA, waw'-ter-sa, an island of the Hebrides, Scotland, immediately S. of Barra, from which it is separated by a narrow sound. Ext. 3 miles long, with a breadth of 2½. Pop. 70.

VATHI, va'-te, a seaport of the Ionian island Ithaca, occupying the site of the ancient capital of Ithaca, on the S. side of the gulf or harbour. Pop. 2,500.

VATHI, a town on the N.E. coast of the island of Samos. Pop. 2,400.

VATTEL, Emmerich, vat'-tel, a celebrated Swiss writer on jurisprudence, who entered the service of the king of Poland, whose minister to the republic at Berne he became. He devoted the leisure left by his diplomatic duties to the composition of works which have made his name famous. After putting forth some less-important works, he, in 1753, published his "Treatise on the Law of Nations; or, the Principles of Natural Law applied to the Conduct of States and Sovereigns." This is esteemed a standard authority upon the subject of which it treats, and takes rank with Grotius and Puffendorf. B. at Neufchatel, 1714; D. 1767.

VAUBAN, Sebastian le Prestre, de, vo'-ba, a celebrated French engineer. He entered the army in his 17th year, and in a short time evinced an extraordinary genius for the science of fortification and military tactics. After serving during some time under the prince of Condé, in the Spanish army, he was taken prisoner by the royalists, and was urged by Mazarin to enter the service of the king. Embracing this offer of the cardinal, he distinguished himself at the siege of Monchould, and, in 1658, at Gravelines, Oudenarde, and Apres. Louis XIV., appreciating his military genius, next employed him to strengthen the fortifications of Dunkirk and Lille, of which he was nominated governor. At Maestricht, Valenciennes, and Ghent, his military skill was also triumphant, and, after the signature of the peace of Nimeguen, in 1678, he was engaged in strengthening the fortresses of his native country. On the renewal of war, he took Manheim, and constructed a remarkable intrenched camp at Dunkirk, which was his last great effort. For his eminent services he was created a marshal of France, and received many marks of his sovereign's esteem. His principal works are—treatise on Fortification, under the title of the "French Engineer;" "New Treatise on the Attack and Defence of Places;" "Essays upon Fortification;" "Political Testament of M. de Vauban." B. near Saulieu, in Burgundy, 1633; D. 1707.

VAUCANSON, James de, vo'-kan-sawng, a French mechanician, who evinced a love for the mechanical arts from his childhood, and, at a very early age, constructed some remarkable pieces of machinery. In 1738 he exhibited at Paris an automaton figure of a flute-player, which was six feet in height, and which executed the various notes precisely like a living performer. He subsequently made a flageolet-player, and a duck, which swam, quacked, waved its wings, arranged its feathers, accepted barley from the hand, and digested its food. The last operation was performed by placing in the interior of the automaton certain substances which made a solution of the food. He also distinguished himself by his improvements in silk-dressing machinery. B. at Grenoble, 1709; D. 1782.

VAUCLUSE, vo'-kloose, a department in the S.E. of France, bounded on the S. by the department of the Mouths of the Rhone, and on the other sides by the departments of the Upper Alps and Drôme. Area, 1,370 square miles. Desc. Hilly and mountainous in the N.E., where it is traversed by branches of the Alps. Rivers. The principal are the Rhone and the Durance. Pro. Corn; but the soil is not generally fertile. The other products are wine, almonds, and other fruits; silk, madder, saffron, and aromatic seeds. Manf. Silk stuffs, woollen goods, confectionery, perfumery, glass wares, and printing types. Pop. 265,000.—The FONTAINE DE VAUCLUSE is a village and fountain 15 miles from Avignon. It derives its celebrity mostly from having been the residence of Petrarch.

PETRARCH'S HOUSE AT VAUCLUSE.

VAUCOULEURS, vo'-koo-lur, a town of France, in the department of the Meuse, on the Meuse, 10 miles from Commercy. Pop. 2,700. Claude de Lisle was born here.

VAUD, vo, a canton in the W. of Switzerland, bounded on the W. by France, on the S. by the Lake of Geneva, and on the other sides by Savoy, and the cantons Bern, Fribourg, Neufchatel, and Geneva. Area, 1,185 square miles. Desc. It is, in general, less mountainous than other parts of Switzerland, consisting of beautiful valleys and plains, intersected by small cultivated hills. In the N.W. it is covered with branches of the Jura, and on the S.E. with those of the Alps. The valleys and plains are appropriated to the culture of corn; the eminences and hills to that of the vine. Rivers. The Upper Rhone, the Orbe, the Venoge, and the Broye. Lakes. Joux, and parts of Morat and Neufchâtel. Pro. Corn and wine, and the rearing of live-stock forms the chief occupation of the inhabitants. The best vineyards in Switzerland are in this canton. Minerals. Marble, coal, sulphur, with a few metals. Salt is produced from the springs of Bex. Manf. Unimportant. Pop. 200,000, nearly all Protestants. It holds the 19th place in the Swiss Confederation.

VAUGELAS, Claude Favre, Lord de, vo'-zhe-la, an eminent French writer, who became chamberlain to the duke of Orleans, and member of the French Academy, in the composition of whose dictionary he assisted. He also wrote two excellent works; one entitled "Remarks on the French Language;" and the other a translation of Quintus Curtius. B. 1585; D. 1650.

VAUGHAN, Rev. Robert, vawn, a modern English Independent divine and writer, who was, during several years, professor of history in the London University, since called University College. In 1842 he was appointed president of the Lancashire Independent College at Manchester, which office he retained until the year 1857. In 1844 he started "The British Quarterly Review." His most important works were, —"Life and Opinions of John de Wycliffe;" "Memorials of the Stuart Dynasty;" "The Causes of the Corruption of Christianity;" "Congregationalism, or the Policy of Independent Churches;" and "The Age and Christianity." D. towards the close of the last century.

VAUGIRARE, vo'-zhe-rar, a town of France, on the Seine, now forming a suburb of Paris, within its fortifications. Pop. 13,000.

VAUVERT, vo'-vair, a town of France, in the department of the Gard, 22 miles from Montpellier. Pop. 4,200.

VAUX, Nicholas, Lord, vo, a gallant English nobleman, who displayed such proofs of valour at the battle of Newark, in 1487, that he received the honour of knighthood. He became a great favourite with Henry VIII., and was created a peer. D. 1522. —In the "Paradise of Dainty Devises" are several elegant poems by Lord Vaux, who is supposed to have been the eldest son of Lord Nicholas Vaux.

VAUX, Noel Jourdan de, a French nobleman, and marshal of France, who distinguished himself as a soldier in Italy, Corsica, and Bohemia. At Fontenoy his bravery was particularly conspicuous. He also rendered eminent service at the siege of Brussels and at the battle of Rocoux. In 1760 he was charged with the defence of Friedburg. In 1769 he held the command in Corsica, which he completely subdued. For his great services he was made commander in chief of Burgundy, and a marshal of France. B. in Burgundy, 1705; D. 1785.

VAUXHALL, vox'-hawl', a suburb of London, in the parish of Lambeth, county of Surrey, 2½ miles from St. Paul's Cathedral. It contains extensive manufactures of pottery, stone, patent shot, and several distilleries. Here were the celebrated Vauxhall Gardens, which, in 1860, were abolished. It has a station on the South-Western Railway.

VAVAO, va'-va-o, a coral island in the Pacific Ocean, Friendly Islands, well wooded and fertile. Pop. 5,000. Lat. 18° 39′ S. Lon. 174° W.

VECHT, vekt, an arm of the Rhine, which separates from that river near Utrecht, and falls into the Zuyder Zee, at Minden.

VECHT, a river of the Netherlands and Prussian Westphalia, falling into the Zuyder Zee at Genemuiden, after a course of 90 miles.

VEDEN, vai'-den, a town of the Netherlands, in North Brabant. Pop. 3,000.

VEENDAM, vain'-dam, a town of the Netherlands, 15 miles from Groningen. Pop. 5,000.

VEENENDAAL, vai'-nen-dal, a village of the Netherlands, 20 miles from Utrecht. Pop. 3,000. It has a station on the Amsterdam and Arnheim Railway.

VEERE (in English CAMPVERE), vair, a town of the Netherlands, in the province of Zeeland, on the N.E. side of the island of Walcheren. It has a good arsenal and town-house. Pop. 1,100.

VEERUMGAUM, ve'-room-gawm', a town of British India, 35 miles from Ahmedabad, in the presidency of Bombay. Pop. 17,000.

VEGA, LA, vai-ga, an ancient city and bishopric of St. Domingo, in the N.E. part of the island of Steryti, near the head of Yuna river, which empties into the Bay of Samana. It occupies the site of a city of the same name, ruined by an earthquake in 1564.

VEGA, Lope Felix de, a distinguished Spanish poet. He became secretary to the duke of Alva, and after the death of his first wife, to whom he was much attached, he served as a soldier in the "invincible armada." Escaping the dangers of that disastrous expedition, he entered the employment of a Spanish nobleman. On losing his second wife, he took holy orders. Pope Urban VII. created him doctor of divinity, sent him the cross of the order of Malta, and gave him a place in the apostolic exchequer. Throughout the whole of this varied career he continued to exercise his fertile pen. His principal performances are comedies, which were acted with such success at Madrid as to produce the author a considerable fortune. His composition was so ready, and his invention so fertile, that he sometimes wrote a comedy in a single day. According to one of his eulogists, he printed 22,300,000 lines. Without taking into account the works which have been lost, or those which remain in manuscript, there exist of his writings 497 plays, and twenty-one religious poems, besides burlesque poems, epics, novels, and allegories. B. at Madrid, 1562; D. at the same city, 1635.

VEGER, or BEJER DE LA FRONERA, vai'-zhair, a town of Spain, on the Barbate, 26 miles from Cadiz. Manf. Woollens and sacking. Pop. 8,500.

VEGETIUS, Flavius Renatus, ve-je'-shi-us, a Latin writer on military subjects. His principal production was—"Military Institutions," which give a very exact view of the ancient tactics; but he also wrote a "Treatise on the Veterinary Art." The "Military Institutions" was translated and printed by Caxton, under the title of "The Fayt of Armes and Chyvalry." Flourished about 385.

VEGLIA, vail'-ya, an island in the Adriatic, at the N.W. corner of the Gulf of Quarnero, in the kingdom of Illyria, now belonging to Austria, and included in the government of Trieste, and having S.W. the island of Cherso. Ext. 23 miles long, by 12 broad. Desc. Mountainous and sterile in the E. and N., but in its other parts generally fertile. Pro. Wine, silks, fruits, timber, and live-stock. Minerals. Marble and salt. Pop. 15,000.—Veglia, the capital town, stands on its S.W. side, and has a small harbour, defended by a castle. Pop. 3,600.

VEIL, Charles Marie de, vail, a Jew, who was converted to Christianity by Bossuet, and was appointed a canon of the order of St. Augustine; but repaired to England about 1679, and became a Baptist preacher. He wrote Commentaries on the minor prophets and other books of the Scripture. D. about 1690.—His brother Louis was also converted, and became a Protestant. D. about 1700.

VELASQUEZ, Don Diego de Silva, ve-las'-kai, a distinguished Spanish painter. Philip IV. appointed him his first painter, conferred on him the order of knighthood, and granted him a liberal pension. Few of his pictures are to be seen out of his native country. "It is impossible," says an important authority, "to estimate Velasquez without going to Spain. Grievous is the error of those who suppose him only to be the portrait-painter of sallow mustachioed Spaniards in black cloaks. He drew the minds of men; they live, breathe, and seem ready to walk out of the frames. . . . The freshness, individuality, and identity of each person are quite startling. . . . After a few days spent in the Royal Gallery of Madrid, we fancy that we have actually been acquainted with the royal family and court of his day, and that we have actually lived with them." B. at Seville, 1599; D. at Madrid, 1669.

VELEZ, vai'-laith, a town of Spain, in the province of and 60 miles from Almeria. Manf. Woollens, linens, soap, and hats. It has also a trade in wool. Pop. 7,600.

VELEZ DE GOMERA, a town of Africa, Morocco, in the province of Fez, on a rock near the Mediterranean, 73 miles from Tetuan. Pop. Unascertained.

VELEZ EL RUBIO, a town of Spain, in the province of Almeria, 22 miles from Lorca. Manf. Woollen goods. Pop. 13,000.—It has a castle, and near it are chalybeate springs.

VELEZ MALAGA, a town of Spain, on the river Velez, 1½ miles from Malaga. It stands on the slope of a high hill, amidst vineyards and plantations. It has greatly declined. Pop. 16,000.

VELIKI LUKI, vel'-e-ke' loo'-ke, a town of European Russia, government of, and distant 130 miles from, Pskov. It has several churches and schools. Manf. Leather, of which there are about 30 factories. Pop. 4,000.

VELIKI-USTIUG. (See USTIUG.)

VELIKOJE, vel'-i-ko'-jai, a town of European Russia, government of Jaroslavl. Pop. 3,000.

VELINO MONTE, vai-le'-no, one of the principal summits of the Apennines, 8,210 feet above the level of the sea.

VELISH, vel'-ish, a town of European Russia, government of Vitebsk, on the Dwina. It has a castle, and was founded by the Russians in 1536. It exports hemp, corn, and linseed to Riga. Pop. 7,000.—This place was, in 1580, taken by the Poles, but in 1722 it reverted to Russia.

VELLEIA, vel'-lai-a, a buried city of Italy, in the duchy of Parma, 18 miles from Piacenza, discovered in 1760. It is supposed to have been buried by the crumbling of an adjacent mountain about the beginning of the 4th century.

VELLEIUS-PATERCULUS. (See PATERCULUS, Velleius.)

VELLETRI, vel-lai'-tre, a town of Italy, in the States of the Church, 20 miles from Rome. The streets are narrow and dirty. There are, however, several detached buildings entitled to notice; such as the Palazzo Ginetti, with its elegant front, and the Palazzo Borgio. The Borgian Museum, originally in the Borgian palace here, is now in Naples. Pop. 10,000.—Augustus is said to have been born here, 63 B.C.

VELLORE, vel-lor', a town and fortress of British India, in the presidency of Madras. It is very strongly fortified. After the capture of Seringapatam, in 1799, Vellore was fixed on for the place of confinement or residence of the family of Tippoo Sultan. In July, 1806, a very serious mutiny took place among the garrison, composed principally of native troops. It is unhealthy. Pop. Unascertained, but large. Lat. 12° 55′ N. Lon. 79° 13′ E.

VELTHEIM, A. F., Count, felt'-hime, an eminent German mineralogist, who became superintendent of the mines in the Hartz, and published a dissertation on the Formation of Basalts, another on the Vases of the Ancients; on Memnon's Statue; and the Barberini, or Portland Vase. The university of Helmstadt conferred on him a doctor's degree, and the king of Prussia created him a count. D. 1801.

VELUCHI, MOUNT, vai-loo'-ke, the chief summit of Mount Æta, Greece, 7,658 feet above the level of the sea.

VENACHOIR, or VENNACHAR, LOCH, ven'-na-kar, Perthshire, Scotland, 3 miles from Callendar. It is an expansion of the Teith, 3½ miles long, by 1 wide.

VENAISSIN, ven'-ais-sĕ, an old province of France, on the E. bank of the Rhone, between Provence and Dauphiny. It was incorporated with France in 1793, and now forms part of the department of Vaucluse.

VENANGO, ve-năn'-go, a county in the N.W. part of Pennsylvania, United States. Area, 692 square miles. Pop. 20,000. Also the name of several small townships.

VENCE, vănce, a town of France, in the department of the Var, 10 miles from Grasse. Manf. Woollen cloths. Pop. 3,000.

VENDÉE, van'-dai, a maritime department in the W. of France, comprising a part of Poitou, and bounded E. by the department of the Two Sèvres, and W. by the Atlantic. Area, 2,600 square miles. Desc. Its surface is almost entirely level, and it is divided into three parts,—the wood, the marsh, and the plain. Rivers. The principal are the two Sèvres, the Vendée, and the Autise; but the general intersections of the department are by small canals and ditches. Pro. More corn and wine are raised than are required for home consumption. The other products are flax, hemp, wool; and cattle are fattened for the Paris market. Manf. Woven fabrics, paper, leather, and beetroot sugar; but generally unimportant. Minerals. Coal, and a few metals. Pop. 384,000. The Vendean chiefs vigorously resisted the republican armies from 1793 to 1800, when Cadoudal submitted to Napoleon.—Also a RIVER which gives the name to the department, and which rises in the forest of Chantemarle, and after a course of 48 miles, joins the Sèvre-Niortaise a little above Marans.

VENDLN, or WENDEN, ven'-den, a town of Russia, in Livonia, on the Aa, 50 miles from Riga. Pop. 2,000. This place contained the residence of the grand masters of the Teutonic order.

VENDÔME, văn'-dome, a town of France, capital of the department of the Loir-and-Cher, on the Loir, 40 miles from New Orleans. It contains several churches, an hospital, the remains of a once magnificent castle, barracks, theatre, and public baths. Manf. Coarse cotton fabrics, hosiery, and gloves. Pop. 9,400.

VENDÔME, Cæsar, Duke de, was eldest son of Henry IV., by Gabrielle d'Estrées. He was legitimated in 1595, and afterwards nominated governor of the province of Brittany. After the decease of his father, he became the leader of the opposition faction, but subsequently joined the court against the Huguenots. He and his brother were, in 1626, arrested and confined during four years, on the charge of conspiring against the life of Richelieu. In 1641 he was again about to be arrested upon a similar charge, but escaped to England, where he continued to reside until after the death of Richelieu. He became governor of Burgundy in 1650; in 1655 he defeated the Spanish fleet at Barcelona, having previously captured Bordeaux from the malcontents. B. 1594; D. at Paris, 1665.

VENDÔME, Alexander Duke de, brother of the preceding, and, like him, the son of Henry IV. by Gabrielle d'Estrées. He became grand prior of the Knights of Malta. In 1626 he was charged, like his brother, with conspiring against the life of Richelieu, and was imprisoned. B. 1598; D. in prison, 1629.

VENDÔME, Louis Joseph, Duke de, a celebrated French general, who was the son of Alexander, duke de Vendôme, one of the illegitimate sons of Henry IV. At an early age he entered the army as a volunteer under Louis XIV. in Holland. After passing through the different ranks, he became a general, and was sent to Spain, where he took Barcelona, in 1697. Louis XIV. named him commander-in-chief in Italy, in 1702, in the room of Villeroi, who had been very unsuccessful. Vendôme changed the aspect of affairs, and gained several victories over the imperialists. In 1705 he defeated Prince Eugene at Cassano, and was on the point of taking Turin, when he was recalled to take the command in Flanders, where he was signally defeated, at Oudenard, by the duke of Marlborough. He then went to Spain, restored Philip V. to his capital, and took 4,000 men, under Lord Stanhope, prisoners. B. 1654; D. at Tignaroz, Spain, 1712.

VENDÔME, Philip, Duke de, and the last who bore the title, was the brother of the preceding. While an infant, he was enrolled in the order of Malta, of which he ultimately became grand prior. He was the companion of his brother in his battles, till having, by his indolence, nearly caused the ruin of the French army by the Austrians, at Cassano, in 1706, he was sent into exile by Louis XIV. Retiring to Rome, he remained there during five years, at the end of which time he was permitted to return to his native country. When, in 1715, an attack of the Turks upon Malta was apprehended, he went to the island to take the command. The Turks not making their appearance, he returned to France, where he spent the remainder of his life in a licentious manner. B. 1655; D. at Paris, 1727.

VENDOTENA, ven-do-tai'-na, a small island of the Mediterranean, belonging to Naples, about 20 miles from the coast of Italy. It has a circumference of about 8 miles, and was used by the Romans as a place of banishment for state prisoners. It has a small fishing port, with a population of 500.

VENERONI, John, ven'-e-ro'-ne, an eminent French writer, who taught Italian at Paris, and, in order to pass for a Florentine, Italianized his name from Vigneron to Veneroni. He wrote "A Method of Learning Italian," which has been translated into English; "A Dictionary, Italian and French, and French and Italian;" "Select Fables;" and "The Letters of Loredano and Cardinal Bentivoglio" translated into French. Lived in the early part of the 18th century.

VENETIA, or VENICE, THE GOVERNMENT OF, ve-ne'-shi-a, is one of the two great divisions of the former Lombardo-Venetian kingdom, and comprises eight provinces or delegations: Belluno, Padua, Rovigo, Treviso, Friuli or Udine, Venice, Verona, and Vicenza. Area, 6,938 square miles. Desc. Generally fertile, and kept so by an extensive and efficient system of irrigation by means of canals and rivers. Pro. Corn, maize, rice, hemp, and flax in abundance. The dairy produce is a great source of wealth, whilst silk and the vine are extensively cultivated. Minerals. Unimportant; but they comprise copper, iron, porcelain-earth, slate, limestone, marble, and rock-crystals. Manf. Silks, velvets, hats, porcelain, iron wares, and stained glass. Pop. about 3,000,000. The Lombardo-Venetian kingdom formed a portion of the dominions of Charlemagne, and the house of Austria early gained a footing in the country, where it so managed to extend its possessions that, towards the close of the 18th century, it held dominion over nearly the whole of the kingdom. The successes of Napoleon I., however, enabled him to seize them, when he established first the Cisalpine Republic, and afterwards the kingdom of Italy. The congress of Vienna, however, replaced the country nearly on its former footing, assigning to Austria even a larger portion than she formerly possessed. In 1848, however, the people became dissatisfied with her rule, when a general rising, aided by a Sardinian army, took place. The insurrection was, for a time, so successful, that hopes were entertained of Lombardy being annexed to Sardinia. But the tide of fortune changed; and, after a series of defeats, the Sardinian army was driven across the Ticino, and Austria preserved her territory undiminished, but with no hold whatever upon the affections of the people. By the treaty of Villafranca, Venetia was to form part of the Italian confederation proposed by Napoleon III., though remaining under the crown of the emperor of Austria. While we write, the Sardinian (Italian) government makes no secret of its wish to add Venetia to the kingdom of Italy, as established under Victor Emmanuel II.

VENEV, ve-nev', a town of European Russia, in the government of Tula, on the Venevka. Manf. Woollen and linen fabrics. Pop. 3,500.

VENEZIANO, Dominico, vai-nait'-se-a-no, an eminent Venetian painter, who introduced oil-painting to Florence; but, having excited the jealousy of Castagno, whom he taught to colour in oils, he was basely murdered by him. D. at Venice, about 1406; killed near Florence, 1462.

VENEZIANO, Agostino, a celebrated Venetian engraver, who produced portraits of Barbarossa, of Charles V., Francis I. of France, and copied many of Raffaelle's designs. B. at Venice, towards the close of the 15th century; D. about 1540.

VENEZUELA, ven'-ez-we'-la, the most N. of the republics of S. America, bounded N. by the Caribbean Sea, W. by New Granada and British Guiana, and S. by the great plains of Varinas and the Orinoco. Area, about 427,000 square miles. Desc. Fertile, and yielding in abundance all the products of the tropics. The climate is modified according to the situation of its districts in the mountains, on the coast, or in the plains. On the coast and in the plains a scorching heat prevails, accompanied in the latter with heavy falls of rain. In the mountain valleys, the air is in general pure and mild, and, in some elevated parts, even cold. The plains which stretch to the Orinoco are inhabited solely by herds of cattle, tended by Mulattoes, who are as nearly in a state of nature as the beasts they herd. The sources of wealth are coffee, tobacco, indigo, cacao, cotton, dye-woods, and timber. Cattle are also a great source of wealth. Rivers. The principal are the Meta, Apure, Aranca, and Carony, tributary to the Orinoco; the Cassiquiare, which connects it with the Amazon, the Tocuyo, Zulia, and Cuyuni. Lakes. Valencia, a beautiful sheet of water, and of great extent, is the principal; the other is Maracaybo. Gov. A house of representatives and a senate. The executive is exercised by a president and vice-president. Pop. about 950,000. Lat. between 2° and 12° N. Lon. between 60° and 73° W.

VENICE, ven'-is (Ital. VENEZIA, ve-ned'-ze-a), a city in the N.E. of Italy, situate near the northern extremity of the Adriatic. It is built on an island, or rather collection of small islands, separated from the mainland by shallows, of a depth of three, four, five, or six feet, and connected with it by a vast bridge of 222 arches. Its domes and spires, its churches and public buildings, appear, in approaching the city by sea, to float on the surface of the waves. This appearance is particularly striking at night, when the town is lighted. The length of the city is somewhat more than two miles, its breadth a mile and a half, and its circuit six miles. It is divided into two parts, nearly equal, by a great canal, which winds through its whole length in a serpentine form. This canal is above 100 feet in width, and is crossed at one part by a bridge of a single arch, the celebrated Rialto, noticed by Shakspere in "The Merchant of Venice." It has a span of upwards of 90 feet, and is remarkable alike for its height, its boldness, and its solidity, and is wholly constructed of marble. Every part, almost, of the town is intersected by smaller canals, navigated by gondolas, or by small barks. The aspect of Venice is stately, and even magnificent. In regard to the streets, it will hardly be credited that their breadth is, in general, only four, five, or six feet; in many places still less. The only exception is in the street called the Merceria, in which are the best shops, and which is only 15 feet wide. The only open place entitled to the name of square is the Piazza di San Marco, an oblong of 280 feet in length, by nearly 100 in breadth, bordered by several handsome buildings. Of these, the principal are the churches of St. Marco and Geminiano; the palace formerly occupied by the doge; and the buildings fronted in the Grecian style, called the Procureria. This small but elegant square is bordered by arcades, containing elegant shops and coffee-rooms, which, when lighted at night, have a splendid appearance. It is the centre of gaiety and amusement, the resort of foreigners and of loungers of every description. The Piazetta is a smaller opening, leading from the square of St. Marco to the sea, and having, on the one side, the palace of the doge, on the other the public library, with its pillars of granite. This spot presents, from the concourse of people, an animated and interesting scene. The only other open spaces in the city are in the front of some of the churches and at each end of the Rialto. From the extreme narrowness of the streets, the houses are in general gloomy, and, in the inside, miserably deficient of accommodation; which, with the enjoyment of good air, is sacrificed, that space may be found for magnificent statues and other works of art. The general height is three or four stories. The churches are, with some exceptions, in the Gothic style. That of St. Mark, or Marco, at one end of the Piazza di St. Marco, is so loaded with ornaments, as to bear some resemblance to an eastern pagoda. Its mosaics are surpassed only by those of St. Peter's at Rome. Its paintings are numerous and splendid. Its pavement is of jasper and porphyry, and it has 500 columns of black, white, and veined marble, bronze, alabaster, verde antique, and serpentine. It is on the portico facing the piazza that the Venetians once more see the bronze horses which, during eighteen years (from 1797 to 1815), crowned the triumphal arch in the Place du Carousel, at Paris. These were originally founded at Corinth, and successively adorned Athens, Rome, Constantinople, Venice, and Paris: in 1815 they were replaced. The church of Santa Maria della Salute, the work of Palladio, is an elegant structure, open to the great canal, and built, outside and in, of marble, with a moderate share of ornament. The church Il Redemptore is also an elegant building. The cathedral of Venice is built of Istrian marble. The church of St. Georgia is remarkable for its front of marble and its cupola; that of St. Giovanni and St. Paolo is a large Gothic edifice, surmounted by a cupola. Of the palaces and other public structures, the most conspicuous is the palace of the doges. It is an ancient fabric, in the Gothic style, vast in its extent, and venerable in its appearance. Of the other palaces or mansions of the great families, the most conspicuous are those of Goiniani, Tiopolo, Balbi, Cornaro, &c., all more remarkable for their size than for elegance or symmetry. The arsenal of Venice is a magnificent building, standing on an island near the eastern end of the city. It is defended by a rampart, as well as by the surrounding water; and has before its gates two great pillars, with the two gigantic lions in granite, which stood formerly on the Piræus at Athens. The public library stands in a fine marble structure, near the square of St. Mark. Adjoining it is the mint, where, in 1284, the celebrated ducat of Venice, the most ancient coin in Europe, was struck. Of theatres, Venice has six; but several of them are open only during the Carnival. The hospitals and prisons are not on a good footing, the apartments being ill contrived, and, in general, devoid of a free circulation of air. The former palace of the Doge, built in the 14th century, is remarkable for the massive proportions it presents. Its interior is adorned with many of the finest works of the great masters. It is, by the Bridge of Sighs, connected with the former dungeons of the Inquisition. Venice is the seat of an academy of the fine arts, and an athenæum, or seminary forming a medium between a great school and a university. It contains, also, a navigation school and a female establishment called the Conservato. The public library is extensive, and there are a number of private collections of curiosities and objects of art. The commercial greatness of Venice dates, like that of Bruges, Antwerp, and Pisa, from the middle ages. Since the discovery of the passage to India by the Cape of Good Hope, it has gradually diminished. Its mercantile transactions are mostly confined to the Levant and other parts of the Mediterranean; to the import of hardware, linen, and other manufactures from the north of Europe; of East and West India goods, direct or through the medium of Malta; and, finally, of salt fish, from Newfoundland or England, for the consumption of the Catholics during fast-days and Lent. Manf. Considerable; consisting of woollens, serges, canvas and ropes, gold and silver stuffs, velvet, and silk stockings, and of lace. There are others, also, of less consequence; such as imitations of pearls and other precious stones, ornamental glass-works, jewellery, and watwork. Printing is here carried on more extensively than in any other town in Italy. Pop. about 125,000: in former times it is said to have been more. Lat. 45° 25′ 9″ N. Lon. 12° 20′ 2″ E.—The foundation of Venice was laid in 421, as a place of refuge during the invasion of Italy by Attila. The government was at first a democracy; but, towards the middle of the 13th century (about 1247), it became a settled aristocracy. Venice was overturned in 1797. It remained subject to Austria till 1805, when, after the battle of Austerlitz, it was annexed to the French kingdom of Italy. In 1814, however, it returned definitively under the power of Austria.

VENICE, THE PROVINCE OR DELEGATION OF, is bounded on the N.E. by Friuli, N.W. by Treviso, W. by Padua and Rovigo, S. by the Papal States, and S.E. and E. by the Adriatic Sea. Area, 798 square miles. Desc. This province occupies nearly the whole of the littoral portion of the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom, and, physically speaking, is remarkable for its long series of lagoons, which stretching due north for 25 miles, from the mouth of the Brenta to that of the Sile, occupies a considerable portion of the old bed of the Piave. These lagoons contain numerous small islands, on some of which Venice itself stands, and are separated from the open sea by a peninsula which is partly composed of the alluvium brought down by the rivers, and partly of the sand thrown up by the waves. Being, however, intersected by both artificial and natural channels, access to the coast, as well as to the capital, is thereby obtained. Pro. All kinds of cereals, with rice, maize, hemp, silk, and wine. Pop. about 300,000.—The GULF OF VENICE is formed by the Adriatic on the N.E. coast of Italy, bounded by the Brenta and the Piave.

VENIUS, or VAN VEEN, Otho, vain, a Dutch painter, who studied under Zucchero at Rome; after which he went to Antwerp, and thence to Brussels. He was a good writer, and published "Amorum Emblemata," and several other works, with plates after his own designs. Rubens was his disciple. B. at Leyden, 1556; D. at Brussels, 1634.

VENLOO, ven-loo', a strong town of the Netherlands, in the province of Limburg, on the Maese, 40 miles from Maestricht. It is conveniently situate for trade, having a commodious port, and forming a depôt for the merchandise from all the countries bordering on the Maese and the Rhine. Manf. Tile-making, vinegar, tin, and lead and tobacco-works. Pop. 7,200.

VENLOON, or LOON, OP ZAND, ven-loon', a town of North Brabant, 12 miles from Breda. Pop. 3,500.

VENN, Henry, ven, an English divine, who became fellow of Queen's College, Cambridge. He wrote—the "Complete Duty of Man" (not to be confounded with the "Whole Duty of Man"), and "Mistakes in Religion exposed." B. in Surrey, 1725; D. near London, 1796.

VENNER, Tobias, ven'-ner, an English physician, who wrote a work entitled, "Via Recta ad Vitam Longam; or, an Easy Way to a Long Life;" also a "Treatise on the Bath Waters." B. at Petherton, Somersetshire, 1577; D. 1660.

VENNER, Thomas, an English fanatic, who, during the reign of Charles II., preached against all government, republican and monarchical asserting that the kingdom of Jesus on earth was begun. He and his followers were called Fifth-monarchy Men; and, soon after the Restoration, they proclaimed King Jesus publicly in the street; for which Venner and twelve others were executed in 1661.

VENOSA, ve-no'-sa, a town of Naples, on the river Ofanto, 23 miles from Potenza. It has a cathedral, several parish churches, and extensive catacombs. Pop. 6,000.—Here the poet Horace was born.

VENTNOR, vent'-nor, a town on the S. coast of the Isle of Wight, Southamptonshire, 4 miles from Niton. It has become a fashionable watering-place, with several schools, terraces, chapels, and handsome villas. Pop. about 3,000.

VENUS, ve'-nus, the goddess of beauty, the mother of love, the queen of laughter, the mistress of the graces and of pleasures. She arose from the sea near the island of Cyprus, or Cythera, and was carried to Olympus, where all the gods admired her beauty. Jupiter attempted to gain her affections, but Venus refused, and the god, to punish her obstinacy, gave her in marriage to his ugly son Vulcan. The power of Venus over the heart was supported by a girdle, called zone by the Greeks and cestus by the Romans. This girdle gave beauty, grace, and elegance, when worn even by the most deformed; it excited love and kindled extinguished flames. Venus gained the prize of the golden apple of discord from Pallas and Juno (see PARIS), and rewarded her impartial judge with the hand of the fairest woman in the world. The worship of Venus was universally established; statues and temples were erected to her in every kingdom. The rose, the myrtle, and the apple were sacred to her, and, among birds, the dove, the swan, and the sparrow were her favourites. She is generally represented with her son Cupid, on a chariot drawn by doves.

VENZONE, ven-dzo'-nai, a town of Italy, on the Tagliamento, 18 miles from Udine. Pop. 3,400.

VERA, vai'-ra, a seaport of Spain, 40 miles from Lorca, on the Mediterranean. Manf. Nitre; and it has an extensive fishery. Pop. 8,500.

VERA CRUZ, vai'-ra krooz, a maritime department of the Mexican Confederation, situate under the tropics, and extending along the Mexican Gulf. It is bounded E. by the peninsula of Merida, W. by the departments of Oaxaca, La Puebla, and Mexico, and N. by the colony of New Santander. Area, about 26,000 square miles. Desc. There are few regions in the new continent where the traveller is more struck with the assemblage of the most opposite climates, than in this province. All the western part forms the declivity of the Cordilleras of Anahuac. In the space of a day the inhabitants descend from the regions of eternal snow, to the plains in the vicinity of the sea, where the most suffocating heat prevails. Within its limits it contains two lofty summits, of which one, the volcano of Orizaba, is, after the Popocatepeti, the most elevated mountain in this part of the world. The other summit, the Coffre de Perote, according to the measurement of Humboldt, is nearly 1,312 feet higher than the Peak of Teneriffe. Rivers. The principal are the Montezuma, the Alvarado, and the Coatzacoalca. Pro. The myrtle, cocoa, tobacco of an excellent quality; cotton, celebrated for its fineness and whiteness; sugar, indigo, vanilla, and live stock. Minerals. Unimportant. Manf. Cotton, which is extensive. Pop. 265,000. Lat. between 17° 30′ and 22° N. Lon. between 94° 30′ and 99° W. The main route from the Atlantic to Mexico runs through this department.

VERA CRUZ, the chief seaport-town of the Mexican Confederation, in the above state. It fronts the sea in a semicircle, and is inclosed with a simple wall or parapet. On the shore to the south-east and north-west are two redoubts, with some cannon to defend the port, which is not commodious, being merely a bad anchorage among shallows. Opposite the town, at the distance of 800 yards, is an islet, on which stands the castle of St. Juan d'Ulloa, strongly fortified, and having a light-house 79 feet above the level of the sea. The city is beautifully and regularly built. It is situate in an arid plain, on which the north winds, which blow with dreadful impetuosity from October till April, have formed hills of moving sand. These contribute very much, by the reflection of the sun's rays, and by the high temperature which they acquire during the summer months, to increase the suffocating heat of the atmosphere.

All the edifices of the town are constructed of materials drawn from the bottom of the ocean; for no rock is to be procured in the environs of the city, although a good freestone has now begun to be brought from Campeachy. The principal disadvantage of Vera Cruz is its unhealthy situation and climate. It is considered as the principal seat of the yellow fever, which prevails all over the eastern coast of Mexico, and to which thousands of Europeans landing during the hot season fall victims. It has an extensive trade. Exp. Cochineal, sugar, bullion, indigo, drugs, provisions, vanilla, logwood, and pimento. Imp. Paper, brandy, woven fabrics, cacao, wines, and metals. Pop. about 7,000. Lat. 19° 11′ 8″ N. Lon. 96° 8′ W. This place was bombarded and taken by the army of the United States in 1847.

Veragua, ve-ra'-gwa, a province of S. America, bounded N. by the Caribbean Sea; E. by the province of Darien, in South America, which is separated from Veragua by the ridge of Canatagua; W. by Costa Rica, and S. by the great Pacific Ocean. Area. Unascertained. Desc. Mountainous and rugged, covered with vast forests, beautifully interspersed with luxuriant and fertile valleys. It rains almost continually in this country; and by this constant moisture, the heat of the climate, which is very great, is mitigated. Thunderstorms, accompanied with frightful lightning, occur very frequently; and during these storms, the torrents rush with such impetuous force into the vales, from the surrounding mountains, that the country is impassable during the winter season. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. between 7° 15′ and 9° 40′ N. Lon. between 80° 20′ and 82° 50′ W.

Veragua, St. Jago de, the capital of the above province, is a handsome town, 125 miles from Panama. Its inhabitants are partly Spaniards, partly mulattoes, who trade in gold-dust, cotton, and dyes. Pop. 5,000.

Vera Paz, paz, a department of Central America, Guatemala, bounded N. by the provinces of Chiapa and Yucatan, E. by Honduras and the bay or gulf of Honduras, S. by Guatemala, and W. by the same and Chiapa. Ext. About 120 miles in length, and 74 in extreme breadth. Desc. The country is rough and broken, full of deep ravines, and covered with thick and impenetrable woods. Its centre is mountainous and well watered. Rivers. The principal are the Montagua or Rio Grande, the Rio Pasion, and the Polochic. Climate. Variable; half of this province is of a mild and benign temperature, and the other half hot, and abounding in mosquitoes and gnats of various kinds. The rains continue nine months in the year. Pro. Sugar-cane, dye-woods, and other large timber, cotton, balsam, and dragon's-blood. The want of roads, however, greatly interrupts commerce. Pop. 6,500. Lat. between 16° and 18° N. Lon. between 89° 30′ and 91° 40′ W.

Vera Paz, the chief town of the above province, on the Rio Coban, which falls into the gulf or lake of Dulce, 600 miles S.E. Mexico. Lat. 15° 50′ N. Lon. 91° 14′ W.

Verbicaro, vair'-be-ka'-ro, a market-town of Naples, 28 miles from Paola. Pop. 4,000.

Vercelli, ver-chel'-le, a town of Piedmont, at the confluence of the rivers Cervo and Sesia, 14 miles from Casale. It is inclosed by boulevards, which have replaced its old fortifications. It has a spacious market-place and several good buildings. The cathedral is one of the best in Piedmont, and has a valuable library of old MSS., including a copy of the laws of the Lombards; and there are three other churches entitled to attention, as well as the hospital, with its gardens and museum. Manf. Silk and woollen fabrics. Pop. 18,400.

Verde, Cape, verd, a cape of Africa. (See Cape Verde.)

Verde, Islands of Cape. (See Cape Verde Islands.)

Verde, Rio, vair'-dai, two rivers of Brazil, one joining the Parana and the other the San Francisco.

Verden, vair'-den, a town of Germany, in Hanover, on the Aller, 53 miles from Hamburg. It has an ancient cathedral. Manf. Tobacco, beer, and spirits. Pop. 5,000.

Verdi, Giuseppe, vair'-de, a modern Italian musical composer, who studied his art under Lavignia at Milan, and in 1839 produced his first work. It was not, however, until he gave to the public his "Nabucco," in 1842, that he acquired a name as a musical writer. At present he is the most popular composer of the time; his operas of "Rigoletto," "Trovatore," "Traviata," &c., being constantly played. B. at Roucoule, Parma, 1814.

Verdier, Cæsar, vair'-de-ai, an eminent French surgeon, who read lectures at Paris with great reputation. He wrote, "Abridgment of Anatomy," "Memoirs on Surgery," "Treatise on Midwifery," &c. D. at Paris, 1759.

Verdon, vair'-dawng, a river of France, rising near Colmar, in the department of the Lower Alps, and, after a course of 100 miles, joining the Durance.

Verdun, vair'-du(r), a town of France, in the department of the Meuse, 26 miles from Bar-le-Duc. It is strongly fortified, and has a cathedral, a bishop's palace, a military hospital, a communal college, and public library. Manf. Woven goods, leather and wooden wares. It also has distilleries and breweries. Pop. 14,000.—This place was, in 1792, taken by the Prussians, but restored to the French after the battle of Valmy.—The name of several other towns in France, none with a population above 2,100.

Vere, Edward, veer, earl of Oxford, an English nobleman, eminent for his valour and literary talents. In 1598 he sat upon the trial of Mary, queen of Scots, and held a command in the fleet which fought the Spanish armada. His poems were much admired in his time. There is a specimen in Percy's "Reliques of Antient Poetry," and another in "England's Parnassus." D. 1604.

Vere, Sir Francis, an English general. In 1585 he went to Holland with the forces sent to assist the Dutch by Queen Elizabeth, under the command of the earl of Leicester. In 1596 he was appointed governor of Flushing, and afterwards distinguished himself at the battle near Nieuport, and by his gallant defence of Ostend, which he held for upwards of three years against the Spaniards. He displayed equal bravery and skill at the siege of Bergen-op-Zoom and on many other occasions. B. 1554; D. 1608.

Vere, Sir Horace, younger brother of the preceding, with whom he served in Holland, and afterwards had the command of the forces sent by King James to the Palatinate. In 1605 he escaped, by a series of skilful manœuvres, from Spinola, with only 4,000 men. He was created Lord Vere by Charles I. D. 1635.

Vereja, ve-rai'-ja, a town of European Russia, in the government of Moscow, on the Protva. It deals in leather, corn, cattle, tallow, honey, wax, peltry, and linen. These articles are mostly sold to the Don Cossacks. Pop. 6,000.

Verelius, Olaus, ve-re'-li-us, an eminent Swedish antiquarian writer, who became professor of Swedish antiquities, and antiquary to Charles IX. His works, which are very valuable, are principally devoted to an elucidation of the early history and antiquities of Scandinavia. B. 1618; D. 1682.

Vergara, vair-ga'-ra, a town of Spain, in Guipuzcoa, 23 miles from St. Sebastian. Manf. Steel goods. Pop. 3,500.—Here, in 1839, a convention was concluded, which terminated the war in Biscay.

Vergennes, ver-jen', a city of Vermont, U.S., on the Otter Creek, 20 miles from Burlington. It contains a woollen manufactory, clothiers' works, and iron-works. Pop. 1,500.

Vergennes, Charles Gravier, Count de, vairzh'-en, a French statesman. In 1755 he was sent as ambassador to Constantinople, and afterwards to Sweden; but, when Louis XVI. came to the throne in 1774, he was recalled, and made minister of foreign affairs. He displayed the qualities of a profound statesman, particularly in the peace of 1783, during which he negotiated a treaty of commerce with England and another with Russia. B. at Dijon, 1717; D. 1787.

Vergil, Polydore, ver'-jil, an Italian historian. He visited England in the suite of Cardinal Corneto, the pope's legate, in 1503. Henry VIII. was so pleased with his wit and address, that he gave him the archdeaconry of Wells; but he returned to his native country in 1550. His principal works are, "De Inventoribus Rerum," "Treatise on Prodigies," "Adagiorum, or Proverbs," and a history of England, in Latin, which, however, is more elegant than faithful. B. at Urbino, about 1470; D. at the same place, 1555.

VERHEYEN, Philip, vair-hi'-en, an eminent Dutch anatomist, who worked as an agricultural labourer till he was 22 years of age, and then gained a place at the university of Louvain, where he studied medicine, received his doctor's degree, and obtained a professorship. His most important works were, "Anatomy of the Human Body," "Defence of Harvey's Discovery of the Circulation of the Blood," and treatises upon diseases of the head and chest; all these works being written in Latin. B. in Holland, 1648; D. 1710.

VERIA, LA, vair'-e-a, a town of European Turkey, in Macedonia, a few miles from the coast of the Gulf of Salonica. Manf. Cotton goods, thread, and dyeing. Pop. 8,000, mostly Greeks.

VERKHNE, or VERKHNÖ, verk'-ne, 'upper,' a prefix to the names of many towns in Russia.

VERMAND, vair'-mand, a town of France, in the department Aisne, 6 miles from St. Quentin. Pop. 1,300.

VERMANDOIS, vair'-man-dwaw, an old division of France, in Picardy, of which St. Quentin was the capital.

VERMEJA, vair-mai'-ya, a river of South America, rising on the frontier of Bolivia, and, after a course of upwards of 700 miles, joining the Paraguay, 12 miles from Neembuca.

VERMEYEN, John Cornelius, vair-mi'-en, an eminent Dutch painter, whose beard was so long as to reach the ground. He was much employed and esteemed by the emperor Charles V. B. near Haarlem, 1500; D. at Brussels, 1559.

VERMIGLI, Peter Martyr, vair'-me-gle, an Italian divine, who embraced the doctrines of the Reformation, and was, in 1547, invited to England by Cranmer; but, after the accession of Mary, he retired to Strasburg, where he became professor of divinity. He wrote commentaries on the Scriptures, and epistles to the Protestant churches in Poland and England, to Melancthon and Calvin. B. at Florence, 1500; D. at Zurich, 1562.

VERMILION, ver-mil'-yon, the name of two counties in the United States. 1. In Indiana. Area, 280 square miles. Pop. 9,000.—2. In the E. part of Illinois. Area, 1,200 square miles. Pop. 12,000.—Also the name of several townships, none with a population above 2,500. —Also the name of several rivers. 1. In Louisiana, which discharges itself into Vermilion Bay, in the Gulf of Mexico.—2. Another in Louisiana, which runs into the Osage.—3. In Ohio, which falls into Lake Erie.—4. A tributary of the Illinois, which it joins 150 miles from the Mississippi.

VERMONT, ver-mont', one of the United States, situate in the N. part of the Union, having Lower Canada on the N., Massachusetts on the S., New York on the W., and New Hampshire on the E. Area, 10,000 square miles. It is divided into 13 counties,—Addison, Bennington, Caledonia, Chittenden, Essex, Franklin, Grand Isle, Orange, Orleans, Rutland, Washington, Windham, and Windsor. Desc. The Green Mountains, from 10 to 15 miles in breadth, traverse its whole length, beginning in Canada, thence extending through the states of Vermont, Massachusetts, and Connecticut, and terminating within a few miles of the seacoast. They run nearly parallel with the course of Connecticut river, and are intersected by numerous valleys, the soil of which is deep, rich, and loamy. Adjoining the rivers are fine plains and meadows; and between the banks of Lake Champlain and the mountains is a valuable tract of arable land, extending 100 miles in length and 30 in breadth. The whole surface, in its natural state, is thickly wooded. Rivers. All the streams and rivers of Vermont have their origin among the Green Mountains. About 35 of them have an easterly direction, and fall into Connecticut river. About 25 run westerly, and discharge themselves into Lake Champlain. Two or three running in the same direction, fall into Hudson's river. In the north-easterly parts of the state there are four or five streams which have a northerly direction, and run into the Lake Memphremagog; thence, through the river St. Francis, they are emptied into the St. Lawrence. The most considerable on the west side of the mountains are Otter Creek, Onion River, the Lamoille, and Michisconi. On the east side are Wantastiquek, or West River, White River, and Poosoomsuck. The river Connecticut, into which these rivers fall, forms the eastern boundary of the state. Lakes. Champlain is the principal. Climate. Healthy, but subject to great extremes of heat and cold. The snow lies from the middle of December to the middle of March; during which period it is customary to travel in sledges. The weather during this season is generally fair and constant, and rain seldom falls, though hail is not unfrequent. Zoology. The bear, wild cat, catamount, deer, fox, hare, marten, ermine, mole, mouse, porcupine, rabbit, racoon, skunk, various species of the squirrel, weasel, wolf, and wood-chuck. In the rivers, ponds, and lakes, are the beaver, mink, musk-rat, and otter. The rivers also abound with fish. Pro. Wheat, rye, barley, oats, pease, flax, hemp, and culinary plants. Potatoes thrive well without manure, the natural pasture is excellent, and large quantities of beautiful apples are grown, and live stock of every description are abundant. Minerals. Iron ore exists in great abundance on the west side of the Green Mountains and near Lake Champlain. There are also ores of lead, copper, and of ochre, red and yellow. Jasper of a beautiful red colour has been discovered. Porcelain-clay, soapstone, slate, whinstone, clay for bricks, pipe-clay, and millstones, and marl in several places. There are some lead and copperas mines. Manf. Silk, tobacco, and maple sugar. Distilleries are numerous, and cider and beer are made. The most extensive brewery of porter is at Middlebury. The wild grape is used at table as a dessert, and a pleasant beverage is made of the gooseberry and raspberry. Ginseng, which grows in great plenty and perfection, is a valuable article of commerce. Pot and pearl ashes, and yellow ochre, are also manufactured. Exp. These consist of grain, flour, bar-iron, nails, pot and pearl ashes, live cattle, horses, beef, pork, cheese and butter, lumber, peltry, and flax, which are sent to Montreal in Canada, and, by the cheapest river communication, to the cities and towns of New York, Portland, Hartford, and Boston. Flocks of cows and sheep are driven to the neighbouring states. Imp. Rum, wines, brandy, gin, tea, coffee, and articles of British manufacture; such as course linens and woollens. Gov. Montpelier is the seat of government. The legislative power is vested in a House of Representatives; the executive power is vested in a governor, lieutenant-governor, and 12 counsellors. Pop. about 320,000. Lat. between 42° 44′ and 45° N. Lon. between 71° 38′ and 73° 25′ W.—The first settlements began about the year 1724; and, in 1760, a number of towns were already formed by emigrants from New Hampshire, Massachusetts, and Connecticut. It is one of the Federal states, and was admitted into the Union in 1791.

VERNAISON, vair-nai'-sawng, a town of France, in the department of the Rhone, on the railway to St. Etienne. Pop. 1,200.

VERNANTE, vair-nan'-tai, a town of Italy, 11 miles from Coni. Pop. 3,200.

VERNANTES, vair'-nant, a market-town of France, in the department of Maine-and-Loire, 12 miles from Bangé. Pop. 2,600.

VERNET, Claude Joseph, vair'-nai, an eminent French painter, who was esteemed the first marine and landscape painter of his time. B. at Avignon, 1714; D. in France, 1789.

VERNET, Antoine-Charles-Horace, usually styled Carle, a celebrated French painter, who was the son of the preceding, under whom he acquired his earliest knowledge of his art. After gaining the grand prize of the Academy of Paris in 1782, he repaired to Rome, in which city he studied the great Italian masterpieces during several years. Returning to Paris, he rose to a considerable reputation, and became a member of the Institute of France. He particularly excelled as a battle-painter, his best works in this walk being "The Battle of Marengo," "The Battle of Austerlitz," "John Sobieski forcing the Turks to raise the Siege of Vienna," and the "Taking of Pampeluna." B. at Bordeaux, 1758; D. at Paris, 1836.

VERNET, Horace, a celebrated French painter, and son of the preceding. In his early youth Paris was in a state of revolution, and, art finding few patrons, his father's circumstances were so straitened that Horace had, while still a child, to assist in eking out the family income by making small drawings for tradesmen's invoices, fashion-books, &c. In this way he was preparing for the attainment of that astonishing facility for which he was afterwards famous. After serving for a short time in the ranks of the French army, he entered upon the task of representing on canvas incidents of military life. His "Capture of the Redoubt," "Halt of French Soldiers," and others of the same kind, gained him universal estimation; and he went on increasing in skill and popularity until 1819, when he produced his "Massacre of the Mamelukes," which placed him at the head of his particular walk in the artistic profession. Charles X. nominated him an officer of the Legion of Honour, and, after the revolution of 1830, he became a favourite painter with Louis Philippe, who commissioned him to adorn the Constantine Gallery and the Gallery of French History at Versailles with a number of battle-pieces, illustrative of the Algerine campaigns, and of the other triumphs of the French army. Among his finest works in the military series may be named the "Capture of the Smala of Abd-el-Kader," which is one of the largest, if not the largest, painting in the world. He has also executed some fine pictures of Eastern life, such as the "Lion-Hunt," "Arab Mother Rescuing her Child from a Lion," and "Council of Arabs." In 1842 he was created a commander of the Legion of Honour, having previously refused to be elevated to the rank of a baron. B. at Paris, 1789.

VERNEUIL, vair'-nu(r)-e, a town of France, in the department of the Eure, on the Arve, 18 miles from Dreux. Manf. Woollens, cottons, and druggets. Pop. 4,000.—Also a parish and village, 6 miles from Limoges. Pop. 2,400.

VERNON, vair'-nawng, a parish and town of France, in the department of the Eure, on the Seine, 28 miles from Rouen. It has a college, founded by Henry IV., and near it is the forest of Vernon. Manf. Cotton goods and velvets. Pop. 6,500.

VERNON, ver'-non, the name of numerous townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 3,100.

VERNON, Edward, a brave English admiral, who captured Porto Bello in 1739, but was unsuccessful in his expedition against Carthagena, in South America, in 1747. B. in London, 1684; D. 1757.

VERNON, Robert, a munificent English patron of art, who, in 1847, presented to the trustees of the National Gallery a collection of 157 pictures by British artists. This splendid bequest has been combined with the similar ones of Mr. Sheepshanks and the painter Turner, thereby forming the nucleus of a magnificent gallery of the works of the English school of artists. At the present time (1861), the whole of these art-treasures are contained in the South Kensington Museum. Mr. Vernon was B. 1774; D. 1849.

VERNOUX, vair'-noo, a town of France, in the department of the Ardèche, 12 miles from Privas. Pop. 1,600.—Another in the department of the Deux-Sèvres, 11 miles from Parthenay. Pop. 1,400.

VEROCZE, ve-rooch'-e(r), a town of Sclavonia, capital of a county on the Drave, 63 miles from Essek. It has a castle and several large markets. Pop. 3,300.—The COUNTY has an area of 1,770 square miles and a population of 225,000.

VEROLENGO, ver-o-len'-go, a town and parish of Italy, in Piedmont, 18 miles from Turin. Pop. about 4,700.

VERONA, ve-ro'-na, the capital city of a delegation of Lombardy, on the Adige, 22 miles from Mantua. It is inclosed by turreted walls, and surrounded by the fortresses Mantua, Legnano, and Peschiera, and, hence, considered as of the highest importance for the defence of Upper Italy. It has several gates, of which one, called Porta del Paglio, is of elegant architecture. The interior of the city does not correspond with the beauty of its position, several of the streets being narrow and dirty; others, however, are spacious and well paved. The houses, though built in general in an antique style, are of good appearance, from the quantity of marble employed in their construction; a consequence of the abundant quarries in the neighbourhood. Verona contains a cathedral and a number of churches, noted for their paintings and their architecture. The church of St. Zeno is remarkable for its façade, its vast portal, and the rows of marble columns which support its roof, and is supposed to date from the 7th century; that of St. Anastasia for its great size and fine monuments, and that of St. George for its paintings. The town-house has, on the outside, niches containing busts of statues of the distinguished natives of Verona,—Pliny the elder, Vitruvius, Catullus, and Cornelius Nepos, Paul Veronese, Bianchini, and others. The building called the Royal Palace has never been completed. The Palazzo Bevilacqua, the oldest building in Verona; the Palazzo Cannossia, admired for its front; and the museum of the academy, for its portico, with its peristyle of large Ionic columns,—are worthy of note. Besides these, there are the palace of the Grand Guardia, a modern building, and the custom-house. Of all the monuments of Verona, the most interesting is the Roman amphitheatre, situate in the spacious square called the Piazza del Bra. This is one of the most magnificent remains of Roman architecture that has descended to modern times. The arena, situate in the centre, and of an oval form, is 220 feet in length, with a breadth of 130. The seats, rising in successive ranges from the arena, as well as the different passages, the staircases and galleries of communication, remain entire. The whole consists of vast blocks of marble, and forms a most solid mass, resting on a double row of massy vaults, which, in former ages, were appropriated to the custody of the lions, tigers, and other wild beasts. The Academia Philarmonica, and the Philoli, contain a number of ancient monuments, not only in Greek and Latin, but in the Punic and Egyptian languages. It has a lyceum, or great school, a classical school, and an academy of painting. Here are a public library and several private collections. Here are also the tombs of the Scaligers, a singular monument of the Middle Ages, consisting of a series of Gothic pyramids, surmounted by an equestrian statue of each prince. Manf. Silk, woollens, cottons, leather, gloves, and shoes, and famous dye-works. Pop. about 53,000.—The date of the foundation of Verona is not known; but Julius Cæsar established a colony here. On the decline of the empire, it experienced the fate of the other towns in the north of Italy. In 1814, on the overthrow of Napoleon I., it fell into the hands of Austria, and in 1822 a congress was held in it.—The DELEGATION, or province, has an area of 1,330 square miles and a population of about 285,000.

VERONA, a post township of Oneida county, New York, U.S., 20 miles from Utica. Pop. 6,000.

VERONESE, Paul Cagliari, surnamed, ver-o-nai'-sai, a celebrated Italian painter, who was the son of a sculptor. His genius for the art in which he subsequently excelled was manifested at an early age. He took Titian and Tintorretto as his models, emulating the fine design and composition of the first, with the gorgeous colouring of the latter. Finding himself unappreciated at Verona, he took up his residence at Venice, which city he embellished with a series of master-pieces. His most admired works are—"The Marriage of Cana," and the "Apotheosis of Venice." His brother, Benedetto Cagliari, assisted him in several of his works, as did also his son, surnamed Carletto, who promised to become a great painter, but died in his 26th year. Paul Veronese was born at Verona, 1528 or 1530; D. 1588.

VERRIO, Antonio, vair'-re-o, an Italian painter, who was invited to England by Charles II., and employed upon the decorations of Windsor Castle. Nearly all the ceilings, and a side of St. George's Hall, were executed by him; but most of his designs have been removed. He subsequently painted for James II. and William III. Walpole says: "His exuberant pencil was ready at pouring out gods, goddesses, kings, emperors, and triumphs, over those public surfaces on which the eye never rests long enough to criticise, and where one should be sorry to place the works of a better master—I mean ceilings and staircases." B. about 1639; D. at Hampton Court, 1707.

VERRIUS, Flaccus, ver'-ri-us, an eminent Roman grammarian, who was nominated by the emperor Augustus tutor to his two grandsons, Caius and Lucius, sons of Agrippa. There remain of his works numerous fragments, which have been collected and published by Faggini and others. Flourished about the commencement of the 1st century.

VERROCHIO, Andrea del, ver-ro'-ke-o, an Italian painter, sculptor, architect, and goldsmith, who was the master of Leonardo da Vinci, Perugino, and other celebrated artists. He executed some fine statues in bronze, but his paintings were indifferent. B. at Florence, 1432; D. at Venice, 1488.

VERSAILLES, vair'-si, a town of France, capital of the department Seine-and-Oise, 10 miles from Paris, and long the residence of the court. In 1666 it was little more than a village, with a hunting-lodge for the royal family, when Louis XIV., pleased with the situation, and desirous of residing out of Paris, erected a splendid palace, which, from 1672 to 1790, was the residence of the kings of France. It was restored during the late reign of Louis Philippe, and is now used as an historical museum. Its galleries contain a series of paintings and statues arranged in chronological order. It is approached by three great avenues, each lined with a double row of trees, and leading respectively from Paris, St. Cloud, and Sceaux. In connection with it are a theatre, a decorated chapel, an orangery, flower-gardens, and a park, in which are fountains and statues. The fountains are supplied with water by the machine of Marly, and at the extremity of the park are two palaces called the Great and Little Trianon. The streets of the city cross each other at right angles. The old town contains the principal church and the greater proportion of elegant buildings. The principal structures are the church of St. Louis, the Prefecture, and the Chancery. There are, besides, a high school, several private seminaries of education, a valuable library, a cabinet of natural history, a botanical garden, and a chamber of commerce. Manf. Firearms, clocks, and watches. Spinning and weaving of cotton, as well as the bleaching of linen, are pursued on a small scale. Pop. 36,000.—This city has been the scene of many treaties; among them the one which, in 1783, recognized the independence of America. Here, also, the famous oath termed the Jeu de Paume was taken, in 1789, by the members of the National Assembly. It is now a popular place of resort, and is the birthplace of Philip V. of Spain, Louis XV., XVI., and XVIII., General Hoche, Ducis, and other celebrated men. It communicates by railway with Paris.

VERSAILLES, ver-sailz', a town and capital of Woodford county, Kentucky, U.S., 12 miles from Lexington. Pop. about 1,000.

VERSETZ, ver-sets', a fortified town of Hungary, in the county of Temesvar, and 40 miles from Temesvar. It has a school for the followers of the Greek church. Wine, rice, and silk are cultivated in the environs. Manf. Silk. Pop. about 18,000.

VERSTEGAN, Richard, vers'-te-gan, an English antiquary, who was of Flemish extraction. Being a Roman Catholic, he, some time previously to the year 1585, went to Antwerp, where he wrote a work entitled "Restitution of Decayed Intelligence in Antiquities concerning the most Noble and Renowned English Nation." He also produced "The Sundry Successive Regal Governments of England," and some other works. B. in London; D. about 1635.

VERTE RIVIÈRE, vairt riv'-e-air, a river of Lower Canada, which falls into the St. Lawrence.

VERTEUIL, vair'-tu(r)e, a town of France, in the department of the Lot-and-Garonne, 12 miles from Marmande. Pop. 1,800.—Another in the department Charente, 4 miles from Ruffec. Pop. 1,200.—Another in the department Gironde. Pop. 1,100.

VERTOT, René Aubert de, vair'-to, an eminent French historian, who became a Capuchin, but afterwards quitted that order, and entered among the canons regular of the Premonstrant abbey at Valsery. In 1705 he was admitted a member of the Academy of Belles-Lettres, and in 1715 was appointed historiographer of the order of Malta. His most important works are,—"History of the Revolutions of Portugal;" "The Revolutions of Sweden;" "History of the Roman Revolutions;" "Origin of the Grandeur of the Court of Rome;" and a critical history of the establishment of the Britons among the Gauls. B. in Normandy, 1655; D. at Paris, 1735.

VERTOU, vair'-too, a parish and town of France, in the department of the Loire Inférieure, 4 miles from Nantes. Pop. 6,000.

VERTUE, George, ver'-chu, an eminent English engraver and antiquary, who was employed by Sir Godfrey Kneller, Jervase, Richardson, and other artists, to engrave portraits after their paintings. Appointed engraver to the Society of Antiquaries in 1717, he became acquainted with Heneage Finch, earl of Winchelsea, and other noblemen, patrons of the arts, who belonged to that body, and by whom he was assisted in obtaining original portraits for his engravings. He wrote a work entitled "Anecdotes of Painting in England," which was left in manuscript, and afterwards published by Horace Walpole; and also engraved the portraits of scores of the most illustrious persons in English history. Walpole says of this distinguished antiquary, "No man living so bigoted to a vocation was ever so incapable of falsehood. He did not deal even in hypothesis—scarce in conjecture." B. in London, 1684; D. 1756.

VERTUMNUS, ver-tum'-nus, a deity among the Romans, who presided over the spring season and orchards. He is generally represented as a young man crowned with flowers, covered up to the waist, and holding in his right hand fruit, and a crown of plenty in his left.

VERUS, Lucius Ceianius Commodus, ve'-rus, a Roman emperor, was the son of Ælius Verus and Domitia Lucilla, and adopted by Adrian. He commanded against the barbarians in the East, whom he defeated, and was honoured with a triumph. He was also admitted as an associate with Marcus Aurelius in the empire, from 161 to 169, at which latter date he died suddenly of apoplexy, while marching against the Marcomanni and Quadi. He was a prince of dissolute manners.

VERVICK, or WERICQ, vair'-nik, a frontier town of Belgium, in W. Flanders, on the Lys, 9 miles from Ypres. Pop. 6,000.

VERVIERS, vair'-ve-ai, a town of Belgium, on the Wesdre, or Vesdre, 15 miles from Liege. Manf. Woollens, dyes, soap, vitriol, and aquafortis. Pop. 20,000.—It has a station on the railway to Cologne.

VERVINS, vair'-vă, a town of France, in the department Aisne, 25 miles from Laon. Manf. Umbrellas and hosiery. Pop. 3,000.—Here, in 1598, a treaty of peace was concluded between Philip II. of Spain and Henry IV. of France.

VESALIUS, Andreas, ve-sai'-li-us, an illustrious Flemish physician. He studied at Paris under James Sylvius, after which he taught anatomy with great reputation in several universities. The emperor Charles V., and Philip II. of Spain appointed him their chief physician; but, about 1564, having opened the body of a Spanish gentleman, and removing the heart, he, so runs the story, found it quivering in his hand; the relatives of the deceased man reported him to the Inquisition, and, to expiate his offence, he was obliged to go on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. It is, however, more probable that his departure was owing to his having taken part in one of the plots so rife in Madrid about that time. On his return, his ship was lost on the island of Zante, where he perished either of starvation or fatigue. His great works upon medicine inaugurated a new era in the healing art. B. 1514; D. 1564.

VESLE, or VELE, vail, a river of France, traversing the departments Aisne and Marne, and, after a course of 65 miles, joining the Aisne, 6 miles from Soissons.

VESOUL, ve-zool', a town of France, in the department of the Upper Saone, near the Durgeon, 25 miles from Besançon. Manf Calicoes, lace, and caps. Pop. 6,700.

VESPASIAN, Titus Flavius, ves-pai'-si-an, a Roman emperor. He rose entirely by his merit; and, having distinguished himself in Germany, as proconsul in Africa, and in Britain under Claudius, was rewarded with the consular dignity for his public services. Nero appointed him commander of three legions, with which he in two years subdued the revolted Jews. On the death of Vitellius in 69, he was proclaimed emperor by his army, and the choice was approved by the senate and the people. He reformed the abuses which prevailed in all departments of the state, introduced excellent regulations for the correction of public morals, embellished Rome with many fine structures,—among others, that of the amphitheatre, since known as the Coliseum; fortified the cities of the empire, and proved himself the father of the people. He was also a patron of men of learning, and discountenanced vice and immorality. Under his rule, Petilius Cerealis conquered the Treviri, Agricola was victorious in Britain, and his son Titus laid siege to and took Jerusalem. B. near Reate, in the Sabine country, 9; D. 79.

VESPUCCI, Amerigo, ves-poo'-che, an Italian, who, according to an account first published in Lorraine in 1507, went upon four voyages; two at the command of the king of Castile, and two at that of the Portuguese monarch. This narrative, which was produced without his concurrence, declared that, in his first voyage, made in 1497, he discovered the northern shores of South America; but Humboldt proves this date to be a mistake for 1499; also, that as Columbus had reached the mouth of the Orinoco in 1498, he was in reality the discoverer. (See AMERICA.) Humboldt further shows that the application of Amerigo's name to the newly-discovered country was made through ignorance. He subsequently became pilot-major of the Spanish navy, and remained the friend of Columbus until the death of that great navigator. B. at Florence, 1451; D. at Seville, 1512.

VESTA, ves'-ta, the goddess of fire, and the patroness of the vestal virgins. She is called the daughter of Saturn and Rhea. Æneas first introduced her mysteries into Italy, and Numa built in her honour a temple, where no males were permitted to enter. A fire was kept continually burning in her sanctuary by a certain number of virgins, who had dedicated themselves to the service of the goddess. If the fire ever became extinct, the virgin by whose negligence it had happened was severely punished, and it was kindled again by the rays of the sun. She was represented in a long flowing robe, with a veil on her head, holding in one hand a lamp, or a two-eared vessel, and in the other a javelin, or sometimes a palladium.

VESTAL VIRGINS, or VESTALES, ves-tal'-leez, priestesses among the Romans, consecrated to the service of Vesta. Their employment was to take care that the sacred fire of Vesta was not extinguished. It was required that they should be born of a good family, and be without blemish or deformity in every part of their bodies. For thirty years they were to remain virgins. The ten first years were spent in learning the duties of the order, the ten following were employed in discharging them, and the ten last in instructing such as had entered the noviciate. When the thirty years had expired, they were permitted to marry, or, if they still preferred celibacy, they waited upon the rest of the vestals. For the thousand years during which the order existed, only eighteen of the vestals were punished for the violation of their vow. The order was abolished by Theodosius the Great, and the fire of Vesta extinguished.

VESTRIS, Gaetano Apollino Balthazar, ves'-tris, a celebrated Italian dancer, who became the greatest performer of his day, and was surnamed "the god of dancing." His vanity was even greater than his reputation. He was in the habit of saying, "There are only three great men in Europe; myself, Voltaire, and the king of Prussia" (Frederick II.). B. at Florence, 1729; D. 1808. His natural son, Marie Augustin Vestris, also became celebrated as a dancer. The English actress Madame Vestris was connected with this family by marriage.

VESUVIUS, Mount, ve-su'-vi-us, a mountain in the S. of Italy, about 8 miles from Naples, celebrated for its volcanic eruptions. It rises in a gentle swell from the Bay of Naples, to an elevation of nearly 3,950 feet. The view from its summit is very beautiful, including Naples, with its bay, its islands, and its promontories, as well as the delightful scenery of the Campagna Felice. To the west, the prospect loses itself in the immensity of the sea; to the east it extends far into the interior, until bounded by the Apennines. The upper part of the mountain is torn by a series of convulsions, and strewed with fragments; the part next in the descent is mixed with dried lava, extending in wide black lines over its surface; while the lower part of the mountain, as if danger were far remote, is covered with villages and country-seats, with fields of maize, groves of fruit-trees, and other luxuriant productions, all displaying the great fertility given by the ashes to the soil. The summit is in the form of a cone, and consists of masses of burned earth, ashes, and sand, thrown out in the course of ages by the volcano. The crater is nearly a mile and a half in circumference, but has not above 350 feet of depth or of descent from the ridge. After the eruption of 1794, the cone lost much of its elevation; a portion of it, after being shaken, and even raised, by the convulsion, sinking down into the crater, and almost filling up the cavity. The fire raging in the hollow of the mountain, having thus lost its upward vent, poured out the lava from its side, which rolled down the declivity all the way to the sea. The total number of eruptions on record is 50, reckoning from the celebrated one of A.D. 79, which proved destructive to Herculaneum. The most distinguished occurred in 472, 1779, 1794, 1819, 1834, and 1839. In 1860 another took place, when a contemporary described "the sides of Vesuvius as cracking in all directions, and the lower part of the cone pierced with small craters in continual eruption. If this state of things continue, it is possible that the great cone, formed by the accumulation of lava vomited forth by the volcano, might fall to pieces some night or other; and the result would be terrible, not for Naples, lying tranquilly at a respectable distance, but for Resina and Portici, which are at the foot of this formidable neighbour. It would be strange to see Vesuvius again overwhelm the towns which have been built of the rubbish which buried Herculaneum."

VESZPRIM, vess'-prim, a town of Hungary, on the Sed, 60 miles from Buda. It has a trade in salt, wine, corn, potash, and glass. Pop. about 12,000.

VETTORI, Pietro, vet'-to-re, a learned Italian, who participated in the republican rising which resulted in the expulsion of the Medici from Florence in 1527; and when a scion of that family was created duke and ruler of that city by Charles V., he retired into private life, but was afterwards recalled to his native city, and appointed professor of Latin and Greek. One of the most learned men of his age, he edited the works of Cicero, Terence, and Æschylus, wrote commentaries upon Aristotle, and produced some original poems in Italian. B. at Florence, 1499; D. at the same city, 1585.

VEVAY, vev-ai', a well-built town of the Swiss canton of the Pays de Vaud, on the Lake of Geneva, 10 miles from Lausanne. Manf. Leather, jewellery, and woollens. Pop. 5,000. In the church of St. Martin are the tombs of the regicides Broughton and Ludlow, who died here in exile.

VEVAY, a post township of the United States, and capital of Switzerland county, Indiana, on the Ohio, 90 miles from Indianapolis. It contains a court-house and a gaol, and was settled by emigrants from Switzerland. Pop. 1,300.

VEZELAY, vez'-e-lai, a town of France, in the department of the Yonne, 25 miles from Auxerre. Pop. 1,200. Here, in 1145, St. Bernard preached the crusade to the parliament of Vezelay. It is the birthplace of Vauban.

VIADANA, ve-a-da'-na, a town of Lombardy, on the Po, 20 miles from Mantua. Pop. 16,000.

VIANA, ve-a'-na, a town of Portugal, in the province of Minho, on the Lima, 42 miles from Oporto. It is inclosed by walls surmounted by turrets, and its harbour is defended by batteries. Pop. 8,200, engaged in trade and fishing.—This place surrendered to Admiral Sir Charles Napier in the revolution which deprived Don Miguel of the throne.

VIANA, a town of Spain, 45 miles from Pamplona. Manf. Woollen goods and hats. Pop. 3,200.

VIANEN, ve-a'-nen, a town of the Netherlands, on the Leck, 7 miles from Utrecht. Pop. 2,500.

VIARDOT, Louis, ve-ar'-do, a modern French littérateur, who was educated for the legal profession, but relinquished it for literature. In 1838 he was appointed a director at the Italian Opera-house of Paris; and under his management Signor Mario and Mademoiselle Pauline Garcia made their début. The last-named lady became his wife, and he accompanied her in her professional visits to Spain, Germany, and England. His principal works were "Studies in the History, Administration, and Literature of Spain;" "The Museums of Spain, England, and Belgium;" and "History of the Moors in Spain." He also translated some of the works of the Russian authors, Nicholas Gogol and Alexander Pushkin, into French. B. at Dijon, 1800. His wife was one of the most talented of the Italian singers of her day.

VIAREGGIO, ve-a-red'-jo, a seaport of Italy, in the duchy of Lucca, 14 miles from Leghorn. It has an export trade in statuary marble. Pop. 6,000.

VIASMA, ve-as'-ma, a town in the interior of European Russia, in the province of Smolensk, at the junction of the rivers Vlasma and Bebri, 100 miles from Smolensk. It has numerous churches, convents, and schools. Pop. 12,000.—It was the scene of partial engagements between the French and Russians in 1812.

VIATKA, ve-at'-ka, a government or province in the east of European Russia, bounded N.E. by the government of Perm and S. by that of Kusan. Area, 53,000 square miles. Desc. In the E. it is covered by numerous branches of the Ourał Mountains; in its other parts it is mostly undulating and level. Rivers. The Kama, the Viatka, the Urschoma, and the Peschma. Pro. Rye, oats, wheat, barley, pease, lentils, flax, and hemp. Potatoes are raised only in gardens. It has also extensive forests. Minerals. Iron and copper. Manf. Woollens, linens, paper, leather, soap, potash, firearms, anchors, and machinery. Lat. between 55° 30' and 60° N. Lon. between 46° and 54° E. Pop. 1,670,000.

VIATKA, the capital of the above government, is situate on the Viatka, and is the great centre of the commerce of the government. Pop. 7,000.

VIATKA, a river of Russia, traversing the centre of the government of the same name. It rises 16 miles from Glazov, and, after a course of 500 miles, joins the Kama, in the government of Kasan.

VIC, vik, the name of several towns and parishes in France, none of them with a population above 4,000.

VICARS, John, vik'-ars, an English writer, who became usher of the school in Christ's Hospital, and distinguished himself in the civil wars as a zealous Presbyterian. He wrote a poem entitled "God in the Mount; or, England's Remembrancer;" "Looking-Glass for Malignants;" and other pamphlets against the royalists. Butler mentions him as "being inspired with ale or viler liquors." B. in London, about 1600; D. 1652.

VICARY, Thomas, vik'-a-re, an eminent English surgeon, and one of the first who wrote upon anatomy in the English language. He was serjeant-surgeon to Henry VIII., Edward VI., Mary I., and Elizabeth, and also chief surgeon of St. Bartholomew's Hospital. His book is entitled "A Treasure for Englishmen, contayning the Anatomy of Man's Bodie," first published in 1548. Flourished in the 16th century.

VICENTE, ST., ve-sen'-tai, a city of central America, 25 miles from San Salvador. Around it are indigo and tobacco plantations, and near it the volcano of St. Vicente. Pop. 8,000.

VICENZA, ve-chen'-za, a city of Lombardy, capital of a delegation, 40 miles from Venice. It stands at the confluence of two rivers, one of which divides the town into two parts, connected by bridges and inclosed by walls. It contains several good streets, and has a market-place, of which the chief ornament is the front of the town-house. Its principal buildings are the town-house, equally remarkable for the beauty of its architecture and the value of the paintings contained in it; the Olympic theatre, built at the expense of a society, in the ancient Roman taste; the bridge of St. Michele, consisting of one lofty arch, resembling the Rialto at Venice; a number of churches and religious houses, some of elegant structure, and the works of Palladio; others of the Gothic taste, and more ancient. The cathedral is large. The church Della Gratie, inferior in size, is far superior in design and execution. Other churches of more recent date are elegant structures, and, on the whole, few towns can vie with this in the general taste of its architecture. Manf. The chief are of silk, woollen, and leather; also gold and silver articles. Pop. 30,000.—Vicenza was a Roman station, and suffered greatly on the irruption of the northern tribes. It was successively pillaged by Alaric, Attila, the Lombards, and the emperor Frederick II. In the early part of the 15th century it came into the possession of the Venetians, who held it till 1796, when it became the scene of sanguinary conflicts between the French and Austrians. It communicates with Venice by railway.

VICH, or VIQUR, veek, a city of Spain, 36 miles from Barcelona. It has some curious specimens of the architecture of the Middle Ages, and was the metropolitan see of Catalonia. Manf. Linens, coarse woollen fabrics, and printed cottons. Pop. 11,000.

VICO, ve'-ko, a town of Italy, in the Pontifical States, 2 miles from Mondovi. Pop. 3,000.

VICO, a town of Naples, in the province of Capitanata, 12 miles from Viesti. Pop. 2,800.

VICO, John Baptist, a learned Italian writer, who became professor of rhetoric in the university of Naples. His principal work is entitled "Principles of a New Science," wherein he declares that the history of mankind is regulated by laws as fixed and regular in their operation as those which determine the operations of the material world. B. at Naples, 1688; D. at the same city, 1740.

VICQ-D'AZYR, Felix, vik-da-zeer', an eminent French physician and naturalist, who became perpetual secretary of the Royal Society of Medicine, 1776, and was afterwards chosen to succeed Buffon as member of the French Academy. He was also chief physician to Queen Marie Antonette; but, in order to preserve his life, he pretended to embrace the views of the Revolutionists. His principal works were—several learned anatomical treatises upon the brain, ear, on the organ of speech, and upon anatomy and physiology. B. at Valogne, 1748; D. 1794.

VICTOR, vik'-tor, a post-township of the United States, in Ontario county, New York. Pop. 2,300.

VICTOR, the name of numerous parishes and villages of France, none with a population above 2,000.

VICTOR I. was elected pope in succession to Eleutherius, about 185. He was engaged in a controversy with the churches of Asia, relative to the correct period of the Easter festival. He was born in Africa, and died about 197.

VICTOR II. succeeded Leo IX. in 1055. He had previously been bishop of Eichstadt and counsellor to Henry III. of Germany. He reformed many abuses in the Church, which were condemned at the council of Florence. The council of Lyons against simony, that of Rouen enforcing celibacy among the priesthood, and that of Narbonne excommunicating those who usurped the possessions of the Church, were also convoked by him. His successor was Stephen IX. D. at Florence, 1057.

VICTOR III. was the successor of Gregory VII. Guibert, the antipope, was supported by the army of Henry IV., and Victor renounced the pontifical dignity, but was induced to resume it in 1087. By the assistance of the Roman nobility and the duke of Apulia, he expelled the antipope from Rome. Henry IV. having declared that he would invade Rome if Victor were not deposed, the senators forced the pope to evacuate the Vatican. He retired to Monte Casino, and died there in 1087.

VICTOR IV., an antipope, whose usurpation was supported by Frederick I. and some of the cardinals. This gave rise to a schism in the Romish church. D. 1164.

VICTOR, St., of Marseilles, had served in the army of the emperor Maximian; but, having embraced Christianity, suffered martyrdom about 303.

VICTOR, Claude Perrin, duke of Belluno, and marshal of France. He enlisted as a private soldier in an artillery regiment in 1781, and at the outburst of the revolutionary wars, having greatly distinguished himself, was created chef-de-bataillon, in which capacity he served, in 1793, at the siege of Toulon, where he commanded the party that captured Fort l'Aiguillette. Promoted to the rank of general of brigade, he was sent to the army of the Eastern Pyrenees, where, as subsequently in Italy, he exhibited great bravery and skill. Attracting the notice of Bonaparte, he was appointed second in command to Lannes in the campaign in the Papal States. His next important command was in La Vendée, which country he, by his skilful policy, succeeded in restoring to tranquillity.

Recalled to the army of Italy, he gained fresh renown by his conduct while covering the retreat of the French army of Naples at Marengo and at Bassano. At the peace of Amiens he was appointed by Napoleon ambassador to the court of Denmark; but upon the commencement of the war with Prussia, in 1806, he was recalled to his military duties. At Jena he particularly distinguished himself, as also at Pultusk; while at the battle of Friedland his valour was so conspicuous, that Napoleon created him, upon the spot, marshal of France. In 1807 he held the governorship of Berlin. In the following year he was sent to Spain in command of the first corps of the French army, and, after twice defeating the Spaniards, was sent to co-operate with Soult in Portugal. He, however, suffered a defeat at Talavera, and, in 1812, was recalled from the Peninsula to take a command in the grand army about to invade Russia. In that terrible campaign his valour was conspicuous; and at the passage of the Beresina, he held in check the pursuing Russians, and saved a large number of his fellow-soldiers, who would otherwise have fallen into the power of the enemy. During the campaign of 1813, he evinced his accustomed bravery and skill, in checking, as far as possible, the advance of the allies into France; but having failed to dislodge the enemy at Montereau, he incurred the displeasure of the emperor, who took from him his command. This act of injustice deeply moved the brave marshal, who declared that he would not quit the army, and, as he had already served as a private soldier, he would again take his place in the ranks. Napoleon, appreciating his fidelity, gave him the command of a portion of the guard, with which he fought, with the most stubborn courage, at the battle of Craonne, and was carried off the field severely wounded. After the abdication of the emperor, he gave his adherence to the Bourbons, and was appointed to a command. He subsequently evinced much bitterness against Napoleon and Marshal Ney, and refusing to follow the example of most of the other captains of Napoleon, by rejoining his standard after the return from Elba, he retired, with Louis XVIII., to Ghent. In 1821 he became minister of war, and, in 1823, acted as second in command in the Spanish campaign. After the revolution of 1830 he became one of the leaders of the legitimist party; but took little part in public affairs. One of the bravest commanders of the imperial armies, his fame was principally owing to the bold and able manner in which he executed manœuvres set down for him by a higher authority. He usually failed when holding an independent command. His treatment of the sick and wounded English soldiers in the town of Talavera reflects great credit upon his humanity. B. at La Marche, 1764; D. 1841.

VICTOR-AMADEUS I., a-maï'-de-us, duke of Savoy, was brought up at the Spanish court, whence, in 1614, his father recalled him, to assist in the campaign against France. He succeeded his father in the dukedom of Savoy in 1630, and in the following year obtained Montferrato and Alba. He was compelled by Cardinal Richelieu to become the ally of France against the Spaniards, over whom he obtained several advantages. His wife was the daughter of Henry IV. of France. He built the university of Turin, and provided it with several distinguished professors. B. at Turin, 1587; D. at Verceil, 1637.

VICTOR-AMADEUS II., the first king of Sardinia, succeeded his father as duke of Savoy in 1675. He joined Spain and Austria against France; on which Marshal Catinat was sent against him, and the French gaining a great victory at Staffarde, nearly subdued the whole of Savoy. Victor-Amadeus, on the other hand, entered Dauphiny, and made himself master of some strong places, which, however, he was obliged to abandon, and to sue for peace. In 1701 he again entered into hostilities with France, having been promised by the emperor a considerable accession of territory. The duke de Vendôme took possession of a considerable part of Savoy, and the French laid siege to Turin, which was relieved by Prince Eugene. In 1713 Victor recovered the whole of his territory, and was, by the treaty of London, acknowledged king of Sardinia. In 1730 he abdicated the throne to his son; but, repenting of what he had done, he endeavoured to recover the crown. In this, however, he failed, and, after remaining during some time under arrest, was compelled to retire to his private residence at Moncalieri. He was famous both as a general and statesman; he gave an impulse to trade and manufactures in his dominions; encouraged the cultivation of the mulberry-tree and the breeding of silkworms; thus laying the foundation of that branch of commerce in Piedmont. By his marriage with Anne-Maria of Orleans, daughter of Henrietta-Maria, wife of Philip, duke of Orleans, and granddaughter of Charles I., the house of Savoy became connected with the royal family of England. B. 1666; D. 1732.

VICTOR-AMADEUS III. succeeded his father Carlo Emmanuel III., in 1733. During the wars of the French revolution, he lost Savoy and Nice, and was compelled by Napoleon to become the vassal of France. B. 1726; D. 1796.

VICTOR AURELIUS. (See AURELIUS, Victor.)

VICTOR-EMMANUEL I., e-măn'-u-el, king of Sardinia. As duke of Aosta he opposed an energetic resistance to the French revolutionary armies; and, upon his father, Victor-Amadeus III., concluding a treaty of peace in 1796 with Bonaparte, he withheld his acknowledgment of it, and retired to the island of Sardinia. When his brother, Carlo-Emmanuel IV., abdicated, in 1802, he succeeded to the crown. By the treaty of Paris, in 1814, Nice and a moiety of Savoy were restored to him. The remaining portions of Savoy and Genoa were subsequently added to his dominions. He persistently refused to grant a constitution to his subjects, and in 1821 a revolution burst forth, in consequence of which he was compelled to abdicate. He was succeeded by his brother Carlo-Felix. B. 1759; D. at Moncalieri, 1824.

VICTOR-EMMANUEL II. was the son of Carlo-Alberto, and, while heir-apparent, fought in the campaign against the Austrians, which, terminating in the disastrous battle of Novara, caused his father to abdicate. He became king in 1849, under the most unfavourable circumstances. He had to avert the consequences of a disastrous war, to allay faction, and to preserve the constitution, to annul which, it is stated, Austria attempted to bribe him with the offer of Parma. After securing the services of eminent statesmen, and chiefly of the illustrious Cavour, he undertook the complete reorganization of the finances, the army, the system of public education; concluded with England a treaty of commerce, and obtained a treaty of peace from Austria upon comparatively easy terms. Although threatened with excommunication by Rome, he persevered in granting the blessings of religious liberty throughout his dominions. In 1855 his monarchy acquired additional consideration in consequence of the convention signed with England and France, by which his troops became the comrades of the allied armies in the Crimea. At the battle of the Tchernaya the Sardinian soldiers behaved with the greatest bravery, and it became generally known that the military organization of Sardinia was of the most complete character. In 1855 he paid a visit to the English court, and also received an enthusiastic reception from the English people. His daughter, the Princess Clothilde, was given in marriage to Prince Napoleon, cousin of the emperor of the French. In 1859, after a series of sanguinary engagements, in which the Austrians were defeated by the allied French and Sardinian troops, and in which the bravery of Victor-Emmanuel was conspicuous, the Austrians were driven from Lombardy, which state was annexed to the Sardinian crown. In 1860 the grand-duchy of Tuscany, the duchy of Parma, and other important states of the Italian peninsula, voted for their annexation to the territories acknowledging the sway of the Sardinian monarch. Sicily, Naples, as well as several provinces of the Papal States, also rose against their tyrannical masters, and these fair countries were enabled, principally through the courageous conduct of the patriot Garibaldi, to become an integral portion of that constitutional monarchy which, with Victor Emmanuel II. as its head, may eventually include the whole of the Italian peninsula, from "the Alps to the Adriatic." Rome, groaning under papal misgovernment, and Venetia, oppressed by Austria, are still (1861) debarred from participating in the freedom which is being diffused and consolidated throughout the "kingdom of Italy,"—a kingdom which has been acknowledged by England and France. It is to be deeply regretted that the services rendered by the French empire towards the establishment of a free Italy have been purchased by the cession to France of Savoy and Nice. He is titular king of Cyprus and Jerusalem, and a knight of the order of the Garter. B. 1820.

VICTORIA, vik-tor'-i-a, the goddess of victory among the Romans, was sister to Strength and Valour, and was one of the attendants upon Jupiter. She was also greatly honoured by the Greeks, particularly at Athens. She was represented with wings, crowned with laurel, and holding the branch of a palm-tree in her hand.

VICTORIA, a maritime town of Brazil, 270 miles from Rio Janeiro. It is built on the W. side of an island, and has a governor's residence, and a harbour defended by forts. Pop. 5,000.

VICTORIA, a town of the British colony of Hong-Kong, China, with numerous storehouses and European residences. Pop. about 9,000.

VICTORIA, a district of Cape Colony, S. Africa. Area, 1,000,000 acres. Pop. 8,000.

VICTORIA, a lake of Central Asia, in the table-land of Pamir, 15,600 feet above the level of the sea.

VICTORIA, N. Australia. (See PORT ESSINGTON.)

VICTORIA, formerly called Port Phillip, a British colonial territory, comprising all that portion of Australia S. of the river Murray, between lat. 34° and 39° S., and lon. 141° and 150° E. It is bounded on the N. by New South Wales, W. by the colony of S. Australia, E. by the Pacific Ocean, and S. by Bass's Straits, which separate it from Tasmania. Area, 97,000 square miles. Desc. Undulating, or level, with the Australian Alps shutting out a fertile and wooded region, called Gibbs's Land, from Victoria proper. In the W. are the Grampians and the Australian Pyrenees, with many lofty heights. Rivers. The principal are the Murray, the Hume, and the Hovell, and the colony has many salt lagoons or lakes. Climate. Healthy; January corresponding to the July of England. The temperature at Port Phillip ranges from 32° to 90° in the year, and may average about 60° Fahrenheit. Pro. Grains; but the vast plains are generally devoted to pastoral pursuits, and the wool produced is of excellent quality. Sheep and cattle rearing are the principal occupations. The grape is cultivated with success, and other fruits. Minerals. Gold, coal, copper, lead, and manganese. Exp. Wool, sheep, cattle, skins, hides, tallow, pork, beef, timber, and mimosa bark; but the discovery of gold, in 1851, produced the most remarkable fluctuations in trade, and overturned all the ordinary pursuits of industry. The gold-bearing districts of Victoria are the most productive in the world. Throughout the colony, both churches and schools are numerous, and in 1854 the foundation-stone of a university was laid at Melbourne. Pop. Variable; perhaps 250,000.—Victoria was first settled in 1834, and formed a dependency of New South Wales till 1850. It has now several railways in operation, and the recent successful explorations made through Central Australia will, in all likelihood, at no distant day, connect it with the north of the island-continent, and, thence, with British India.

VICTORIA ALEXANDRINA, queen of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, the daughter and only child of Edward, duke of Kent, fourth son of George III., by his wife Maria Louisa Victoria, of Saxe-Coburg Saalfeld. At the death of her father, in 1820, the duchess of Kent, whose first husband had been the prince of Leiningen, and who was the sister of Leopold, king of the Belgians, devoted herself to superintending the education of the future queen. "From the earliest age," says a standard work on biography, "the young princess was taught to seek health by exercise and temperance; to acquire fearlessness even from her amusements, such as riding and sailing; to practise a wise economy, united to a discriminating charity; to cultivate a self-reliance that should render her independent of and superior to mere favourites and flatterers." She became accomplished in music and languages; a knowledge of the sciences, particularly botany, was afforded her; while a complete acquaintance with the principles of the English constitution was obtained by her under the tutorship of Viscount Melbourne. On June 20, 1837, she ascended the throne of the United Kingdom, the duke of Cumberland becoming king of Hanover, in virtue of the law which excludes females from that throne. By this act, the connection between the crowns of England and Hanover was brought to a termination, after having existed during 123 years. On February 10, 1840, the queen became the wife of Prince Albert-Franz-August-Karl-Emmanuel, second son of the duke of Saxe-Coburg Gotha. On November 21 of the same year was born the Princess Royal, now Princess Frederick William of Prussia. The natal dates of the other children of her Majesty are,—November 9, 1841, Albert Edward, Prince of Wales; April 25, 1843, Alice Maud Mary; August 6, 1844, Alfred Ernest Albert; May 25, 1846, Helena Augusta Victoria; March 18, 1848, Louisa Caroline Alberta; May 1, 1850, Arthur William Patrick Albert; April 7, 1853, Leopold George Duncan Albert; April 15, 1857, Beatrice Mary Victoria Feodore. The following tribute to the virtues of Victoria, queen of Great Britain and Ireland,—a ruler who lives in the affections of her people, and under whose benignant sway England has attained to an unexampled degree of prosperity and of influence among the kingdoms of the earth,—was paid to his monarch by the Nestor of science and literature, Lord Brougham, who, upon a recent occasion, spoke of his queen as "that illustrious sovereign, than whom, in every respect, both in her public capacity and in her private, there never was a sovereign in this or any other country more entitled to the admiration and the gratitude of her people: as a sovereign, ruling upon true constitutional principles; as a parent, educating her family to be an example to every other family in her dominions." D. at Kensington Palace, May 24, 1819.

VICTORIA LAND, the name given to the supposed Antarctic continent, discovered in 1841, by Sir James Ross.

VICTORIA LAND, British N. America, lies between lat. 68° N. and a strait of the Arctic Ocean, and lon. 103° and 108° W.

VICTORIA RIVER, N. Australia, falls into the Indian Ocean, by the estuary Queen's Channel, in lat. 14° 46' S., lon. 129° 21' E.

VICTORINA, vik-to-re'-na, a celebrated matron, who placed herself at the head of the Roman armies, and made war against the emperor Gallienus. Her son, Victorinus, and her grandson, of the same name, were declared emperors; but, when they were assassinated, Victorina invested with the imperial purple one of her favourites, called Tetricus. She was poisoned in 269, according to some, by Tetricus himself.

VICTORIUS, Peter, vik-tor'-i-us, a learned Italian writer, whose life was employed in collecting and explaining the ancient Greek and Latin writers, particularly Cicero. He was professor of rhetoric, and member of the senate at Florence. B. at Florence, 1499; D. at the same place, 1585.

VIDA, Marco Girolamo, ve'-da, an eminent Italian writer, who, entering into orders, went to Rome, where he was in great favour with Leo X. In 1532 Clement VII., as a reward for a poem dedicated to him, created him bishop of Alba. He wrote, among other works, "The Art of Poetry," a poem of great merit; a poem on Versification, another one entitled "Scacchia Ludus," and a Life of Christ, in verse. B. at Cremona, 1490; D. at Alba, 1566.

VIDOCQ, François-Jules, ve'-dok, a notorious French detective officer, who was the son of a baker, whom he assisted in the business until his 13th year, when he commenced pilfering the stock, money, and silver forks and spoons. Detected in these acts, he was sent to prison, and while there he, with another boy-prisoner, planned a more extensive robbery of his parent's property. Shortly after his release, he abstracted the whole contents of the family cash-box, amounting to £80, which he shared with his companion, and started off from his native town for Ostend, with the intention of taking a passage in a vessel bound for America; but, falling in with a sharper, he lost the whole of his ill-acquired money. Thus reduced to a destitute condition, he entered the service of the proprietor of a travelling menagerie, who at first employed him in attending to the animals, and afterwards as an acrobat. He was, however, discharged from this situation in consequence of his refusal to perform the part of a savage who was to devour raw flesh. He next found a master in the keeper of a puppet-show, whom he quitted to assist an itinerant quack doctor. He led this vagrant life during two years, when, through the kind offices of an old priest, he was allowed to return to his father's roof. Unable to remain long at the regular work of his father's business, he enlisted in the army, saw some service, was created a corporal, but having quarrelled with and challenged the drum-major of the regiment, he, to avoid the consequences, deserted, and entered another regiment, with which he was present at the battle of Jemappes. Again deserting, he went over to the Austrians, but afterwards contrived to re-enter France. For the third time he became a soldier, and being wounded, was sent to his native place. He there married, left his wife almost immediately afterwards, became a gambler at Brussels, made love to and gained the affections of a countess, and was on the eve of being married to her, when, confessing that he already had a wife, he was rewarded for this, perhaps, his first honest act, with a large sum of money; whereupon, he repaired to Paris. But his gains were soon dissipated at the gambling-table, and, after a variety of strange adventures, he found himself convicted of forgery, and sentenced to eight years' penal servitude at the galleys. In the 6th year he effected his escape, obtained employment as an usher in a school, was recaptured, sent to Toulon, and again got free. Highway robbery and the betrayal of his companions to justice were the next steps in his career, which had now reached its turning point; for, after supporting himself during a few years as a toy-maker, or as a tailor, he applied for employment at the office of the commissioner of secret police in Paris, and, by dint of renewed solicitations, obtained a place as informer. By his means some of the most desperate gangs of robbers in the French capital were brought to justice; and so greatly had he distinguished himself in this new calling, that, about 1813, he was placed at the head of a company of secret police. He held this office until the year 1825, when he turned paper-maker, and commenced writing his memoirs. In 1834 he established a secret inquiry office, to assist trade and commerce by ascertaining the solvency of business people. He produced his memoirs under the title of the "True Mysteries of Paris," in 1844; and shortly afterwards repaired to London, where he opened an exhibition of the implements used by French burglars, a speculation which proved a failure. Thereupon he retired to Belgium. B. at Arras, 1775; D. in Belgium, 1850.

VIEN, Joseph Marie, ve'-en, an eminent French painter, who became director of the French academy at Rome, and at the establishment of the empire, commander of the Legion of Honour, and a count. He painted nearly two hundred historical pictures, nearly all of the largest size. B. at Montpellier, 1716; D. at Paris, 1809. His wife was an eminent painter of flowers, birds, &c., and died 1805.—Joseph Marie Vien, the son of the two preceding, was also eminent as a painter.

VIENNA, ve-en'-na (Germ. WIEN, veen) a city of central Europe, the capital of the Austrian empire, in the province of Lower Austria, on the right bank of the Danube, which is joined by the Wien and Alster, two streams, small but rapid, which flow through the town. As Vienna is built on a plain, it is subject to inundations from each of these rivers, particularly from the Wien. The shape of this metropolis is neither compact nor regular, the original part forming a town distinct from the suburbs. The shape of the former is circular, and its extent limited. Between it and the suburbs is an open space, also circular, and of the width of somewhat more than half a mile. The suburbs are now so connected as to form a continuous whole, surrounded on the outside by a wall which embraces a circuit of no less than 12 miles. The form of the whole city and suburbs together approaches to the circular, but with many irregularities. The ramparts serve only as public walks, called Bastei, and are a fashionable resort. They are entered by twelve gates, and the Burgthor gate is considered extremely fine. The city, or old part of Vienna, has the houses high and the streets narrow. In the suburbs the houses are not so high, the streets are wider, and many of the buildings are good. There is, however, in these quarters, a most heterogeneous mixture of family mansions, cottages, workshops, and manufactories. Some of the streets are not paved, and are subject to all the disadvantages of dust in dry, and of mud in wet weather. The streets are all well lighted at night; and in the city there are large subterranean sewers, which discharge themselves into the Danube. Vienna has eight squares; but they are small and irregular, and encumbered, rather than adorned, by grotesque ornaments. The imperial palace of Schönbrüner is situate at the western extremity of the city, close by the ramparts. It is a square edifice of vast extent; but having been built at very different periods, the appearance of the exterior is very irregular. The interior contains valuable collections. The riding-academy is said to be one of the largest in Europe; but it is surpassed by an assembly-room called the Hall of Apollo, which is said to be capable of containing 10,000 people. The Belvidere, a palace built by Prince Eugene, is in one of the suburbs. The imperial mews are capable of containing more than 400 horses. The arsenal contains 15,000 stands of arms, and many curious ornaments, all of iron. The churches constitute a prominent feature in the appearance of this city. The cathedral, with a tower 453 feet high, dedicated to St. Stephen, is an ancient Gothic building, which dates from 1270. The interior is elegant and simple: it contains several monuments, in particular that erected to Prince Eugene. The church of St. Peter is in the Italian style, on the model of the basilica tains a monument erected to the archduchess Maria of St. Peter at Rome. That of the Augustinians con-Christina by her husband, and considered one of the masterpieces of Canova. The charitable institutions are numerous and generally richly endowed. The great hospital, containing 2,000 beds, receives often from 15,000 to 20,000 patients in the course of a year. There are separate hospitals for the soldiers, for Jews, for foundlings, orphans, and aged persons. There are here an exchange, a botanical garden, a military hospital, an anatomical theatre, and a school of medicine, the best in Germany. There are also public classes for philosophy, the classical languages, literature, law, and theology, with many professors and assistants. There is, besides, on a small scale, a seminary for oriental languages. A more extensive establishment is that of the Academy of Fine Arts, and an institution formed in 1770, for the reception of specimens of manufacture. Greek literature is also cultivated here. Books are printed in Romaic, and a correspondence kept up with several schools in Greece. The military institutions are a school of cadets, and a polytechnic school for engineers, civil and military. The imperial library is very extensive. It is contained in a large hall, 260 feet in length and 150 in breadth; and is said to consist of 12,000 manuscripts, 300,000 printed volumes, and an immense number of engravings. Next to this comes the library of the university, computed at 90,000 volumes. The imperial collection of medals and coins is reckoned the most complete in Europe. Vienna contains also a museum or repository, formed by a society, for casts of statues and other antiquities, of which the originals can with difficulty be procured. The principal amusements of the citizens are the public walks and the theatres. Of the latter there are the Hof, or palace theatre, the Kärntherthor, and the comic theatre: these are the principal. The public walks are much better calculated to afford gratification. The Prater is an immense park, or natural forest, on an island of the Danube, on the east side of the town, belonging to the court, but thrown open to the public. The Augarten is another place of public resort, to the north of the Prater, on the same island, and separated from it only by an iron railing. There is also the Volksgarten, a beautiful garden; but both are much less frequented than the Prater. The environs of Vienna are very fertile and picturesque. To the north are the islands of the Danube; to the west the lofty summit of the Kahlenberg; to the south, mountains covered with vineyards and extensive forests; and to the east, vast plains, bounded at the farthest horizon by hills. The islands are adorned by many villas, and few cities are surrounded by so many fine gardens, which contain some of the rarest plants. Manf. Various; comprising silks, ribbons, gloves, lace, shawls, woollens, cottons, porcelain, gold and silver lace, paper, earthenware, instruments, philosophical and musical; maps, engravings, coaches, and carriages in general. It has an imperial cannon-foundry, and manufactures of small-arms. Its commerce is extensive, and is greatly increased by the navigation of the Danube by steamboats, and the opening of railways E., S., and W. Pop. about 435,000, exclusive of the military. Lat. 48° 12′ 36″ N. Lon. 16° 23′ E.—Vienna was, under the name of Vindobona, long the head-quarters of a Roman legion, and afterwards fell successively into the hands of the Goths and Huns. In 791 Charlemagne attached it to his dominions. It was often threatened in the wars with the Hungarians and the Turks, who, in 1529, destroyed the suburbs. In 1683 an attack by the Turkish army was repulsed. In 1741, though pressed by the Bavarians on the west and the French and Prussians on the north, Vienna was preserved. In 1797 it was threatened by Napoleon I., and occupied by him in 1805 and 1809. On both occasions proper discipline was observed by the invaders, and little injury was done. In 1814 and 1815 the congress of Vienna was here held. During the revolution of 1848, it was held for a short time in October, but surrendered to the imperial troops on the 30th of the same month, having been greatly reduced by bombardment. In 1855 a conference took place, to consider the proposals of a peace with Russia. From that period it has continued to excite the interest of Europe by the various political events with which Austria has been so much involved.

VIENNA, the name of several townships of the United States, none of them with a population above 4,000.

VIENNE, ve-en', a river of France, rising in the N. of the department Corrèze, and, after a course of 190 miles, joining the Loire in the department of the Indre-and-Loire.

VIENNE, a department in the west of France, formed of the ancient province of Upper Poitou, and bounded N. by the department of the Indre-and-Loire, and S. by that of the Charente. Area, 2,670 square miles. Desc. Generally flat, with a somewhat chalky and sandy soil, partly fertile, and partly covered with heath. Rivers. The Vienne, with its affluent the Clain; the Charente, the Gartempe, the Creuse, and the Dive. Pro. Corn, pulse, potatoes, hemp, flax, and wine. Horses, mules, and sheep of superior quality are reared. Minerals. Iron and lithographic stones. Manf. Arms and cutlery. Pop. 320,000.

VIENNE, UPPER, a department in the west of France, formed of parts of the old province of Limousin, and encompassed by the departments Creuse, Corrèze, Dordogne, Charente, Vienne, and Indre. Area, 2,186 square miles. Desc. Mountainous, with a climate cold, on account of the elevation of the country, and producing little grain. Rivers. The Vienne is the principal. Pro. Horses, cattle, and sheep are extensively reared. Minerals. Tin, lead, copper, iron, coal, and porcelain clay. Manf. Porcelain, cutlery, and paper. Pop. 320,000.

VIENNE, a parish and town of France, on the Rhone, in the department Isère, 45 miles from Grenoble. Its streets are in general narrow and steep, and it is traversed by the river Gere. It has a fine Gothic cathedral, erected on an eminence, and other churches, a theatre, a high school, and a museum of curiosities. But the pride of Vienne is in its antiquities; among which are the remains of a theatre and amphitheatre; several traces of aqueducts, arcades supposed to have belonged to a triumphal arch, and, on the opposite bank of the Rhone, the piles of an ancient Roman bridge. Inscriptions, reliefs, and mosaics, exist in various parts of the town; while bronzes, medals, remains of columns and statues, have been repeatedly dug up in the surrounding district. Manf. Woollens, silk, and paper. In its vicinity are lead and silver mines, and near it the celebrated wine called Côte-Rotie is made. Pop. 21,000.—This is the ancient capital of the Allobroges. A council was here held in 1311, which abolished the order of the Templars. It has a station on the railway from Lyons to Avignon.

VIERSEN, feer'-sen, a town of Prussian Westphalia, on the Niers, 18 miles from Dusseldorf. It has a Catholic and a Protestant church. Pop. 4,000.

VIERZON, veer'-zawng, a town of France, in the department of the Cher, at the influx of the Eure into the Cher, 20 miles from Bourges. Manf. Woollens and silk stuffs; and there is a cannon-foundry. Pop. 6,800.

VIESTI, ve-es'-te, a seaport of Naples, in the province of the Capitanata, at the extremity of the promontory of Monte Gargano, 22 miles from Manfredonia. It has a cathedral, convent, and a bishop's palace. Pop. 5,000.

VIETA, VIET, or DE VIETTE, Francis, ve-ai'-ta, a celebrated French mathematician. He made corrections in the calendar, and improvements in geometry, and discovered the cipher used by the Spaniards in their secret communications. This was considered so extraordinary, that the Spaniards denounced Vieta to the pope as a magician. B. near La Rochelle, 1540; D. 1603.

VIGAN, LE, ve'-ga, a town of France, in the department of the Gard, 28 miles from Montpellier. Manf. Silk, cotton, hosiery, leather, paper, and glass. Pop. 5,000.

VIGAND, or WIGAND, John, vig'-and, a German divine, who assisted in composing the "Centuries of Magdeburg," and was appointed superintendent of the churches in Pomerania. B. at Mansfeld, 1523; D. 1587.

VIGENÈRE, Blaise de, veezh'-nair, a learned French writer, who became secretary to the duke de Nevers, and subsequently held a post in the French embassy at Rome. He translated into French, Cæsar, Livy, and other Greek and Latin authors. He was likewise the first to give a French version of Tasso. B. at Saint-Pourçain, France, 1523; D. at Paris, 1592.

VIGEVANO, ve'-jai-va'-no, a town of Sardinia, on the Mora, near the Ticino, 15 miles from Novara. It was formerly defended by a castle, and is still a walled town, but incapable of making a defence. It has a square, forming the points of junction of several streets. Its public buildings consist of the cathedral, a handsome edifice, other churches, and several convents. It contains also a classical school. Manf. The principal are silk stuffs, hats, soap, and macaroni. Pop. 15,500.

VIGGIANO, vid-ja'-no, a town of Naples, in the province of Basilicata, 10 miles from Marisco-Nuovo. Manf. Woollens, soap, and wax candles. Pop. 6,000. This place, in 1857, suffered severely by an earthquake.

VIGILIUS, vi-jil'-i-us, an African prelate and polemical writer, who flourished about 484.

VIGILIUS, Pope, a Roman, who, in 537, obtained that dignity from Theodora, wife of Justinian, on a promise to revoke the acts of the council of Contantinople against the Eutychian bishops. He afterwards published a condemnation of that sect, for which he was persecuted and banished. His successor was Pelagius I. D. at Syracuse, 555.

VIGNOLA, James Barozzi, veen-yo'-la, a celebrated Italian architect, who studied at Rome, and afterwards visited France, whence, after a two years' residence, he returned to Rome. He was subsequently employed by Pope Julius III. upon some great works, and, after the pontiff's death, he obtained a patron in his nephew, Cardinal Farnese, for whom he designed the superb palace at Caprarola. He was invited to Spain by Philip II., who sought his advice as to the construction of the Escurial, but declined the offer. He wrote a celebrated treatise on the Five Orders of Architecture. B. at Vignola, Modena, 1507; D. at Rome, 1573.

VIGNOLA, a town of Naples, in the province of Basilicata, 5 miles from Potenza. Pop. 4,200. This place suffered severely by an earthquake in 1857.

VIGNOLES, Stephen de, veen-yolz, better known by the name of De la Hire, a French military commander, who signalized himself in the wars of Charles VII. He forced the duke of Bedford to raise the siege of Montargis, and accompanied Joan of Arc to the relief of that city, whereby he contributed to the re-establishing of Charles on his throne. D. 1447.

VIGNOLES, Alphonse des, a French Protestant divine and historical writer, who came of an ancient family of Languedoc. After completing his education at Geneva, he repaired to England, where he resided for some time, but returned to his native country in 1675. Upon the revocation of the edict of Nantes, ten years subsequently, he went first to Geneva, and afterwards to Berlin, where he became pastor to a congregation. He was one of the original members of the Royal Society of Berlin, to whose memoirs he contributed some learned papers. His most important work was, "A Chronology of Sacred History, from the departure from Egypt to the captivity at Babylon," a work of great research, to which he devoted his life. B. in France, 1649; D. 1744.

VIGNY, Alfred Count de, veen'-ye, a modern French poet and novelist, who, at the Restoration, entered upon a military career, and, in 1823, was quartered in the Pyrenees, but did not take any active part in the Spanish campaign of that date. Shortly after his marriage with an English lady in 1825, he retired from the army, and henceforth devoted himself to literature, producing a number of graceful poetical works, and a novel, "Cinq Mars," of great merit. He also made translations of "Othello" and the "Merchant of Venice," of Shakspere. B. at Loches, 1799.

VIGO, ve'-go, a seaport-town of Spain, in Galicia, on the Atlantic, 76 miles from Corunna. It has an active pilchard fishery. Pop. 4,000. This place was attacked by the English, under Drake, in 1585 and 1589. In 1719 it was also attacked by Lord Cobham.

VIGO, LAKE, vi'-go, a lake of Russia, 45 miles from Lake Onega. Ext. 45 miles long, with a breadth of 30 at its widest points. Its surplus waters are carried off by the Vig into the North Sea.

VIGO, a county of the United States, in Indiana. Area, 408 square miles. Pop. 18,000.

VIGONA, ve-go'-na, a market-town of Sardinia, Piedmont, 8 miles from Pinerolo. Pop. 6,300.

VILLA BOA. (See GOYAZ.)

VILLA DO CONDE, do kon'-dai, a town of Portugal, on the Ave, 18 miles from Oporto. It has a fishing and coasting trade. Pop. 3,200.

VILLA FRANCA, veel'-la fran'-ka, a town on the S. coast of the island of St. Michael, one of the Azores. Pop. 4,000.

VILLA FRANCA, a town of Italy, in Piedmont, 2 miles from Nice, with a harbour on the Mediterranean Sea. It has a trade in oranges, wine, and hemp. Pop. 3,000.

VILLA FRANCA, another town of Italy, in Piedmont, on the Po, 20 miles from Turin. Pop. 8,600.

VILLA FRANCA, a town of Lombardy, 10 miles from Verona. Pop. 6,000. Here, in 1859, were signed the preliminaries of the treaty which closed the war between France and Sardinia, on the one side, and Austria on the other. These resulted in the treaty of Zurich.

VILLA FRANCA DE PANADES, a town of Spain, in Catalonia, 27 miles from Barcelona. Manf. Cotton and leather. Pop. 5,600.

VILLA FRANCA DE XIRA, a town of Portugal, near the Tagus, 20 miles from Lisbon. Pop. 5,000. This town was, in the 12th century, founded by English settlers, and named Cornualla, or Cornwall.

VILLA VIÇOSA, a town of Brazil, 150 miles from Ceara. It is built among groves of palm-trees. Pop. 5,000.

VILLACH, vil'-lak, an old town of Austria, in Upper Carinthia, at the confluence of the Drave and the Geyl, 22 miles from Klagenfurt. It is a depôt for the Carinthian mining districts. Pop. 2,500.

VILLALPANDUS, John Baptist, vil-lal-păn'-dus, a Spanish divine, who distinguished himself by a learned commentary on Ezekiel. In this work there is a very curious and exact description of the city of Jerusalem. He was also the author of an exposition on St. Paul's epistles. D. 1608.

VILLARET, Claude, vil'-la-rai, a French historical writer, who was for some time an actor, but quitted the stage for a literary career in 1756. He wrote a continuation of Velly's "History of France;" a treatise on the Dramatic Art; and a tract on the wit of Voltaire.

VILLARS, Louis-Hector, vil'-lars, a celebrated French general, who became marshal of France, and grandee of Spain. While serving under Louis XIV., he attracted the favourable notice of that monarch, and, in his 19th year, was appointed to command a troop of cavalry. After distinguishing himself on various occasions in the army, he was made maréchal-de-camp in 1690, and was sent to the Cevennes, where, by his humane and lenient measures, he succeeded in restoring tranquillity. He next served against Marlborough, by whom he was defeated at Ramilies, and again at Malplaquet, where he was dangerously wounded. He was appointed plenipotentiary for concluding a peace at Rastadt, in 1714. In 1733 he was sent into Italy, where he took Pizzighitone, but soon afterwards asked and was permitted to return to France. B. 1653; D. 1734.

VILLE-FRANCHE, veel-franzh, a town of France, in the department of the Rhone, at the foot of mountains, adjoining the small river Margon, 18 miles from Lyons. Manf. Cotton and linen fabrics. Pop. 8,100.

VILLE-FRANCHE, a well-built town of France, on the Aveyron, 25 miles from Rodez. It has a church, remarkable for the bold architecture of its vaults. Pop. 10,000.

VILLE-FRANCHE, a town of France, on the Lers, 20 miles from Toulouse. Manf. Sailcloth and coarse earthenware. Pop. 2,800.

VILLEHARDOUIN, Geoffroy de, veel-har'-doo-ă(n), a French historian, who was maréchal of Champagne under Thibaut V., count of Champagne and Brie. He distinguished himself in 1199, in the fourth crusade; was present at the taking of Constantinople in 1204; and was created maréchal of Romania by the emperor Baldwin I. The emperor Henry gave him the city of Messinopolis, and his descendants, during two centuries, ruled over principalities in Greece. He wrote the "History of the Taking of Constantinople by the French and Venetians," a narrative as curious as it is ancient. An edition of this old work was published, with learned notes, by Du Cange. B. near Arcis-sur-Aube, 1167; D. in Thessaly, about 1213.

VILLEMAIN, Abel François, veel-mă(n)', an eminent modern French historical writer and statesman, who so early distinguished himself as a scholar, as to gain the appointment of professor of rhetoric at the Collége Charlemagne in his 19th year. In 1816 he became assistant professor of modern history in the university of Paris. In 1833 he was created a peer of France, and, in the Guizot ministry, acted as minister of public instruction. In 1834 he was nominated perpetual secretary of the Academy. He retired into private life after the revolution of 1848. His principal works were,—a translation of Pindar into French; "Lascaris; or, the Greeks of the Fifteenth Century;" "Course of French Literature;" "History of Cromwell;" an edition of the "Provincial Letters" of Pascal; a translation of "The School for Scandal," by Sheridan, into French; "Historical and Literary Miscellanies;" and a "Discourse on the Advantages and Inconveniences of Criticism." B. at Paris, 1791.

VILLEMUR, veel'-moor, an inland town of France, 20 miles from Toulouse. Pop. 5,500.

VILLENA, veel-yai'-na, a town of Spain, 66 miles from Valencia. It has a citadel, formerly considered very strong, and several churches and monasteries. Manf. Soap and coarse woollens. It has also brandy-distilleries. Pop. 5,400.

VILLENA, Marquis of, a Spanish poet, who was of the royal house of Aragon. His best production was entitled the "Gaya Sciencia," in which he describes the ceremonies of the Troubadours. His translation of Dante into prose was much esteemed. B. 1384; D. 1434.

VILLENAUXE LA GRANDE, veel'-nose, a town of France, in the department of the Aube. Manf. Vinegar and leather. Pop. 2,600.

VILLENEUVE, veel'-nu(r)ve, a town of the Pays de Vaud, on the Lake of Geneva, 18 miles from Lausanne. Pop. 1,600.

VILLENEUVE, a town of France, in the department of the Aveyron, 5 miles from Ville-Franche. Pop. 3,400.

VILLENEUVE, Gabrielle Susanna Barrot de, a French authoress, who wrote the "Young American," the "Conjugal Phœnix," the "Fair Hermits," and some other novels, an abridgment of one of which is the celebrated "Beauty and the Beast." B. about 1695; D. 1755.

VILLENEUVE, Christopher, a brave French nobleman, who in early life fought under Claude of Savoy against the Huguenots. He was commissioned by the Count de Carces to proceed to Paris for the purpose of dissuading the king from ordering a massacre of the Huguenots in Provence on St. Bartholomew. He succeeded in obtaining from the king a countermand of his previous order for the massacre, and, having outridden the previous messenger, saved the city. He afterwards distinguished himself under Henry III., Henry IV., and Louis XIII. B. 1541; D. 1615.

VILLENEUVE, Pierre-Charles-Jean-Baptiste, a brave French admiral, who held a command at the battle of the Nile, where the vessels of his nation were totally defeated by Nelson. In 1805 he was appointed to the command of a French fleet, with which he encountered an English squadron under Sir Robert Calder, off Cape Finisterre; but, after fighting for a whole day, both admirals went off without renewing the action. He shortly afterwards again met the English fleet under Nelson, by whom his squadron, and that of the Spanish under Gravina, were annihilated at Trafalgar. He was taken prisoner, and, after being detained in England until the following year, returned to France, where, expecting to be disgraced by the emperor Napoleon I., he killed himself.

VILLERS, veel'-lair, the name of several towns of France, none of them with a population above 3,700.

VILLETTE, veel-let', a parish and village of France, 2 miles from Paris. It has a large basin, or wet-dock, in which end the canals St. Denis, St. Martin, and De l'Ourcq. Pop. 19,000.

VILLIERS, George. (See BUCKINGHAM, Duke of.)

VILLINGEN, vil'-ling-en, a town of the W. of Germany, in the mountainous district of the Black Forest, 41 miles from Constance. It is defended by a wall and moat, is very difficult of access, and has long been a military station of some importance. Pop. 4,000.

VILLOISON, Jean-Baptiste-Gaspard de, veel'-wai-sawng, an eminent French scholar, who evinced an extraordinary aptitude for the acquisition of knowledge; and, by the time he had reached his 15th year, had read nearly the whole of the Greek writers. Before his 22nd year he produced an edition of Apollonius's Lexicon of the "Iliad" and "Odyssey." His name became known throughout Europe as a marvel of learning. In 1778 he was sent, at the expense of the French government, to make researches in the library of St. Mark at Venice, where, among other valuable manuscripts, he discovered one of the "Iliad" of Homer. During the revolutionary period, he lost all his property; but was afterwards nominated professor of ancient and modern Greek in the Collége de France by Napoleon I. He left in manuscript a work upon Greece, in 15 volumes; also remarks upon Tournefort's "Travels in Greece," and upon Montfaucon. B. 1750; D. at Paris, 1805.

VILNA. (See WILNA.)

VILS, veels, a river of Bavaria, which, after a course of 70 miles, falls into the Danube at Vilshofen.

VILVOORDEN, veel-voor'-den, a town of Belgium, 6 miles from Brussels, where Tindal, the English martyr, translated the Bible into his native tongue. Pop. 5,000.

VIMEIRA, ve-mai-ee'-ra, a village of Portuguese Estremadura, 3 miles from Torres Vedras. It is noted for the battle between the British and the French, in August, 1808, when the latter were defeated by the duke of Wellington.

VIMOUTIERS, ve-moo'-te-ai, a town of France, in the department of the Orne, on the Vire, 16 miles from Argentan. It has manufactures of linen. Pop. 4,000.

VINAROZ, ve-na'-roth, a town of Spain, near the mouths of the Ebro, and close to the Mediterranean Sea. It is partly inclosed by walls, and has an active coasting-trade. Pop. 10,700.

VINCH, Samuel, vinee, an eminent English mathematician, who became professor of astronomy and experimental philosophy in the university of Cambridge. Having taken orders, he was also presented to the archdeaconry of Bedford. He furnished the "Philosophical Transactions" with several papers of great importance; such as "Observations on the Theory of the Motion and Resistance of Fluids," and "Experiments on the Resistance of Bodies moving in Fluids." He was also the author of "The Credibility of Christianity vindicated;" "Observations on the Hypotheses which have been assumed to account for the causes of Gravitation on Mechanical Principles;" "Principles of Hydrostatics," and "Elements of Astronomy." D. 1821.

VINCENNES, van-sen', a town of France, near the confluence of the Seine and Marne, about 3 miles from Paris. It is remarkable for its castle, built in the 14th century, and used as a seat of royalty till the time of Louis XV. During three centuries it continued a palace, but has been since used as a state prison. It is still of considerable strength. Here the duke d'Enghein was shot on 21st March, 1804; and here Condé, Diderot, and other eminent individuals were confined. Adjoining to the castle is a fine park and forest, which is a favourite holiday resort of the Parisians. Pop. 8,500.

VINCENNES, a post-town and capital of Knox county, Indiana, U.S., on the Wabash, 100 miles from its junction with the Ohio, in a direct line, and nearly 200 miles by the course of the river. It contains a courthouse, a gaol, and is the oldest town in the state. It has a trade in furs and peltry. Pop. 2,100.

VINCENT, Thomas, a pious English divine, who, when the plague raged in London, remained in the city, and preached regularly to the inhabitants in that awful season. He wrote "God's Terrible Voice in the City by Plague and Fire," and other religious works. D. 1671.

VINCENT, John Jervis, Earl Saint, a distinguished English admiral, who commenced his career afloat in his 10th year. He participated in the battle gained by Keppel, in 1778; in the relief of Gibraltar, under Lord Howe; and in 1782 held the command of the expedition which captured Guadaloupe, St. Lucia, and Martinique. In 1795 he was created admiral of the blue, and placed in command of the Mediterranean fleet, with which he defeated the combined French and Spanish fleets off Cape St. Vincent,—a victory which was chiefly owing to the skill and daring of Nelson, then captain of a 74-gun ship. For this service he was raised to the peerage, with the title of Earl Saint Vincent. He subsequently took the command of the Channel fleet, and was, during the Pitt administration, first lord of the Admiralty, in which office he distinguished himself as a reformer of old abuses in the naval administration. At the coronation of George IV. in 1821, he was created admiral of the fleet. There is a monument to his memory in St. Paul's Cathedral. B. in Staffordshire, 1734; D. 1823.

VINCENT DE PAUL, Saint, vin'-sent, an eminent divine of the Roman Catholic church, who devoted his life to philanthropic duties. He collected large sums from the rich and noble, which he distributed amongst the poor and sick; established the order of Sisters of Charity, several hospitals in Paris, and caused missionaries to be sent abroad. B. near the Pyrenees, 1576; D. 1660.

VINCENT, St., an island in the West Indies, about 90 miles W. of Barbadoes. Area, 130 square miles. Desc. This island was only inhabited by native Caribbs, till, in the latter part of the 17th century, a ship from Guinea, with a cargo of slaves, was either wrecked or run ashore upon its coast, when great numbers of the negroes escaped into the woods and mountains, where they were suffered to remain by the Indians. Partly by the accession of runaway slaves from Barbadoes, and partly by the children they had by the Indian women, these Africans became very numerous; so that, about the beginning of the 18th century, they constrained the Indians to retire into the north-west part of the island. The Indians applied to the French for assistance, and the consequence was a long war between them and the negroes. In 1763 the island was ceded to England; when the first measure of the government was to dispose of the lands, without any regard to the claims of the Charaibes of either race. A war took place, which ended in a compromise, by which the Charaibes, after surrendering part of their lands, were permitted to enjoy the remainder unmolested. It has numerous fertile valleys, producing sugar, dyewoods, arrowroot, and cocoa. Large quantities of rum are also produced. Pop. about 30,000. Lat. 15° 22′ N. Lon. 61° 13′ W.—In 1779, St. Vincent was captured by a French force from Martinique; but was restored to Britain at the peace of 1783. In 1812 the island was almost desolated by a most dreadful eruption of the Souffrier mountain, which had continued quiet for nearly a century before; but from which there now issued such a dreadful torrent of lava, and such clouds of ashes, as nearly covered the island, and injured the soil to such an extent that it has never recovered it.

VINCENT, St., one of the Cape Verde Islands, in the Atlantic Ocean. Ext. 15 miles long and 9 broad. Desc. Mountainous. Pro. Cotton and live stock. Pop. Unascertained, but small.

VINCENT, St., a gulf of S. Australia. It receives several rivers, and, by Investigator Strait, communicates with Spencer Gulf. Lat. between 34° and 35° 40′ S. Lon. about 137° E.

VINCENT, CAPE St., the S.W. point of Portugal, noted for the naval victory gained off it in 1797, by Sir John Jervis. Lat. 37° 2′ 54″ N. Lon. 8° 58′ 39″ W.

VINCI, Leonardo da, veen'-che, a celebrated Italian painter, sculptor, architect, and engineer. Verrochio was his master, whom he soon excelled, as he did all the painters of his time. One of his greatest works was a picture of "The Lord's Supper," at Milan, in which city he founded his celebrated school of painting. He was also an excellent architect, and constructed the famous aqueduct which supplies Milan with water. From Milan he went to Florence, where he laboured with Michael Angelo in ornamenting the grand council-chamber. At the invitation of Francis I., he visited the French court, and is said to have died in the arms of that monarch. He wrote a "Treatise on Painting," in Italian, folio, and some other works, of which Hallam thus speaks:—"The discoveries which made Galileo, and Kepler, and other names illustrious, the system of Copernicus, the very theories of recent geologers, are anticipated by Da Vinci within the compass of a very few pages. . . . He first laid down the grand principle of Bacon,—that experiment and observation must be the guide to just theory." B. near Florence, 1452; D. at Fontainebleau, 1519.

VINER, Charles, vi'-ner, celebrated as the compiler of the great work entitled "A General and Complete Abridgment of Law and Equity," in 24 folio volumes. This work occupied him during half a century, and was printed at his own house. He bequeathed about £12,000 to the university of Oxford, to found professorships and fellowships of common law there. The first who held the Vinerian professorship was Blackstone. D. at Aldershot, Hampshire, 1756.

VINET, Alexander Rodolph, ve'-nai, a learned Swiss theologian, who became professor of French literature at Basil, and afterwards at Lausanne. An influential pastor of the Protestant church of Switzerland, he produced a number of works of great authority. These principally were,—"Memoir in Favour of Liberty of Religion," "Vital Christianity," "Pastoral Theology," and "History of the French Literature of the Eighteenth Century." B. at Lausanne, 1797; D. 1847.

VINETZA, vi-net'-za, a town of Russian Poland, on the Bug, 80 miles from Kamenetz. It has a citadel, and several Roman Catholic churches. Pop. 7,500.

VINGORLA, vin-gor'-la, a town of Hindostan, in the Bombay presidency, 30 miles from Goa. Pop. 5,000. Lat. 15° 48′ N. Lon. 73° 47′ E.

VINNIUS, Arnold Vinnen, vin'-ni-us, styled in Latin, a learned Dutch professor, who was appointed to the chair of jurisprudence at Leyden. He wrote a commentary on the Institutes of Justinian, and another on the ancient law-writers. B. in Holland, 1588; D. 1657.

VINTIMIGLIA, veen-te-meel'-ya, a town of Sardinia, 80 miles from Genoa. It stands in a district producing fruits, wine, and oil. Pop. 5,000.

VIOTTI, Giovanni-Battista, ve-ot'-te, a celebrated Italian violinist, who enjoyed a brilliant reputation in Italy, at Berlin, and at Paris, which latter city he quitted when the reign of terror began. He repaired to England, and there, during many years, enjoyed great celebrity. B. at Fontavento, Piedmont, 1755; D. at Brighton, 1824.

VIRE, veer, a town of France, near the river Vire, in the department of Calvados, 36 miles from Caen. Manf. Woollen goods, paper, and needles. In its vicinity are both mines and iron-forges. Pop. 7,300.—Also a RIVER falling into the English Channel after a course of 50 miles.

VIREY, Julien-Joseph, ve'-re, an eminent French writer upon natural history and medicine. In early life he was an assistant in an apothecary's shop, but afterwards joined the republican armies; and acquiring, during war, and at the hospitals of Strasburg and Paris, considerable skill, both theoretically and practically, as a surgeon, he resolved to devote himself to the composition of works upon medicine. About 1801 he was appointed editor of the "Journal de Pharmacie," and subsequently obtained his diploma as physician. He was the principal contributor to the "Dictionnaire des Sciences Naturelles," and the "Dictionnaire des Sciences Médicales." From a long list of valuable works which emanated from him, may be quoted "Treatise on the Theory and Practice of Pharmacy;" "Natural History of the Human Species;" "Hygienic Philosophy;" "Of Vital Force;" "Natural History of Animals, their Habits and Instincts;" and "An Impartial Examination of Magnetic Medicine." B. at Hortes, France, 1775; D. at Paris, 1840.

VIRGIL, Publius Maro, vir'-jil, an illustrious Roman poet. His earliest years were spent at Cremona; whence he removed to Rome, when his estates were partitioned out among the soldiers after the battle of Philippi. There, by means of his friend Mæcenas, he was introduced to Augustus, who restored to him his property. On this occasion he wrote his first Eclogue; and, on completing the Bucolics, he undertook the Georgics. After these, he commenced the Æneid, at the request of the emperor Augustus. This great poem is composed upon the model of the Iliad, and relates the adventures of Æneas after the destruction of Troy. The poet was engaged during eleven years upon this immortal work, but died without revising it. He left the greatest part of his property to Mæcenas, Tucca, and Augustus. His remains were interred on the road leading from Naples to Puteoli, and this epitaph, said to have been composed by himself, was inscribed on his tomb:—Mantua me genuit; Calabri rapuere; tenet nunc Parthenope: cecini pascua, rura, duces. ("My birthplace Mantua; in Calabria death overtook me; in Naples now I lie. I've sung of shepherds, fields, and heroes' deeds.") A competent authority declares that, "though the Æneid contains many fine passages, its poetical merits are greatly below the Iliad and Odyssey . . . . and it is deficient in the truth and simplicity which so eminently characterize those poems." The best editions of Virgil are those of Heyne and Wagner, Leipzig, 1842, Forbiger, and Robert Stephens. His works have been translated into English by Dryden, Pitt, Warton, and John Ogilby. There is also a translation into Scottish verse, by Gawin Douglas. B. near Mantua, 70 B.C.; D. at Brundisium, 19 B.C.

VIRGIL, a township of the United States, New York, on Onego Creek. Pop. 2,500.

VIRGIN ISLANDS, vir'-jin, a group in the West Indies, situate to the east of Porto Rico. They are upwards of twenty in number, but for the most part desert and barren, and extend 60 miles in length, and upwards of 36 in breadth. They are every way dangerous to navigators. The English and Danes divide most of them; but the Spaniards claim those near Porto Rico. Lat. between 18° and 19° N. Lon. between 64° and 65° 30′ E.

VIRGINIA, vir-jin'-i-a, one of the United States, bounded on the N. by Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Ohio; S. by North Carolina and Tennessee; E. by Maryland and the Atlantic Ocean; and W. by Kentucky and Ohio. Area, 61,350 square miles. Desc. This state may be classed under four separate divisions, essentially differing from one another. The first, extending 100 miles inland, from the seacoast to the termination of tide, at Fredericksburg, Richmond, &c., is low and flat, sometimes fenny, sometimes sandy, and on the margin of rivers composed of a rich loam, covered with a luxuriant and even rank vegetation. This part is unhealthy in the months of August, September, and October. The next division extends from the head of tide-water to the Blue Ridge, 150 miles. The surface near the tide-water is level; higher up the rivers it becomes swelling; and near the mountains it is often abrupt and broken. The soil is divided into sections of very unequal quality, parallel to each other, and extending throughout the state. The scenery of the upper part is highly picturesque and romantic. The third division is the valley between the Blue Ridge and North and Alleghany mountains; a valley which extends, with little interruption, from the Potomac, across the state, to North Carolina and Tennessee, narrower, but of greater length than either of the preceding divisions. The soil is a mould formed on a bed of limestone. The fourth division extends from the Alleghany Mountains to the river Ohio; a country wild and broken, in some parts fertile, but generally lean or barren. The country is well watered, is excellent for grazing, and has a very healthy climate. Rivers. The principal are the Potomac, Shenandoah, Rappahannock, Mattapony, Pamunky, Rivanna, Appomatox, Elizabeth, Meherrin, Kenhawa, Ohio, Monongahela, and Cheat. The Bay of Chesapeake extends inland 200 miles to its termination in Maryland. Climate. Occasionally extreme. The pleasantest months are May and June; July and August are intensely hot, and September and October are generally rainy. Zoology. The wild animals are, in the western parts, the wolf, the bear, the deer, the raccoon, the squirrel, and the opossum. The feathered tribes are in great abundance and variety. The rivers contain ample supplies of fish. Some of the largest sturgeon weigh from 100 to 200 pounds. Among the fish peculiar to the United States, are the sheep's-head, benita, hog-fish, rock-fish, pond-fish, chub, and four different kinds of perch; trout and eels, the largest of which are from five to six feet long. The shell-fish are oysters, lobsters, crabs, land-turtle, sea-turtle, loggerhead, and terrebin. The oysters, of which there are several varieties, are very fine. Pro. Indian corn is everywhere cultivated on the eastern side of the mountains. Wheat is also much cultivated, with oats, rye, rice, hemp, cotton, and tobacco. Of this article about a third of all produced in the Union, is grown in this state. Of esculent plants there are, in the eastern parts, the sweet potato, red and white; the common, or Irish potato, which is in general use; melons, turnips, pumpkins, parsnips, carrots, artichokes, asparagus, cucumbers, lettuces, and onions. The fruit-trees are apple, pear, cherry, quince, nectarine, apricot, almond, plum, pomegranate, fig, and peach. The vine also flourishes luxuriantly. The principal forest-trees are apple, wild or sweet-scented crab, ash, aspen, beech, black and white birch, catalpa, cherry, chestnut, horse-chestnut, cucumber-tree, cypress, dog-wood, elder, elm, fir, hemlock, spruce, fringe or snowdrop-tree, sweet gum, hawthorn, hickery, juniper or red or Virginia cedar, laurel-swamp, linden or American lime, locust, sugar and red-flowering maple, red mulberry, red and white oak. The forests of Virginia have little underwood, and it is easy to travel through them on foot or on horseback, except on the lowlands in the eastern parts, which are covered with cedars, pines, and cypresses. Of shrubs there is a great variety. Minerals. Iron, copper, gold, lead, manganese, marble of a variegated appearance, limestone, slate, talc or soapstone, used for chimneys, tobacco-pipes, &c. Coal is found in the western parts, and saltpetre in subterraneous places in considerable quantity. Mineral springs are numerous. Manf. Gunpowder, salt, saltpetre, and fire-arms. Maple-sugar is generally made, and distilleries and breweries are numerous. Shipbuilding is carried on to a considerable extent. There are various rope-walks. Sugars are boiled, baked, and refined, and linen and cotton goods are manufactured. Virginia, however, is behind the N. states in its manufacturing industry. Exp. The chief are tobacco, wheat, Indian corn, lumber, tar, pitch, turpentine, beef, and pork. From the southern parts are sent to Europe tobacco, wheat, flour, Indian corn, cotton, pease, white oak, staves, tar, pitch, turpentine, pork, bacon, ginseng, rattle and black snake-root, indigo, oak bark, and charcoal; from the northern, hemp, saltpetre, gunpowder, lead, coals, cypress, and pine shingles, to the north of Europe and West-India Islands. Pop. about 1,430,000, of whom about 500,000 are slaves. Lat. between 36° 30′ and 40° N. Lon. between 75° 40′ and 83° 30′ W.—This state was named in honour of Queen Elizabeth, and the first settlements were made in it by Sir Walter Raleigh in 1587. In 1606 a company of adventurers, having obtained a patent from James I., sent two vessels under the command of Captain Newport, with a number of men, who laid the foundation of James-town, on the peninsula which advances into the river of the same name. By famine and other privations they were so reduced, that they were on the point of quitting the country for Newfoundland, when the arrival of Lord Delaware, with three vessels, containing provisions and stores, induced them to remain. Virginia showed great opposition to the arbitrary measures of the British government in 1765 and 1769. In 1781 it became the theatre of war, and in 1861 seceded from the Union. It is the native state of Washington and Jefferson.

VIRGINIA, a village of Ireland, in Ulster, 15 miles from Cavan. Pop. 50.

VIRGINIA, daughter of the centurion L. Virginius, was a Roman virgin of great beauty. The decemvir Appius Claudius becoming enamoured of her charms, he, to obtain possession of her person, induced M. Claudius, one of his clients, to claim her as the daughter of his slave, when Appius, as judge, ordered her to be delivered into his hands. Virginius, who was with the army at Mount Algidus, being informed of his daughter's danger, hastened to Rome, and, on finding that he could not save her from Claudius, he, in the presence of Appius and the Roman people, plunged a knife into his daughter's bosom. He then returned to the camp, where he harangued the soldiers, who instantly marched to Rome. Appius destroyed himself in prison, and the office of decemvir was abolished B.C. 449. This affecting story has furnished the theme of a beautiful lay by Macaulay, and has been employed as the foundation of one of the best plays of Sheridan Knowles. Alfieri, Lessing, and others, have also made use of the romantic episode.

VIRGINSTOW, vir-jin-sto, a parish of Devonshire, 6 miles from Launceston. Pop. 200.

VISCHER, Cornelius, vis'-ker, an eminent Dutch engraver, whose mode of working, Strutt says, "was as singular as the effect he produced was picturesque and beautiful." His brothers, and other members of his family, were also celebrated as engravers. B. at Haarlem, 1610; D. about 1660.

VISCHER, Peter, an eminent German sculptor, who studied in Italy. His principal production was the tomb of St. Sebald, in the church at Nuremberg, a very fine work. Lived in the 15th century.

VISCONTI, vis-kon'-te, an illustrious family of Lombardy. The most celebrated of the name were:—

VISCONTI, Otho, who was nominated archbishop of Milan in 1261; but the leader of the city, Martino della Torre, forbade the new prelate to enter upon his duties; upon which Pope Urban IV. excommunicated the city. The archbishop subsequently gathered together a large number of adherents, with whom he marched upon Milan, and having defeated the party Della Torre, entered the city in triumph. In 1288 he resigned the temporal government of the city to his nephew Matteo Visconti. Flourished in the 13th century.

VISCONTI, Matteo, nephew of the preceding, was, in 1288, elected "captain of the people." He afterwards acquired Bergamo, Lodi, Cremona, and other places, and, upon the death of Archbishop Otho, was acknowledged perpetual lord of Milan. He was for a period dispossessed of his territories, but ultimately regained them. In 1322 he abdicated in favour of his son Galeazzo, and retired to a monastery, where he died in the following year.

VISCONTI, Galeazzo, was eldest son of the preceding, and became ruler of Milan upon the abdication of his father in 1322; but was, in the same year, driven from the city by the Guelph faction. He was, however, acknowledged as imperial vicar of Milan, Pavia, and Vercelli, by Louis of Bavaria, who had obtained the iron crown of Lombardy; but almost immediately afterwards, Louis caused him, with his son Azzo, and two brothers, to be cast into the prison of Monza, where the Visconti endured a confinement of eight months. Their liberation was due to Castruccio Castracani, lord of Lucca, who enjoyed the especial favour of Louis. This last-named prince having been crowned emperor at Rome, sold to Azzo Visconti the imperial vicariate of Milan, for 60,000 crowns. Galeazzo died in exile, in 1328.

VISCONTI, Azzo, son of the preceding, was the ruler of Milan during eleven years. He restored and embellished the city, employing, among other celebrated artists, Giotto of Florence. He was the first ruler of Milan who issued a coinage. At his decease, almost the whole of the citizens put on mourning. D. 1339.

VISCONTI, Luchino, was the uncle and successor of the preceding. He added to his lordship the greater portion of Lombardy and Monferrato, encouraged the manufacture of silks and the cultivation of the vine; but his good qualities were marred by his immoral course of life. D. it is supposed of poison, 1349.

VISCONTI, Giovanni, brother of the preceding, at whose death he became sole lord of Milan. He was in holy orders, and had previously been nominated archbishop. In 1350 he bought Bologna for 200,000 golden florins; but Pope Clement VI. laid claim to that territory, and, on Giovanni refusing to yield it, he was excommunicated. A compromise was, however, subsequently effected. In 1353 he sent assistance to the people of Genoa, who were besieged by the Venetians. He was the patron of the poet Petrarch. D. 1354.—His successors were his three nephews, Matteo, Galeazzo, and Barnabo, who ruled conjointly. Matteo died in the following year, poisoned by his brothers, it is supposed. Bologna was soon afterwards treacherously sold by its governor to the pope; upon which Barnabo sent his troops to regain it, but was defeated, and excommunicated by Innocent VI. In 1385 he was taken prisoner by stratagem, and confined in the castle of Trezzo by his nephew, Gian Galeazzo, who, upon the death of Barnabo in the same year, became lord of Milan. Ambitious of acquiring the sovereignty of Northern Italy, he captured Verona, Vicenza, Padua, Sienna, and other places, and made repeated attacks upon Florence, employing the most famous condottieri and the best-disciplined troops in Italy. In 1395 he purchased the dukedom of Milan from the emperor Wenceslas for 100,000 golden florins. He was crowned in the same year, and about the same time commenced the building of the cathedral. When Wenceslas was deposed by his vassal princes in 1400, and Robert became emperor, Gian Visconti was summoned to surrender his possessions, and a German army was sent against him. It was, however, defeated by the duke of Milan, who, after his success, was on the eve of declaring himself king of Italy, when he died of the plague while besieging Florence. His eldest son, Giovanni Maria Visconti, succeeded him. He was cruel even to insanity, and delighted in the horrible spectacle of men and children being torn to pieces by dogs trained to the purpose. He was assassinated in 1412. Filippo Maria Visconti, another son of Gian, succeeded to the dukedom of Milan. His general, Francesco Bressone, recovered Genoa, which had refused to acknowledge the lordship of the Visconti since 1356, and also captured Parma, Brescia, Lodi, and Bergamo. This distinguished commander was treated with ingratitude by the duke, and thereupon took service with the Venetians. In 1418 he caused his wife to be beheaded upon a false charge of infidelity, and henceforth lived with a Milanese woman, by whom he had a daughter, Bianca, who became the wife of Francesco Sforza, a military adventurer who had been sent against him, but whose alliance he thus purchased. (See SFORZA, Francesco.) With Filippo Maria the great Visconti family ended. It ruled at Milan during the interval 1288—1447.

VISEU, vi'-sai-oo, a town of Portugal, in the province of Beira, 42 miles from Oporto. Its cathedral contains some excellent works of art, and it has a college preparatory to the university of Coimbra. Pop. 9,000.

VISHNII-VOLOTCHOK, vish'-ne vo-lot-chok', a town of Russia, in the government of Tver, on the Zna, at the beginning of the canal which connects it with the Tvertza. Pop. 9,200. The canal connects the navigation of the Caspian and Baltic seas, and has an extensive shipping trade.

VISO, EL, ve'-so, a neatly-built town of Spain, 126 miles from Madrid. Pop. 3,800.—The name of several other small towns in Spain.

VISTULA, vis'-tu-la (Germ. WEICHSEL, vike'-sel), a river of Poland, rising at the foot of the Carpathians, and, flowing eastward, enters Poland at the southern frontier, passing the ancient capital of Cracow. It afterwards passes Warsaw, and, receiving the Bug, becomes one of the greatest rivers of Europe. It passes the towns of Plock and Culm; and, after flowing several hundred miles, with a wide channel and undiminished volume, divides into two branches, of which one called the Nogat, and another the Old Vistula, flow eastward to the Frische Haff, while the largest stream preserves the name of Vistula, and, turning to the westward, falls into the Baltic at Dantzic. Its total course is estimated at about 530 miles.

VITCHEGDA, ve-cheg'-da, a river of Russia, which traverses the government Vologda, and, after a course of 380 miles, falls into the Dwina, 12 miles from Solvitchegodsk.

VITELLIUS, Aulus, vi-tel'-li-us, a Roman emperor, who was born of an illustrious family, and insinuated himself into the favour of Tiberius by administering to his pleasures. He also gained the patronage of Caligula, Claudius, and Nero, through flattering their passions. The army he won over by rich gifts and unbounded promises. Thus he possessed himself of the highest offices of the state. He was proclaimed in 69 by the army in Germany, at the same time that Otho was invested with the purple. Three battles were fought between the rival emperors, which Vitellius lost; but in a fourth he was victorious. His conduct was so licentious and extravagant, that the people revolted, and placed Vespasian on the throne. Vitellius, after suffering all manner of indignities from the populace, was put to death, and his body thrown into the Tiber in 69.

VITEPSK, ve-tepsk', a government of the N.W. of European Russia, lying to the E. of Courland and S. of Livonia. Area, 17,000 square miles. Desc. Generally level, interspersed with large marshes and sandy tracts. Rivers. The Dwina, the Ula, and the Viteba. Pro. Corn, flax, hemp, pease, beans, and fruits. The forest and pasture-lands are extensive, and large numbers of sheep are raised. Manf. Woollen goods, leather, glass, and earthenwares. Pop. about 800,000. Lat. between 54° 58′ and 57° 20′ N. Lon. 25° 30′ E.

VITEPSK, a city of European Russia, and capital of the above government, on the Dwina, at the influx of the Viteba, which divides it into two parts. Its houses are mostly of wood, and it has numerous churches, convents, and Jews' synagogues. Pop. 17,200.

VITERBO, ve-teir'-bo, a town of Italy, in the States of the Church, and the capital of a delegation, 41 miles from Rome. Its streets are broad and well-paved, its market-place neat, and several of the principal buildings constructed with taste. Several of its churches are rich in works of art. Manf. Unimportant. In its neighbourhood are mineral springs. Pop. 14,000.—This city was one of the principal in the Etruscan league, and, in the Middle Ages, the capital of the patrimony of St. Peter. In one of its public squares the emperor Frederick Barbarossa humiliated himself before the English pope, Adrian IV.

VITIM, vit-im', a river of Siberia, which, after a course of 900 miles, joins the Lena opposite Vitimsk.

VITO, SAN, ve'-to, the name of several market-towns of Italy, none with a population above 5,000.

VITOLANO, ve-to-la'-no, a town of Naples, in the Principato Ultra, 20 miles from Avellino. Manf. Woollen and silk fabrics. Pop. 2,500.

VITRE, vectr, a town of France, in the department of the Ille-and-Vilaine, on the Vilaine, 20 miles from Rennes. Manf. Woollens, canvas, and linen. Pop. 9,000.—This is the birthplace of Savary.

VITRINGA, Campegius, ve-tring'-a, a Dutch theologian, who became, in succession, professor of divinity, oriental literature, and sacred history, at Franeker. He wrote a commentary on Isaiah and other parts of scripture, in Latin. B. at Leeuwarden, 1659; D. 1722.—Campegius Vitringa, his son, wrote an abridgement of Natural Theology. B. 1693; D. 1723.

VITRUVIUS, Marcus Vitruvius Pollio, vi-troo'-vi-us, a celebrated Roman architect. He was greatly esteemed by Julius Cæsar, and employed by Augustus in constructing public buildings, and appointed superintendent of warlike machines. He wrote a valuable treatise on architecture, the best edition of which is that of Schneider, Leipsic, 1807. The best English translations are, Castell's, with notes by Inigo Jones, and Gwilt's. B. about 80 B.C.; D. about 18 B.C.

VITRY, ve'-tre, a town of France, in the department of the Pas-de-Calais, on the Scarpe, 10 miles from Arras. Pop. 2,500.—Also the name of several other towns, with populations ranging between 2,500 and 8,200.

VITTORIA, vit-tor'-i-a, a town of Spain, the chief place of the province of Alava, situate at the entrance of a beautiful valley, watered by the Zadora, 27 miles from Bilbao. It is, with some exceptions, a scattered and ill-built place. The principal churches are those of the Carmelites and the Dominicans. Manf. Brass and iron goods, ebony articles, leather, candles, and linen. Pop. 13,000. Vittoria is noted as the scene of a battle, in which the French were defeated by Lord Wellington in 1813.

VITTORIA, a town of Sicily, in the Val di Noto, 40 miles from Syracuse. It has a trade in honey and silk. Pop. 11,000.

VIVARES, Francis, ve'-var, a French engraver, who, at the age of 18, went to London, where he acquired a high reputation as an engraver, particularly of landscape pieces. Woollet had always one of his engravings before him when he was at work. B. in France, 1709; D. in England, 1780.

VIVAREZ, ve'-va-rai, an old territory of France, in Languedoc, on the banks of the Rhone, which parts it from Dauphiny. It now forms the departments of Ardèche and Upper Loire.

VIVERO, ve'-vai-ro, a town of Spain, in Galicia, seated at the foot of a steep mountain, near the river Landrova, in the Bay of Biscay. Manf. Earthenware, linens, and quiltings. Pop. 4,700.

VIVES, John Louis, ve'-vais, a learned Spanish writer, who became professor at Louvaine, and was about 1523 invited to England by Henry VIII., who employed him in instructing his daughter, the Princess Mary; but, speaking freely of that monarch's divorce of Catherine of Aragon, he was sent to prison. On recovering his liberty, he settled at Bruges. He wrote —a Commentary on St. Augustine's "City of God;" a treatise on the Corruption and Decline of the Arts and Sciences; another on Religion; &c. B. at Valencia, Spain, 1492; D. at Bruges, 1540.

VIVIANI, Vincentio, viv-e-a'-ne, an Italian mathematician, who was the disciple of Galileo, and became first mathematician to the grand-duke of Tuscany. He was a member of the Academy of Sciences at Paris, and of the Royal Society of London. His principal works are—a treatise, entitled "Restitution of Aristeas;" "Geometrical Recreations;" and an edition of Euclid. B. at Florence, 1622; D. at the same city, 1703.

VIZAGAPATAM, ve-za-ga-pa-tam', the capital of a district of the same name, in Hindostan, and residence of the judge and civil establishment, nearly insulated by a small river. It has a court-house, barracks, and many European buildings. Pop. Unascertained. Lat. 17° 42′ N. Lon. 83° 24′ E.—The DISTRICT has an area of 7,650 square miles and a population of 1,255,000.

VIZKAYA. (See BISCAY.)

VIZZINI, vit-se'-ne, a town of Sicily, in the Val di Noto; 28 miles from Catania. Pop. 9,000.

VLAARDINGEN, vlar'-ding-en, a town of the Netherlands, on the Maese, 6 miles from Rotterdam. It has extensive fisheries. Pop 7,250.

VLADIMIR, vlad'-i-meer', a government of European Russia, to the E. of that of Moscow. Area, 19,000 square miles. Desc. Barren in the N., but in other parts fertile. Rivers. The chief are the Khasma and the Oka. Pro. Corn, barley, rye, oats, hemp, flax, pease, apples, cherries, hops, and cucumbers. Cattle-rearing is largely followed, and the forests are extensive. Minerals. Iron, of which there are large mines. Manf. Iron goods, cotton and linen fabrics, glass, leather, and earthenware. Pop. 1,250,000. Lat. between 55° and 57° N. Lon. between 37° 40′ and 43° 20′ E.

VLADIMIR, a town of European Russia, on the Khasma, 112 miles from Moscow. Pop. 7,500.—Another in Volhynia, on the Lui, 28 miles from Kovel. Pop. 5,500.

VLADIMIR, surnamed the Great, grand-duke of Russia, was the illegitimate son of Sviatoslav, who appointed him governor of Novgorod, from which, however, he was driven by Yaropolk, his brother. In 979 he returned to Novgorod, with a large body of Scandinavian adventurers, took prisoner and put to death Yaropolk, and established himself at Kiev as grand-duke of Russia. In 988 he established Christianity, according to the forms of the Greek Church, in his dominions, and, encouraged by the court of Constantinople, he spent the remainder of his life in introducing civilization among his subjects. D. near Kiev, 1014.

VLADIMIR, Monomachos, grand-duke of Kiev, was the great-grandson of the preceding, and succeeded his father, Vsevolod, in 1093. He proved a wise and beneficent ruler, and introduced many of the arts of civilization among his barbarous subjects. His last instructions to his children were remarkable. He said: "It is neither fast, nor seclusion, nor monastic life, which may save you, but good works. . . . Do not take the life either of the innocent or the guilty; the life and the soul of the Christian are sacred. . . . In your household, look yourselves to everything, without relying on your stewards and servants, and the guests will not find fault either with your house or your dinner. . . . Remember every good thing which you have learnt, and learn what you do not know." The first wife of Vladimir was Gyda, daughter of Harold, king of England. The czars of Russia are crowned with a golden cap called after his second name, which is supposed to have descended from the Greek emperors through Vladimir, who acquired it from the father of his second wife, Constantine IX., emperor of the East. B. 1052; D. 1125.

VODINA, or VODENA, vo-de'-na, a town of European Turkey, 56 miles from Salonica. Manf. Cotton and woollen fabrics. Pop. Estimated at 12,000.

VOIL, LOCH, vole, a lake of Scotland, Perthshire, 3 miles long and 1 broad.

VOET, Gilbert, vo'-et, or Voetius, a learned divine and professor at Utrecht, who rendered himself remarkable by accusing Descartes of atheism, and afterwards of being a Jesuit. The magistrates of Utrecht were so weak as to condemn the apologetical letters of the philosopher upon the misrepresentations of this bigoted Calvinist. His works are principally upon polemical theology. B. at Heusde, 1593; D. 1680.—His son Paul became professor of law at Utrecht, and wrote a treatise in Latin, on lawful and unlawful duels. B. 1619; D. 1677.

VOGEL, Dr. Edward, fo'-gel, a modern German traveller, who received his education under his father, a schoolmaster at Leipsic, and subsequently studied astronomy at Berlin, under Encke. About 1851 he repaired to England, where he obtained a post in Mr. Bishop's observatory at Regent's Park. In 1853 he volunteered to proceed to join Drs. Barth and Overweg, who had been previously dispatched upon an expedition to Central Africa. He set out accompanied by two men of the corps of sappers and miners. In 1857 one of his companions, Corporal Maguire, sent a letter, dated Kuka, Nov. 1856, to the English consul at Tripoli, in which it was stated that Dr. Vogel had been murdered at Wara, the capital of Wadai. According to a statement of the Times newspaper, he was beheaded by order of the sultan. Corporal Maguire was murdered by a party of Tuaricks, six miles to the north of Kuka. Dr. Vogel was B. at Leipsic, 1829.

VOGEL, Theodor, a German botanist, who, in 1841, formed a member of the expedition sent to Africa, but died at Fernando Po, in the same year.

VOGHERA, vo-gai'-ra, a tolerably well-built town of Italy, the chief place of a province, on the Staffora, 18 miles from Alessandria. It has a cathedral built in the modern style. The principal branches of its industry are the spinning and weaving of silk. Pop. 11,000.

VOID, wvoid, a market-town of France, in the department Meuse, and the arrondissement Commercy. Pop. 1,700.

VOIGTLAND, voit'-lant, an old district of Germany, in the kingdom of Saxony, now comprised in the circle of Zwickau.

VOIRON, vwoi'-rawng, a town of France, in the department of the Isère, on the Morges, 14 miles from Grenoble. Manf. Extensive; comprising iron and steel goods, hempen cloth, chip hats, and paper. Pop. 8,500.

VOISENON, Claude Henry Fusee de, vwoise'-nawng, a celebrated French dramatic writer and wit, who, in his 11th year, addressed a complimentary poetical epistle to Voltaire. He was the author of dramas, operas, and oratorios, literary anecdotes, and historical fragments. Having wounded an eminent man in a duel, he, to expiate his act, took orders; but his after-life was in strange contrast with the vocation he had thus strangely chosen, and for which his character totally unfitted him. He was one of the most servile of the flatterers of Madame du Barry. B. near Milan, 1708; D. 1775.

VOITURE, Vincent, vwoi'-toor, an elegant French writer, whose wit obtained for him the favour of attending upon the duke of Orleans, by whom he was sent to negotiate affairs of importance at Madrid and other places. His works consist of poems and letters, and an unfinished romance. B. at Amiens, 1598; D. 1648.

VOLCANO, vol-ka'-no, an island of the Mediterranean, off the coast of Sicily, the most southern of the Lipari group. It consists of a single volcanic mountain, of a conical shape. In all parts of the island traces of fire are distinctly visible. It is about 3,000 feet in height. The crater is very large, its form oval, its circuit about a mile, and its depth about 400 yards. Lat. 38° 30′ N. Lon. 15° 13′ E.

VOLGA. (See WOLGA.)

VOLHYNIA, vol-hin'-i-a (Pol. WOLYNSK, vo-leensk'), an extensive government of the Russian empire, lying to the E. of the kingdom of Poland, between the governments of Grodno and Podolia. Area, 27,350 square miles. Desc. Undulating, with extensive marshes in the N. Rivers. The Bug, the Styr, and the Gorin. Pro. The usual cerealia, hemp, flax, live-stock, and timber. Minerals. Bog iron, potters' clay, nitre, and flint. Manf. Leather, potash, glass, earthenwares, tar, and charcoal. Pop. 1,500,000. Lat. between 49° 25′ and 52° 10′ N. Lon. between 23° 30′ and 29° 12′ E.

VOLJE, vol'-jai, a lake of Russia, in the government of Novgorod, 40 miles from Lake Biclo. Ext. 25 miles long and 12 broad.

VOLKMARSHEIM, folk-mars'-hime, a town of Prussian Westphalia, on the Diemel. Pop. 2,200.

VOLKOF, Feodor, vol'-kof, a celebrated Russian actor, who, by frequenting the Italian theatre at St. Petersburg, became passionately fond of the stage, and, having constructed one in a private house, he performed upon it with his brothers. His merits were soon perceived, and he was enabled to erect a proper theatre, and to collect a company. In 1752 he was sent for to St. Petersburg, where the empress Catherine II. took him and his company into her service. Volkof was ennobled, and obtained a large estate. B. 1729; D. at Moscow, 1763.

VOLLORE, vol-lor', a parish and town of France, in the department Puy-de-Dôme, 5 miles from Thiers. Pop. 4,000.

VOLNEY, Constantine-François-Chasse-Bœuf, Count de, vol'-ne, a celebrated French writer, who was sent to Paris in 1774 to study the law, which he subsequently exchanged for that of medicine; but relinquished both in 1783, on succeeding to an independent fortune. He then repaired to the East, and, during eight months, secluded himself in a convent in Egypt, in order to acquire the Arabic language. After travelling over Egypt and Syria, he returned to his native country in 1787, and published an account of his wanderings. Upon the outbreak of the Revolution he became a member of the Girondist party; but, being an indifferent orator, he had little influence upon the course of events. In 1790 he produced an essay on the Chronology of the twelve centuries preceding the invasion of Greece by Xerxes; and in the following year put forth his "Ruines, ou Méditations sur les Révolutions des Empires," which is a popular work in England, although it is principally known through the medium of a wretched translation. Soon afterwards, having purchased an estate in Corsica, he went to reside there, but was compelled to leave the island by Paoli in 1793. He next published "La Loi Naturelle," made the acquaintance of Bonaparte, then an officer of artillery, and was imprisoned by Robespierre, after whose fall he was liberated, and received the appointment of professor of history in the Normal School. In 1795 he crossed the Atlantic, and resided in the United States until the commencement of 1798. He subsequently became commandant of the Legion of Honour, and a count, receiving both dignities from his old friend the ex-officer of artillery, now emperor of France. At the Restoration he was created a peer. Besides the works already enumerated, he produced "A Simple Method of Acquiring the Arabic, Persian, and Turkish Languages;" "Travels in the United States;" "Supplement to Larcher's Herodotus;" "Researches upon the Antiquities of Persia, India, and Babylon;" "The European Alphabet applied to the Asiatic Languages;" and a treatise upon the philosophical study of language. B. at Craon, Anjou, 1757; D. 1826.

VOLO, vo'-lo, a town of European Turkey, in Thessaly, 38 miles from Larissa. Pop. 2,000.—The GULF OF VOLO is an inlet of the Ægean Sea, with a length and breadth of about 18 miles each. In it is the island of Trikeri.

VOLOGDA, vo-log'-da, a province or government of European Russia, lying to the S. of that of Archangel, and to the E. of the governments of Novgorod and Olonetz. It is one of the largest but worst-peopled governments of the empire. Area, 140,000 square miles. Desc. Undulating, and partly covered with branches of the Oural Mountains. Rivers. The Dwina and its affluents. Climate. Severe. Pro. Rye, barley, hemp, flax, hops, and pulses. Horses and cattle are extensively reared. Minerals. Copper, iron, marble, granite, flint, and salt. Manf. Woollen and cotton fabrics, soap, leather, linen, candles, with distilleries and salt-works. Pop. about 930,000. Lat. between 58° and 64° 30′ N. Lon. between 38° and 60° E.

VOLOGDA, a town of European Russia, and the capital of the above province, on the river Vologda, 110 miles from Jaroslavl. It has two cathedrals, and is the residence of a governor and an archbishop. Manf. Silk, linen, canvas, dye-stuffs, and leather. Pop. 14,000.

VOLOKOLAMSK, vo-lo-ko-lamsk', a town of European Russia, 73 miles from Moscow. It has suffered many misfortunes, having been ruined twice by the Tartars, and, in 1613, taken by the Poles. Pop. 3,000.

VOLONGO, vo-lon'-go, a village of Portugal, in the province Minho, 6 miles from Oporto. Here are some mines of antimony, which were wrought in the time of the Romans.

VOLSK, volsk, a town of European Russia, in the government of Saratov, on the Volga, or Wolga, 70 miles from Saratov. Pop. 3,000.

VOLTA, vol'-ta, a considerable river of Guinea, in Western Africa. Its course is estimated at upwards of 360 miles, and, after passing through the territory of the Ashantees, it enters the sea at Adda, in lat. 5° 40′ N., and lon. 0° 40′ E.

VOLTA, Alessandro, a celebrated Italian natural philosopher, and the discoverer of the "Voltaic pile." Born of a noble family, he at first evinced poetical tastes, composing, among other pieces, one upon the ascent of Mont Blanc by De Saussure. After travelling in Switzerland, Germany, Holland, and England, he repaired to France, where he spent some time. Upon the entry of Napoleon into Italy, in 1796, Volta received many tokens of the respect in which the victorious general held the brilliant scientific explorer. He was created a knight of the Iron Crown, count, and senator of the new kingdom of Italy. He had long before held the appointment of professor of natural philosophy in the university of Paris; indeed, it was while he was thus engaged that he made his most important discoveries in electrical science. He discovered the electrophorus in 1775, when making some experiments on the non-conducting power of wood when impregnated with oil. The electrical condenser, which may be termed another form of the electrophorus, was first made known by him in 1782. He contributed an account of this instrument to the 72nd volume of the "Philosophical Transactions." The hydrogen lamp and the electrical pistol were also first made use of by him. It is, however, upon his discovery of the electrical pile that his fame mainly rests. He arrived at a knowledge of this principle by subjecting to a profound analysis the facts already placed before the world by Galvani. An interesting account of these experiments was furnished by himself to the "Philosophical Transactions," in two letters to Sir Joseph Banks. A collected edition of his works was published at Florence in 1816. B. at Como, 1745; D. at the same city, 1826.

VOLTAIRE, François-Marie Arouet de, vol'-tair, a celebrated French writer. He received his education in the college of Louis le Grand, and, even in his earliest years, evinced proofs of a lively genius. He was intended for the law, which he renounced for poetry. His irresistible turn for satire led to his being taken for the author of some lampoons upon the recently-deceased king, Louis XIV., for which he was sent to the Bastille, where he continued during a year, after which he obtained his release from the regent Orleans. About this time he took the name of Voltaire. In 1718 appeared his tragedy of "Œdipus," which met with great success. Having produced some other plays, he was, in 1726, again imprisoned in the Bastille; but, after a confinement of six months, he recovered his liberty; on which he went to England, where he published his "Henriade" by subscription. After spending three years in England, he returned to Paris, and divided his time between literature and commercial speculation, in both of which he met with success. In 1730 appeared his tragedy of "Brutus," esteemed as the best of his dramatic compositions. This was followed by several others, the principal of which were "Zara," "Merope," "Alzira," and "Mahomet." His "Philosophical Letters" were burnt by a decree of parliament, and the author, apprehensive of the consequences, withdrew from Paris. Subsequently, however, he gained the favour and protection of the court, was appointed historiographer of France, and, in 1746, was admitted a member of the French Academy, through the interest of Madame de Pompadour. In 1750 he accepted the invitation of Frederick the Great to reside at Potsdam; but, after a residence of three years in Prussia, some differences arising between the king and the poet, Voltaire quitted Prussia, carrying with him a copy of the poetical works of the king, who caused him to be arrested on the road, till the fugitive manuscript was restored. Voltaire went to reside at Colmar, whence he removed to Geneva, and afterwards settled at Ferney, a village in the Pays de Gex, which he improved, causing to settle there many ingenious artisans, whose works he sent to Russia, Germany, Spain, Italy, and Holland. At the beginning of the year 1778 he went to reside at Paris, where he was received with many flattering marks of distinction. His remains were interred in the abbey of the Bernardins, near Troyes, but removed in 1791, by an order of the National Assembly, and laid in the Pantheon, at Paris. Besides his poetical works, he wrote "Essay on General History," "The Age of Louis XIV.," "Life of Charles XII. of Sweden," and "History of the Czar Peter the Great;" the romances of "Candide," "Zadig," and some others. All his works have been published in 70 vols. As a writer, he was lively, brilliant, and imposing; but frequently superficial and dogmatical. "Voltaire," says one of his biographers, "though a deist, professed a great horror of atheism; and in reading all his philosophical and anti-religious works, it is necessary to bear this in mind. It is a great mistake to confound him with the professed atheists of his day, whom he hated, or, at least, affected to hate, and who viewed his deism with contempt. He has been the subject of almost unqualified panegyric and of unqualified abuse; but he deserves neither. . . . . He is not the writer for all ages, and his age is past." B. at Chatenay, near Sceaux, 1694; D. at Paris, 1778.

VOLTERA, vol-tai'-ra, a town of Italy, in Tuscany, on the river Era, 24 miles from Florence. It contains a cathedral, an hospital, and several churches, and is inclosed by walls of singular Etruscan architecture. It appears, from its monuments, to have been a place of great antiquity. Manf. Alabaster articles; and in its neighbourhood are rich copper-mines. Pop. 4,500.

VOLTURARA, vol-too-ra'-ra, two towns of Naples, neither with a population above 2,700.

VOLTURNO, vol-toor'-no, a river of Naples, rising in the province Molise, and, after a course of 90 miles, falling into the Gulf of Gaeta, 20 miles from Naples. On the banks of this river a great battle was fought, in 1860, between the troops of Francis II., king of Naples, and the followers of Garibaldi.

VOLUPTAS and VOLUPIA, vo-lup'-tăs, vo-lu'-pi-a, the goddess of sensual pleasures, worshipped at Rome, where she had a temple. She was represented as a young and beautiful woman, elegantly adorned, having Virtue under her feet.

VOLVIC, vol'-vik, a town of France, in the department of the Puy-de-Dôme, 4 miles from Riom. It has considerable quarries of lava, of which the town is constructed. Pop. 3,500.

VONDEL, Joost von den, von'-del, the greatest of the Dutch poets, whose works consist of tragedies, dramatic poems, and epics. B. 1587; D. at Amsterdam, 1679.

VON DER HARDT, Herman, hart, an eminent German biblical commentator, who became librarian to the duke of Brunswick, and, in 1690, professor of oriental languages at Helmstadt. He wrote commentaries upon the Bible, the "History of the Council of Constance," &c. B. at Osnabruck, 1660; D. 1746.

VONIZZA, vo-nit'-sa, a fortified town of Greece, on an inlet of the Gulf of Arta, 6 miles from Prevesa. Pop. 2,500.

VOPISCUS, Flavius, vo-pis'-kus, a Latin historian, who wrote the lives of Aurelian, Tacitus, Florianus, Probus, Firmius, Carus, &c., which are included in the "Historiæ Augustæ Scriptores." B. at Syracuse, and flourished in the 4th century.

VORMAR, Isaac, vor'-mar, a learned German, who was employed as one of the imperial plenipotentiaries in negotiating the treaty of Westphalia. He wrote memoirs of public affairs. Lived in the 17th century.

VORMO. (See WORMO.)

VORONEJ, a province or government in the interior of European Russia, bounded E. by the country of the Don Cossacks, and encompassed by other Russian governments. Area, 26,000 square miles. Desc. Level, and, in some parts, undulating. It borders on the Ukraine, and, like that extensive country, has in general a good soil and a steady climate. Rivers. The Don, the Voronez, and the Donez, besides a number of smaller streams. Pro. Most of the products of temperate countries, including large quantities of melons, tobacco, flax, onions, honey, cucumbers, and pulses. Minerals. Iron, nitre, and limestone. Manf. Soap and coarse woollens. Pop. 1,700,000. Lat. between 48° 40′ and 53° N. Lon. between 37° 40′ and 43° E.

VORONEJ, the capital of the above government, stands on the river Vorona, 130 miles from Koursk. Its principal buildings are the cathedral, the residence of the governor, and the public offices of the province. Here are classical and other schools. Manf. Woollens, leather, and hardware. Pop. 19,000.—Peter the Great here erected a palace and formed large arsenals. The first vessel of his fleet in the Sea of Azov was built here.

VORONEZ, vo-ro-nezh', a river of European Russia, which joins the Don.

VORSKLA, vorsk'-la, a river of Russia, rising in the government of Karkhov, and, after a course of 150 miles, joining the Dneiper, 40 miles from Ekaterinoslav.

VORSTIUS, or VORST, Conrad, forst, an eminent German theological writer, who, in 1610, succeeded Arminius in the chair of divinity at Leyden. James I., king of England, caused his book upon the attributes of God to be publicly burnt, and denounced its author as a heretic, to the States of Holland. After losing his professorship, and being exiled from Holland, he retired to Holstein. He produced several other controversial books. B. at Cologne, 1569; D. at Tonningen, 1622.

VORTIGERN, vor'-ti-gern, a British chief, who, upon the departure of the Romans in 445, was chosen king of South Britain. To repel the Scots and Picts, he invited to his assistance the Saxons, who landed in 450, under the command of Hengist and Horsa, and drove out the invaders. Vortigern fell in love with Rowena, daughter of Hengist, and, on his marriage, gave the father the kingdom of Kent, to which was afterwards added the whole of Wessex. Vortigern retired to Wales, and was burnt in his castle in 485.

VOSGES, vozhe, a great chain of mountains in the east of France, extending from N. to S., in a line nearly parallel to the course of the Rhine, from Basle to Spires, attaining an elevation, in their culminating points, of from 4,000 or 5,000 feet, and covered with snow during eight or nine months in the year. The Vosges give rise to the Meuse, Moselle, Saône, Marne, and Aube.

VOSGES, a department in the N.E. of France, formed of a part of Lorraine, and adjoining the departments of the Meurthe and Upper Saône. Ext. 2,300 square miles. Desc. The surface is rugged; consisting of mountains and forest land, interspersed with valleys of greater or less extent. Rivers. The principal are the Meuse, Meurthe, Mortagne, Moselle, and Madon. The smaller streams and mountain-torrents are very numerous. Pro. Wheat, maize, hemp, and flax. Many cattle are reared, and cherries are extensively cultivated for the manufacture of Kirschenwasser. Minerals. Iron, copper, silver, and marble. There are, also, numerous mineral springs. Pop. about 430,000.

VOSS, Gerard John, foss, or VOSSIUS, Gerardus Johannes, the Latinized form adopted by himself. A man of profound learning, he became professor of eloquence and chronology at Leyden in 1617. His "History of Pelagianism" rendered him obnoxious to the Calvinists; but it procured him in England the favour of Archbishop Laud, and a prebend in the cathedral of Canterbury. While in England, he was admitted to the degree of doctor of laws at Oxford. In 1633 he accepted the professorship of history at Amsterdam. His works consist principally of classical antiquities. B. near Heidelberg, 1577; D. 1649.

VOSSIUS, Dionysius, son of the preceding. He was profoundly learned in the Oriental languages, and published a Latin translation of Maimonides on Idolatry, with notes, and other works. B. at Dort, 1612; D. at Amsterdam, 1633.

VOSSIUS, Isaac, a learned German writer, and another son of Gerard John Vossius. He visited Sweden on the invitation of Queen Christina. In 1670 he settled in England, obtaining from Charles II. a canonry of Windsor, and the degree of doctor of laws from the university of Oxford. He published a book to prove that the Septuagint version was produced by inspiration; but, though he was remarkable for believing the strangest inconsistencies, he expressed some doubts respecting the sacred text, which led Charles II. to say of him, "This learned divine is a strange man; he believes everything but the Bible." His works are numerous. B. at Leyden, 1618; D. at Windsor Castle, 1688.

VOSSIUS, Gerard, a Romish divine, and relation of the preceding. He published the works of Gregory Thaumaturgus, Ephrem Syrus, and some pieces of John Chrysostom and Theodoret, with Latin versions and notes. B. 1609; D. about 1660.

VOSSIUS, or VOSS, Johann Heinrich, a learned German philologist, who became rector of the gymnasium of Eutin, but subsequently setted at Heidelberg, whither his great reputation had caused him to be invited by the elector of Baden. He translated Homer, Virgil, Hesiod, and Theocritus, and takes rank as among the very first scholars of Germany. He also produced commentaries of several Greek writers, and may be considered one of the founders of modern philology. B. in Mecklenburg, 1751; D. at Heidelberg, 1826.

VOUET, Simon, voo'-ai, an eminent French painter. He was, during some time, painter of the Academy of St. Luke, at Rome; but was recalled to France by Louis XIII., who employed him in ornamenting his palaces, and gave him a pension. He was the founder of the French school. B. at Paris, 1582; D. at the same city, 1641.

VROON, Henry Cornelius, vroon, a Dutch painter. He excelled in depicting sea-fights, and was engaged to make designs for the tapestry in the House of Lords, representing the destruction of the Spanish armada.

VUKOVAR, voo-ko-var', a town of the Austrian empire, in Sclavonia, on the Danube, at the influx of the river Vuka, which divides it into two parts. It has several Greek churches. Manf. The twisting of silk. Pop. 5,700.

VULCANALIA, vul-ka-nai'-li-a, festivals held at Rome in honour of Vulcan, at which time the streets were illuminated, fires kindled everywhere, and animals thrown into the flames, as a sacrifice to the deity.

VULCANO. (See VOLCANO.)

VULCANUS, or VULCAN, vul-kai'-nus, vul'-kan, a deity with the Greeks and Romans, who presided over fire, and was the patron of all artists who worked iron and metals. According to Homer, he was son of Jupiter and Juno; but was driven from Olympus, because he attempted to deliver his mother, who had been fastened by a golden chain, for her presumption. He was nine days in coming from Olympus to earth, and fell in the island of Lemnos, where he fixed his residence, raised forges to work metals, and taught the inhabitants all the useful arts. The Cyclops of Sicily were his attendants, and with him they fabricated, not only the thunderbolts of Jupiter, but also arms for the gods and the most celebrated heroes. His forges were supposed to be under Mount Ætna, in the island of Sicily. The worship of Vulcan was well established, particularly in Egypt, at Athens, and at Rome. A calf and a boar pig were the principal victims offered to him. Vulcan was generally represented as covered with perspiration, blowing with his nervous arm the fires of his forges, and sometimes holding a hammer raised in the air ready to strike; while, with the other hand, he turned with pincers a thunderbolt on an anvil. He was father of Cupid, by Venus.

VUOXEN, voo-ox'-en, a river of Russia, rising in Finland, and, after a course of 300 or 350 miles, falling into Lake Ladoga at Kexholm.

VUSITRIN, vu-se'-trin, a town of European Turkey, on an affluent of the Ibar, 12 miles from Pristina. Pop. 3,000.

VYTEGRA, ve'-tai-gra, a town of European Russia, in the government of Olonetz, on the Vytegra, 70 miles from Petrozavodsk. Pop. 2,500.

WAAG, vag, a large river of Hungary, rising in the Carpathian Mountains, and, after a course of 200 miles, joining the Danube at Komorn.

WAAGEN, Gustav Friedrich, va'-gen, a modern German art-critic, who, at a comparatively early age, became director of the Royal Gallery of Paintings at Berlin. He had previously devoted himself with zeal to the study of art, and had produced at Munich a small work on the Royal Bavarian collection. His fame as a writer upon art commenced in England with the year 1838, when a translation of one of his works was produced under the title of "Treasures of Art in Great Britain." In 1857 he published a small work upon the exhibition at Manchester, entitled "A Walk through the Art Treasures Exhibition: what to Observe." In that exhibition, the plan of hanging the pictures, first suggested by him, and adopted at the Berlin Gallery, was carried out with the happiest effect. While in England he was requested to give his opinion as to the best mode of arranging the paintings in the National Gallery. He also produced a short life of Rubens, and other works. D. at Hamburg, 1794.

WAAL, val, a river, or rather branch of the Rhine, which joins the Maese at the small island of Voorn; and afterwards, separating from the Maese, it joins it at Worcum.

WAALWYK, val'-vik, a town of North Brabant, 10 miles from Bois-le-Duc. Pop. 2,800.

WAARE GHEM, va-rai'-gem, a parish and village of Belgium, W. Flanders, 9 miles from Courtray. Pop. 5,000.—A station on the Brussels and Tournay Railway.

WAARSCHOOT, var'-shoot, a town of the Netherlands, on the Lys, 9 miles from Ghent. Pop. 5,300.

WAAST, or WAST, vast, a priest of the diocese of Toul, who was charged by his bishop to give instruction to Clovis, king of the Franks, previously to that monarch being received into the pale of the Christian church. He became bishop of Arras. D. 540.

WABASH, wa'-bish, a river of the United States, rising in Ohio, and, after a course of 400 miles, falling into the Ohio, of which it is the principal tributary.

WACE, GUACE, or HUISTACE, Master Robert, waice, an old Anglo-Norman poet, who appears to have been educated for the clerical profession, and to have held the appointment of reading clerk in the private chapel of Henry I., who generally held his court at Caen. He composed, among other poems, the "Roman du Rou," a rhymed chronicle of the dukes of Normandy, from Rollo to the eighth year of Henry I. This work, which was completed in 1160, was presented to Henry II., who, in reward, gave the poet a canonry in the cathedral of Bayeux. He also wrote "Le Brut d'Angleterre," which is the history of one Brutus, great-grandson of Æneas, who was supposed to have ruled in Britain. The "Roman du Rou," which was written in the Roman or vulgar dialect, contains a very graphic description of the battle of Hastings. D. in England, about 1184.

WACHTENDONK, vak'-ten-donk, a town of Rhenish Prussia, 24 miles from Dusseldorf. Manf. Velvet ribbons. Pop. 2,000.

WADING, Luke, wai'-ding, a learned Irish divine, who went at an early age to Spain, where he became professor of theology in the university of Salamanca. He subsequently repaired to Rome, where he held several high ecclesiastical appointments. He edited the works of Duns Scotus and some of the writings of St. Francis, and wrote a history of the Spanish embassy of Philip III. to Rome, &c. B. at Waterford, 1588; D. at Rome, 1654.

WADSWORTH, wadz'-werth, a township of the W. Riding of Yorkshire, 8 miles from Halifax. Pop. 4,500.

WAGENSEIL, John Christopher, va'-gen-sile, a learned German writer, who became professor of law and history at Altorf, but exchanged that professorship for the chair of Oriental languages. He produced, among other learned works, a translation of the Mishnu and Ghemara, and a collection of Hebrew writers against Christianity, whom he refuted. B. at Nuremberg, 1633; D. 1705.

WAGHORN, Thomas, wag'-horn, lieutenant in the royal navy, and the projector of the overland route to India. After seeing much service in the Indian seas, he, in 1827, while residing at Calcutta, proposed to the government there a plan for steam communication between England and the East Indies. Repairing to England, he made known his project to the authorities of the Post-Office, the Board of Control, and the Court of Directors; but found it opposed in almost every quarter. Obtaining the patronage of Lord Ellenborough, he was permitted to carry government dispatches for the governor of Bombay through Egypt, and, although he encountered an unusual number of difficulties, he completely succeeded in his mission. With the assistance of the Bombay Steam Committee, he commenced the establishing of the overland route, built hotels and halting-places in the desert, between Cairo and Suez, and placed steamers upon the Red Sea. Between the years 1831-34, he superintended the entire working of the overland route himself. After the government had taken up the idea, he continued to explore other routes than that through France, and, in 1847, found that journeying by Trieste effected a saving of thirteen days. Unfortunately, he lost all his property in the prosecution of the Trieste route, and, as a still greater misfortune, his health gave way under the anxiety of mind consequent upon his great labours. A small pension was granted to his widow. B. at Chatham, Kent, 1800; D. in London, 1850.

WAGRAM, wag'-ram, or vag'-ram, a village of Germany, in Lower Austria, on the river Rosbach, 12 miles from Vienna. It is celebrated for being the scene of a great battle between the Austrians and the French in 1809, when the former were defeated.

WAGSTAFFE, Thomas, wag'-staf, a learned English divine, who became chancellor of Lichfield cathedral; but was deprived at the Revolution, for refusing the oaths. He practised physic for some time, and, in 1693, was consecrated a nonjuring bishop. He published several sermons and a Vindication of King Charles I., to prove authorship of the "Icon Basilike." B. in Warwickshire, 1645; D. 1702.

WAIKATO, wai-ka'-to, the principal river of New Zealand. It rises in Lake Taupo, and, after a course of 140 miles, enters the ocean, 35 miles from Auckland.

WAINFLEET, wain'-fleet, a market-town of Lincolnshire, 14 miles from Boston. It had formerly two churches, only one of which now remains. Pop. 2,200.

WAITZEN, or VACZ, vach, a town of Hungary, on a bend of the Danube, 95 miles from Presburg. It is the see of a bishop, and has Piarist College, an episcopal palace, a military school, and a deaf-mute asylum. Manf. Paper. Pop. 12,000.

WAJO, wa'-jo, a kingdom of Celebes, on the Gulf of Boni. Its capital is a large straggling town, with extensive ruins. Pop. 6,000.

WAKE, waik, a county of North Carolina, U.S. Area, 1,020 square miles. Pop. 25,000.

WAKE, Isaac, an English writer, who became public orator of the university of Oxford, and was employed as ambassador to Venice and Savoy; on which occasion he was knighted. He wrote "Rex Platonicus;" "Discourse on the Thirteen Cantons of the Helvetic League," "On the State of Italy," and "On the Proceedings of the King of Sweden." D. 1632.

WAKE, William, a learned English prelate, who became chaplain to William III. and Queen Mary, and preacher to the society of Gray's Inn. In 1705 he was created bishop of Lincoln, and in 1716 translated to Canterbury. He had a controversy with Dr. Atterbury on the rights of convocations, and entered into a correspondence with some of the French bishops relative to a union between the two churches. He published a translation of the Epistles of the Apostolical Fathers; "Exposition of the Church Catechism;" and tracts against Popery. B. at Blandford, Dorsetshire, 1657; D. 1737.

WAKEFIELD, woik'-feeld, a large and well-built town in the West Riding of Yorkshire, 9 miles from Leeds. Most of its streets are regular, handsome, and spacious. The market-cross is an elegant structure, being an open colonnade of the Doric order, supporting a dome. The parish church is a spacious and lofty Gothic structure, and the spire is considered the highest in Yorkshire. Besides these, there are the church of St. John, erected towards the close of the 18th century; a free grammar-school, founded and endowed by Queen Elizabeth, but much improved by private benefactions; a charity school, founded for the instruction and clothing of poor boys and girls in Wakefield. At the bottom of Westgate, the principal street in the town, is the house of correction for the whole Riding. This prison is a large and noble structure of stone, surrounded by an outer wall, and contains above 150 cells. At the south-east entrance into Wakefield is a handsome stone bridge over the Calder. It was built in the reign of Edward III., and is a fine specimen of the masonry of that age. There are, also, a literary and a philosophical society, a mechanics' institute, a court-house, banks, corn and auction mart, and an elegant building comprising assembly-rooms, news-rooms, library, and dispensary. In the immediate neighbourhood is the asylum for the West Riding pauper lunatics, a most extensive and costly building. Manf. Woollen cloth and yarn; but these have declined. Wakefield being one of the greatest corn-markets in England, contains immense corn-warehouses, erected on the banks of the Calder. Pop. of township, about 24,000. It has a station on the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway.

WAKEFIELD, Rev. Gilbert, a learned English writer, who, in 1776, became fellow of Jesus College, Cambridge. In the same year he published a collection of Latin poems, with notes on Homer. After entering into holy orders, and obtaining a curacy in Liverpool, he, about 1779, resolved to quit the church. For a short time he held the office of classical tutor in the dissenting academy at Warrington. While there, he published a number of works, the principal of which were, a translation of the first Epistle to the Thessalonians; another of the Gospel of St. Matthew; and an "Enquiry into the Opinions of the Christian Writers of the three first Centuries, concerning the Person of Jesus Christ." In 1790 he removed to the dissenting college at Hackney, his connection with which ended in about a year. Soon after this, he published a pamphlet against public worship, which startled many of his most ardent admirers, and was answered chiefly by dissenters. He continued to reside at Hackney, engaged in classical studies, till the progress of the French revolution and the war led him into the field of politics. He wrote some pamphlets against the government, of which no notice was taken; but his letter to the bishop of Llandaff was considered as so inflammatory, and of so dangerous a tendency, that the attorney-general instituted a prosecution against him, and he was sentenced to be imprisoned for two years in Dorchester gaol, from whence he was liberated in 1801. In religion he was a Socinian, and in political views a republican. As a classical and oriental scholar, his attainments were extraordinary; and his critical productions are highly valued, while his others are forgotten. His most important works were, a translation of the New Testament; "Tragœdiarum Græcarum Delectus;" an edition of Lucretius, "The Evidences of Christianity;" and an edition of Horace. B. at Nottingham, 1756; D. in London, 1801.

WAKEFIELD, Robert, a learned English divine, who was in 1519 nominated Hebrew professor at Louvain, but shortly afterwards returned to England, became king's chaplain, and was appointed Hebrew professor at Oxford. He wrote a "Paraphrase on the Ecclesiastes," "Syntagma de Hebræorum," and other works. D. 1537.

WALACHIA, or WALLACHIA, vol-la'-ke-a, or wol-la'-ke-a (Turk. IFLAK, if-lak'), one of the Danubian principalities, in the north of Turkey-in-Europe, bordered on the N. by a range of mountains separating it from Transylvania and Moldavia; on the S. by a boundary equally majestic, the Danube flowing from W. to E., and dividing it from the interior of Turkey. Area. Estimated at 27,5[illegible] ably diversified. WALDECK, PRINCES OF, one of the most ancient dynasties of Northern Germany, descended, probably, from Wittekind. The most celebrated members of the house were:—George Frederick, who served the emperor Leopold I., and defeated the French and the Turks in several battles. He also became commander-in-chief of the armies of the United Provinces of the Netherlands, and died 1692.—His brother, Count Josias, commanded the military forces of the Venetian republic: he died in 1711.—Prince Christian Augustus, distinguished in the wars against the French, during the revolutionary period, and one of the commanders of the imperial armies. He suggested the celebrated attack made upon the French at Weissenberg, by the combined Austrian and Prussian armies in 1793, and particularly distinguished himself in the passage of the Rhine, near Selz. The fortress of Kiel, opposite Strasburg, was taken by him. In 1797 he, at the request of the prince-regent, proceeded to Portugal for the purpose of re-organising the army there, but died in the following year.—The present prince of Waldeck, George Victor, is the great-grandson of the preceding.

WALDEGRAVE, James, Earl, wal'-de-grav, an English statesman, and a favourite of George II. In 1757 he was charged with the formation of a ministry, and, says Walpole, "the public was not more astonished at that designation than himself;" the idea was, however, abandoned almost immediately. He left some interesting Memoirs from 1754 to 1758. His wife, a natural daughter of Sir Edward Walpole, son of the statesman Sir Robert, after his death married the duke of Gloucester, brother of George III. She was the mother of the late duke of Gloucester and Princess Sophia Matilda. The earl died 1763.

WALDEMAR I., wal'-de-mar, king of Denmark. He succeeded Erick IV., in 1139, when only in his 8th year, under guardianship of Erick, son-in-law of Erick III., who, however, usurped the crown, and reigned as Erick V., until 1147. After many troubles he obtained the undisturbed possession of his crown in 1157. He subsequently distinguished himself as a warrior and legislator, caused a collection of Danish laws to be made, and earned, by the wisdom of his rule, the title of "Great," which is usually appended to his name in the histories of Denmark. D. 1131; D. 1181 or 1182.

WALDEMAR II., styled "the Victorious," succeeded his brother Canute VI. in 1202. While heir-apparent, he had distinguished himself by conquering Holstein. He conceived the idea of founding a Baltic empire, which should embrace Denmark, Holstein, Courland, Livonia, Esthland, the southernmost parts of Sweden and Norway, and the islands in the Baltic. During some years his arms were successful both on land and sea, and the realization of his project appeared as about to be accomplished. In 1220 he was made prisoner by treachery, and was not released until he had ceded Holstein and Mecklenburg. His army was shortly afterwards totally defeated in Holstein, and his navy destroyed in 1234. Thereupon, he devoted himself to the propagation of the arts of peace throughout the remnant of his former possessions. D. 1241.

WALDEMAR III. became king of Denmark in 1326. He disposed of Esthland, Courland, and Livonia, to the grand master of the Teutonic Orders of Prussia, for 18,000 silver marks, and with this money equipped an army and navy, which latter was, however, subsequently destroyed by the Hanseatic towns. D. 1273.

WALDEN, wal'-den, a township in the North Riding of Yorkshire. Pop. 500.

WALDENBURG, wal'-den-boorg, the name of three towns in Germany, none of them with a population above 3,000.

WALDO, wal'-do, a county of the United States, in Maine. Area, 930 square miles. Pop. 50,000.

WALDO, Peter, the founder of the sect of Waldenses, was originally a merchant of Lyons. He gave his property to the poor, preached the gospel to them, and obtained many followers. Driven from Lyons, they went into Dauphiny, Provence, and other countries. Though their manners were inoffensive, yet, as they had seceded from the church of Rome, a crusade was formed against them, by which many thousands were destroyed. The sect, however, still continued, and spread over the valleys of Piedmont. Lived in the 12th century.

WALDURN, val'-doorn, a town of Austria, in Baden, 30 miles from Wurzburg. Pop. 3,200.

WALES, THE PRINCIPALITY OF, wails, forms nearly a peninsula, in the W. portion of Great Britain, washed on the north and west by the Irish Sea, on the south and south-east by the Bristol Channel, and limited on the east by the counties of Monmouth, Hereford, Salop, and Chester. Political Divisions. The principality is divided into North and South Wales, containing twelve counties; the division of North Wales comprehending Anglesey, Caernarvon, Denbigh, Flint, Merioneth, and Montgomery; and South Wales, the counties of Brecknock, Cardigan, Caermarthen, Glamorgan, Pembroke, and Radnor. Area, 7,425 square miles. Desc. Generally mountainous, especially in the N., where continued ranges, intersected by numerous deep ravines, with extensive valleys, and affording endless views of wild mountain scenery, prevail. Of these chains, it may be generally observed, that they extend in a direction from south-east to north-west, having their most abrupt declivity facing the latter quarter. The principal range in North Wales is that denominated the Snowdonian chain, from the circumstance of Snowden mountain occupying its centre, and rising to a height of 3,571 feet above the level of the sea. Commencing at Bardsey island, in the south-west extremity of Caernarvonshire, the line, varied at irregular intervals by conical peaks, extends in a north-easterly direction to form an promontory of Penmaenbach, in the Bay of Conwed The intermediate parts consist of the loftiest mountain he in Wales. Ferwyn chain occupies the eastern part ed Merionethshire, and branches out into Denbighshire. Its length is about 16 miles, and the breadth varies from 5 to 10. Another line diverges off into Montgomeryshire, and joins the Breddin chain, extending into Shropshire. Another chain, or rather a continuance of the same, extends in a S. W. direction from Pennant, near the vale of Tanad, in Montgomeryshire, to the seacoast near Llangyllinin, in Merionethshire. In this extensive ridge are conspicuous several lofty mountains, known under the appellation of the Arrans and the Arrenigs, the most eminent of which are Arran-ben-llyn and Arran-fowddy; and the extremity of the line is grandly marked by the triple head of Cadair Idris (Arthur's Seat), attaining a height of 2,900 feet. The celebrated Plinlimmon, 2,500 feet, elevates his lofty crest above a range of table-lands, extending from the vicinity of Llanvair, in the N.E., till they decline in the S.W., and end in the abrupt cliffs which bound part of the Bay of Cardigan, near Aberystwith. An extensive chain stretches from Bleddve Forest, north-east of Llandrindod Wells, in Radnorshire; crosses the northern part of Brecknockshire, continues in a south-westerly direction through Caermarthenshire, and terminates in the conspicuous ridge of the Prescely or Presceleu Mountain, in the county of Pembroke. The Fothoc Hills, on the eastern side of Brecknockshire, commence another line, principally known under the general appellation of the Black Mountains, from the appearance given to them by their dark vegetable covering of heath and ling. Numerous lakes are scattered among these mountains, and, according to some accounts, they amount to between fifty and sixty. Rivers. The principal are the Severn, the Wye, the Conway, the Towy, and the Dee. Zoology. Of the feathered tribes, many species, not found in other parts of the island, are inhabitants of this. The goat is here found in his wild state. Roebucks were anciently numerous; but instances of seeing any are now extremely rare. Pro. Barley and oats are the principal grains, with potatoes and turnips. Large numbers of cattle are reared. The implements employed are rude and ill-constructed, and the Welsh farmer has no skilful mode of managing his land. Until within the present century, roads throughout Wales were indifferent in the extreme. A great improvement, however, has taken place in this point. Many have been widened, shortened, and otherwise ameliorated, by the addition of drains, arches, bridges, &c., to the great accommodation of travellers, and general benefit of the inhabitants. Great improvements have also been made in the internal navigation. The junction of the navigation on the rivers Severn and Dee was effected by opening an aquatic communication through the counties of Denbigh and Flint, with various ramifications into the mining and manufacturing districts in the adjacent counties. This plan was carried into effect by cutting a canal from the Severn, near Shrewsbury, to the Dee, in the vicinity of Chester. Minerals. Valuable and abundant. They are found in great profusion throughout the mountainous districts. Silver is found in Cardiganshire, and iron, copper, and lead are plentiful. Coal abounds in the S., and limestone is also abundant. Lead is found in a variety of places, but particularly in the counties of Flint, Caernarvon, Montgomery, Caermarthen, and Cardigan. The principal iron-works are at Merthyr Tydvil, Aberdare, Tredegar, and Rhuabon. It has generally been remarked that wherever iron is discoverable, coal is not far distant, either underlaying it or lying in collateral strata. Coal is found in every county of Wales, except in the counties of Cardigan, Merioneth, and Caernarvon. Manf. Flannels, for which Wales has long been celebrated; also stockings, gloves, and socks. Very considerable manufactures of cottons and cotton twist have also been established in the counties of Flint and Denbigh. Numerous manufactures of copper, iron, lead, tin plates, &c., have been set up both in North and South Wales. The trade, however, principally consists in the export of woollen goods, mineral produce, and cattle. Inhabitants. The Welsh have many strange customs and peculiar superstitions. They are remarkably fond of poetry and music, and their language is said to be peculiarly adapted to poetical effusions. Their ancient language, however, falling fast into disuse through the principality, more especially the southern part. The gentry of the country are chiefly educated in England, and consequently few of them speak it. Family distinction is held in great estimation. The aboriginal Celtic race still inhabit some parts of the country Pop. about 1,100,000. Lat. between 51° 23′ and 53° 26′ N. Lon. between 2° 41′ and 5° 17′ W. — Llewellyn ap Gryffith was the last prince who exerted himself for the independence of Wales. In 1285 he was subdued by Edward I., and fell in the field of battle. From that time, Wales has been annexed to the English crown; but the union was not complete till the reign of Henry VIII., when the government and laws were formed agreeably to those of England. It gives the title of Prince of Wales to the heir-apparent of the English throne. (See BRITAIN, GREAT.)

WALES, NEW SOUTH. (See NEW SOUTH WALES.)

WALES, William, an eminent English mathematician, who, in 1768, was selected by the government to proceed to Hudson's Bay for the purpose of observing the transit of the planet Venus over the sun's disc. He next accompanied Captain Cook in his second voyage round the world, as astronomer, and, on his return, published an "Account of Astronomical Observations made in the Southern Hemisphere," and was appointed mathematical master of Christ's Hospital. He was also the author of—"Remarks on Mr. Forster's Account of Cook's Voyage;" "An Inquiry into the Population of England and Wales;" and an improved edition of Robertson's "Elements of Navigation."

WALEWSKI, Florian Alexander Joseph Colonna, Count, va-loos'-ke, a modern French statesman, who at first served in the army, but afterwards abandoned the military profession for a mixed political and literary career. By Thiers he was sent upon a mission to Egypt, and under Guizot's administration he held a post in the French legation at Buenos Ayres. After the election of Louis Napoleon to the presidentship of the French republic, he attached himself to the Napoleonic party, and was appointed envoy extraordinary at Florence; passing thence to Naples. In 1854 he was nominated ambassador at the court of St. James's, and in the following year became minister for foreign affairs. At the congress of Paris he represented the French nation, and was one of those who appended their signatures to the treaty that resulted from the conference. In 1852 he was created grand commander of the Legion of Honour, and in 1855 was nominated a member of the senate. B. 1810.

WALKER, Clement, wawk'-er, an English writer, who previously to the civil war was usher of the exchequer, and member of parliament for Wells. He wrote—the "History of Independency," for which he was sent to the Tower by Cromwell; "The High Court of Justice; or, Cromwell's Slaughter-House;" and other works. B. at Cliffe, Dorsetshire, about 1599; D. in the Tower of London, 1651.

WALKER, Sir Edward, an English historical writer. In 1639 he was made secretary at war, and was present at the battle of Edgehill with the royal army. In 1643 he was appointed Garter king-at-arms, and knighted; and, after the Restoration, he became one of the clerks of the Privy Council. He wrote—"Historical Discourses;" "Ceremonies employed in the Celebration of St. George's Day at Windsor;" "Account of the Coronation of Charles II.;" "Acts of the Knights of the Garter in the Civil Wars;" &c. B. in Somersetshire, about 1610; D. in London, 1677.

WALKER, Rev. George, a celebrated Irish divine, who distinguished himself by his gallant defence of Londonderry, in 1689, against the forces of James II., till it was effectually relieved. He afterwards repaired to London, published an account of the siege, and was nominated by William III. to the bishopric of Derry; but, continuing to accompany the army, he was slain at the battle of the Boyne, in 1690.

WALKER, Rev. John, an English divine and writer, who, among other works, produced "An Account of the Sufferings of the Clergy in the Great Rebellion." D. at Exeter, 1730.

WALKER, Obadiah, an English divine, who became master of University College, Oxford, and, embracing the Roman Catholic faith, he, during the reign of James II., attempted, with that monarch's sanction, to restore the old religion in the university; but at the Revolution he was deprived of his offices and imprisoned. After regaining his freedom, he retired into private life. A man of considerable learning, he produced "Greek and Roman History, illustrated by coins and medals;" "Instructions in the Art of Oratory," "A Brief Account of Ancient Church Government," &c. B. in Yorkshire, about 1616; D. in London, 1692.

WALKER, Robert, an English artist, who was appointed painter to Oliver Cromwell. A portrait of the Protector by him was purchased by an agent of the grand-duke of Tuscany for £500. He also painted the portraits of Monk, Blake, and other naval and military commanders of the time. D. about 1670.

WALKER, Samuel, an English divine, who produced several excellent works upon theology. B. at Exeter, 1714; D. 1761.

WALKER, William, a learned English divine and grammarian, was successively master of the schools of Lowth and Grantham, in Lincolnshire, and had the honour of instructing Sir Isaac Newton. He wrote several works on Grammar, Rhetoric, and Logic, and a treatise on English Particles. B. 1623; D. in Lincolnshire, 1684.

WALKER, John, an English lexicographer, who was educated for a commercial career, but became an actor, a schoolmaster, and finally a teacher of elocution, in which last employment he attained a high success, and was invited to give private lectures in the university of Oxford. Having previously put forth a prospectus, he in 1772 published his "Pronouncing Dictionary of the English Language;" which work obtaining a great success, he was encouraged to produce "A Rhyming Dictionary," "Elements of Elocution," "Critical Pronouncing Dictionary" (his most important work); "Key to the Classical Pronunciation of Greek, Latin, and Scripture Proper Names;" "Outlines of English Grammar," and "The Academic Speaker." He had been educated as a Presbyterian; but, towards the close of his life, embraced the Roman Catholic faith. B. at Colney-Hatch, Middlesex, 1732; D. in London, 1807.

WALLACE, Sir William, wal'-lace, a popular Scotch hero. Having slain the son and several of the retainers of the English sheriff of Dundee, for an insult offered to him, Wallace fled to the woods, and was outlawed.

also of a Greco-Russian bishop, and the seat of a medico-chirurgical school, and other schools. Manf. Unimportant, but it has a large trade. Pop. 55,000.

WILSON, Alexander, will'-son, an eminent Scotch naturalist, who was at first a weaver and pedlar; but believing himself to possess poetical talent, he, in 1792, put forth anonymously some verses, entitled "Watty and Meg," which, although ascribed by a few critics to Burns, made little impression. In 1794 he emigrated to the United States, where he worked successively as a copper-plate printer, pedlar, land-measurer, and schoolmaster. In 1802 he became acquainted with a naturalist named Bartram, and afterwards with an engraver, making, under the tuition of the latter, great progress as a draughtsman of birds. In 1804 he went forth upon an expedition to the Falls of Niagara; and from this period until the time of his death, his life was spent in wanderings over the United States, killing and collecting the finest specimens of American ornithology. Descriptions of the birds, and beautiful drawings after his own designs, were subsequently published. The work which has made his name famous as a naturalist, is his "American Ornithology," the first volume of which appeared in 1808. He had almost completed the eighth volume of this fine work when he was attacked by dysentery, which carried him off. B. at Paisley, Scotland, 1766; D. at Philadelphia, U.S. 1813.

WILSON, Horace Hayman, a modern English oriental scholar, who was educated for the medical profession, and became an assistant-surgeon in the service of the East-India Company. Soon after his arrival at Calcutta, he devoted himself to the study of the Sanscrit language, and with such happy effect as to be enabled to put forth an edition of a Sanscrit poem, entitled "The Cloud-Messenger," in 1813. In 1819 he published his Sanscrit and English Dictionary. Upon being elected professor of Sanscrit in the university of Oxford, in 1831, he returned to England. He was subsequently appointed librarian at the India-House, a fellow of the Royal Society, and president of the Royal Asiatic Society. His principal works are—"Polyglot Glossary of Terms used in India," translation of Bopp's "Comparative Grammar," and a History of Cashmeer from Sanscrit authorities. B. in London, 1786.

WILSON, James, a modern Scotch politician and writer upon political economy, who was at first in business as a hatter; but, having failed, turned his attention to literary pursuits. In 1839 he produced a treatise upon the "Influence of the Corn Laws," a work which attracted great notice, and in 1843 he became principal editor of the Economist. He was elected a member of the House of Commons in 1847, in the following year was appointed secretary to the Board of Control, and in 1852 financial secretary to the Treasury. In this latter capacity he, in 1860, went out to India to inaugurate certain reforms in the financial government of that country. B. at Hawick, Roxburghshire, 1805; D. in India, 1861.

WILSON, Professor John, an eminent Scotch poet and essayist, who received his education at the university of Oxford, where he was distinguished by his literary attainments, no less than for his skill in every athletic exercise. After taking his degrees in arts, he quitted the university. "A fair-haired Hercules-Apollo," writes one of his biographers, "and with plenty of money, enabling him to gratify his tastes, whatever they might be, he had scarcely left Oxford when he signalized his double character, by purchasing, or having purchased for him by his father, the small but beautiful estate of Ellery, on Lake Windermere, where, as Hercules, he might yacht about at his pleasure, beat the best boatmen at the oar, and wrestle or box with the strongest dalesman; and, as Apollo, he might revel in the quiet beauties of the finest of English scenery, indulge undisturbed in poetic visions of his own, and cultivate, with due reverence, the society of Wordsworth." He always spent some portion of the year in Edinburgh, and there he made the acquaintance of Sir Walter Scott, who spoke of him, in a letter, as "an eccentric genius." After putting forth some minor lyrical attempts, he, in 1812, published "The Isle of Palms," which was well received, and enabled its author to take a position among the "Lake" poets, with whom he was living upon terms of friendship. His prepossessions, both political and literary, led him to attach himself to the little band of young Tories, with Scott at their head, who caused "Blackwood's Magazine" to be started as an outlet for Scottish Toryism, as British Toryism was generally represented by the "Quarterly Review." In 1818 Wilson produced "The City of the Plague;" in 1820 he was nominated to the chair of moral philosophy in the university of Edinburgh. He next published "Lights and Shadows of Scottish Life," and the "Trials of Margaret Lyndsey," political articles, and literary criticisms. In 1825 he began his celebrated "Noctes Ambrosianæ," under the name of "Christopher North." One of his biographers thus speaks of Wilson as the author of these famous sketches:—"Careless of the formality conventionally identified with the gown of a Scotch professor of moral philosophy, he wrote papers for the magazine, in which he was seen relapsing ideally into his character as an untrammelled human being, a bruiser at country fairs, a boon companion among bacchanalians, commenting on men and manners from the point of view of an inspired king of the gipsies." In the interval 1836-46 he wrote, as a pendant to the "Noctes," his "Dies Boreales;" but these met with less success. In 1855 a collected edition of his works was commenced. B. at Paisley, 1785; D. at Edinburgh, 1854.

WILSON, Florence, a Scotch writer, who went to Basil, and lastly to Paris, where he taught philosophy in the college of Navarre. He wrote a treatise, in Latin, on "Tranquillity of Mind," and other works. Supposed to have been born Moray, 1500; D. in Scotland, 1557.

WILSON, Richard, an eminent painter. He received an excellent education under his father, who was rector of a parish in Montgomeryshire, and having evinced a strong inclination for painting, he was placed under an obscure artist in London. Subsequently he followed portrait-painting in London with success. In 1749 he went to Italy, where an English gentleman employed him in taking sketches and painting landscapes. At Rome he cultivated the friendship of Vernet, the celebrated French painter, who advised him to follow landscape-painting. In 1755 he returned to England, where he acquired the highest reputation. On the establishment of the Royal Academy, he became a member, and in 1779 librarian. Wilson has been styled the English Claude. B. at Pinegas, Montgomeryshire, 1713; D. in Denbighshire, 1782.

WILSON, Sir Robert Thomas, an English general, who, having risen to the rank of brigadier by his distinguished conduct in different parts of the world, was appointed to the command of a Spanish corps which served under Wellington. In 1812-14 he acted as British commissioner with the allied armies. After the death of Queen Caroline, he expressed his disapprobation of the measures pursued by the government towards that lady; for which he was deprived of his rank, and also of the orders he had earned by his bravery. He was an active supporter of the Liberal party in parliament, between the years 1818-31, and in 1841 was reinstated in his rank and honours. In the interval 1842-49, he held the governorship of Gibraltar. He produced a translation of Regnier's "Campaign in 1801 in the East and Egypt," and afterwards wrote "Historical Account of the British Expedition to Egypt," "An Enquiry into the Military Force of the British Empire," and "Sketch of the Military Power of Russia." B. in London, 1777; D. 1849.

WILSON, Dr. Thomas, an English statesman and learned writer, who, after receiving his education at Eton and Cambridge, became tutor to the sons of the duke of Suffolk. In 1551 he put forth "The Rule of Reason, containing the Art of Logic;" and two years later "The Art of Rhetoric." At the accession of Mary he went abroad; but was arrested by the Inquisition at Rome, where he was confined till 1555; at which time the prison was broken open during a riot, and Wilson escaped with others. When Elizabeth became queen, he returned to his native country, and was created master of St. Catherine's Hospital, and subsequently private secretary to her majesty. In 1576 he was sent to the Low Countries as the envoy of England, and in the following year was nominated secretary of state. Before his death he was created dean of Durham. B. in Lincolnshire, about 1520; D. 1591.

WILSON, a county of the United States, in West Tennessee. Area, 408 square miles. Pop. 28,000.

WILSON PROMONTORY, a British colony in Victoria, forms the S. extremity of the continent of Australia, in Bass's Strait. Lat. 39° 8′ S. Lon. 146° 23′ E.—It has a height of 3,000 feet above the sea.

WILSONTOWN, a village of Scotland, in Lanarkshire, 23½ miles from Edinburgh.

WILSTER, wil'-steb, a town of Denmark, in Holstein, near the Elbe, 8 miles from Gluckstadt, with a considerable trade in corn. Pop. 3,000.

WILTON, wil'-ton, an ancient borough and market-town of Wiltshire, near the confluence of the rivers Nadder and Willy, 4 miles from Salisbury. The principal public buildings are the parish church and town-hall. There are, besides, chapels, a free school, and eight almshouses for poor people. Manf. Carpets and woollens; but these have declined. Pop. 8,700.—Also the name of several parishes and townships, none of them with a population above 1,000.

WILTON, the name of several townships in the United States, none of them with a population above 2,500.

WILTSHIRE, wilt'-sheer, an inland county of England, bounded on the N. and N.W. by Gloucestershire; S.W. by Dorsetshire; S. and E. by Hampshire; and N.E. by the county of Berks. Its form is nearly oval. Area, 1,367 square miles. Desc. Wiltshire may be said to be naturally divided into two portions, by an irregular range of hills, which extends transversely through the greater part of the county, in a direction inclining from the N.E. to the S.W. These districts are usually denominated South and North Wiltshire. The South, when surveyed from a distance, has the appearance of a large elevated plain. On a nearer inspection, however, it appears to be indented by numerous and frequently extensive valleys, and to display an almost continual series of gentle eminences, with now and then a bolder height rising above the others, but never to a mountainous elevation. In some parts the hills assume the form of rotund knolls, and are separated by smooth-sided hollows, which vary considerably both in depth and extent. At other places they range along for a short distance in connected ridges, showing on one side rather a rapid declivity, from the top of which, on the other side, the hills sink in irregular gradations, till at length they frequently shelve into a perfect flat. The North differs completely from the southern division in its general appearance. Instead of a constant series of "chalky waves," the aspect of this district, which extends from the verge of the Downs to the hills of Gloucestershire, is nearly that of a perfect flat. The country here, moreover, is so extremely close, and well wooded, that when viewed from any of the surrounding hills, it appears like one vast plantation of trees. If examined in detail, however, it is found also to contain many extensive tracts of rich pasture-land, situate on the banks of the Lower Avon and the Thames, and of such smaller streams as flow into the one or the other of these rivers. It likewise comprises a number of cornfields, exhibits some very fine scenery of the softer kind, and is abundantly supplied with towns and villages. Climate. Usually mild in the North; but in the South, upon the open downs, generally cold and sharp. Rivers. The Thames, the Upper and Lower Avon, the Bourn, the Willy, the Nadder, and the Kennet. The county is also intersected by the Thames and Severn Canal, which passes through a very small portion of the northern boundary of Wiltshire; and the Kennet and Avon Canal. Pro. With regard to agriculture, the southern district may almost be regarded as one vast sheep-farm; the greater part of its extensive downs, and many portions of the vales, being devoted to the rearing and feeding of that useful animal. In the south-west portion, adjoining Dorsetshire, a considerable number of cows are kept for the purpose of making butter. With respect to the arable cultivation of this district, the most general crops on the high white lands are wheat and barley, and on the grounds in the valleys, green crops for the winter maintenance of the sheep and cattle. Potatoes are likewise planted in considerable quantities. The distinguishing feature of the agriculture of North Wiltshire is the pasturage or grazing system, which is conducted principally with a view to the supply of the dairy with milk for the manufacture of cheese, which has long been deservedly famed. On these lands cattle are also fed for sale. Pigs are reared in vast numbers in different parts of the county, more particularly in the dairy farms of the northern division. Minerals. Chalk and freestone, of which there is abundance. Manf. Various, and of great extent; consisting of flannels and fancy woollens; cutlery and steel goods; dowlas and bed-ticks; broad cloths, kerseymeres, and fancy cloths; cotton goods, of which fustians and thicksets form the most valuable portion; silks, carpets, and gloves. Pop. 255,000.—Wiltshire abounds in the most curious and interesting remains of antiquity. Of these the most remarkable are the stupendous monuments at Avebury and Stonehenge, both of which are commonly regarded as Druidical temples.

WIMBLEDON, wim'-bel-don, a village and parish of England, in the county of Surrey, 9 miles from London. It is noted for the numerous elegant villas and mansions which it contains. Its church is in the Grecian style. Pop. 2,700. It has a station on the South-Western Railway.

WIMBLEDON, a hamlet of Cambridgeshire, 3½ miles from March. Pop. 1,200. It has a station on the Eastern Counties Railway.

WIMBORNE-MINSTER, wim'-born-min'-ster, a market-town of England, in Dorsetshire, situate between the rivers Stour and Allen, over each of which is a bridge, 7 miles from Poole. It is a clean little town, with a minster, a venerable structure, erected in the 11th century. The church is built in the form of a cross, with two quadrangular towers, one of them standing on the middle of the roof, and the other at the west end. The former was adorned anciently with a spire, said to have been of an extraordinary height. The whole building is divided in the manner of a cathedral, and consists of a chancel, nave, choir, and side aisles; a transept or cross aisle, and three porches. Its length, from east to west, is 180 feet. In this church numerous royal and noble personages have been buried, most of whom were anciently commemorated by suitable monuments. Manf. Woollen goods and stockings. Pop. 5,000.

WIMPFEN, vimp'-fen, a town of Germany, in Hesse-Darmstadt, 65 miles from Heilbronn. It is inclosed by walls, and was formerly a free city of the empire. Pop. 2,200.

WINANDERMERE, or WINDERMERE, win'-der-meer, a parish of England, in the county of Westmoreland, which takes its name from the famous lake of Windermere, 8½ miles from Kendal. Pop. 3,300.—The LAKE is the most extensive in England, being about 15 miles in length from north to south, and about one mile broad at an average, although in many places it is not more than 500 yards. It is famous for its fine char, and abounds also with trout, perch, pike, and eels. Its shores are well wooded, and it discharges its surplus waters by the Leven into Morecombe Bay.

WINCANTON, win'-kăn-ton, a market-town and parish of Somersetshire, 22 miles from Bath. It has a church, with a square tower and six bells, and a neat market-house. Manf. Ticks and dowlas, serges, and stockings. Pop. 2,443.—Here, in 1688, the prince of Orange defeated a body of royal troops.

WINCHCOMBE, winch'-kum, a market-town and parish of Gloucestershire, in the vale of the Islip, 6 miles from Cheltenham. The church is a noble Gothic structure. Manf. Silk stockings and thread. Pop. 3,000.

WINCHELSEA, win'-chel-se, a borough and market-town of Sussex, 2 miles from Rye. It is a place of great antiquity, and was once populous and flourishing, but is now greatly reduced. Of the ancient town little more is known beyond its having been destroyed by an inundation of the sea, towards the end of the 13th century. It stood at the mouth of the Rother, 2 miles distant from the present town, which has several churches falling into ruin. It is surrounded by a salt-marsh, the sea having receded from it upwards of a mile and a half since the 16th century. Pop. 780. —The old town of Winchelsea was twice pillaged, first by the French, and again by the Spaniards, who landed near Farley Head.

WINCHESTER, win'-ches-ter, an ancient city of Hampshire, situate on the eastern declivity of a hill gradually sloping to the river Itchin, across which it communicates with a suburb by a bridge, 62 miles from
